The Duke of Guise had instructed him to make all these offers, and to submit himselfe to more if it were required, promising him that he would take so many prisoners and men of quality, as they should be glad to exchange him. Pau returns about two of the clocke after midnight with one confident fouldier to bring in them that should be sent to seize vpon the Castle. Chastillon giues him in guard to some of his Capitaines, and commands Capitaine Tessier of Nismes to goe with 150 fouldiers to enter the Castle, and to seize vpon the ports, as well of that which was towards the fields, as of the other which entred into the towne. The fouldier guides them, and at their first entry they finde many bottles of good wine, and meats fit to procure thirst. He leaues twenty Harguebuziers vpon the Draw-bridge, assures the Castle, and then he sends his Colonell word that hee may come safely. Capitaine Gentil (a man suspicious and very distrustfull in such stratagems) had growne iealous of his conduct by a simple fouldier: and being much practised in those policies of warre, the which we must beleue sparingly, hee entreates the Earle not to aduance before he had been within the Castle. I feare (said he) some double practice; at my returne I will tell you if it be safe. Hee goes thither alone, and calls for Capitaine Tessier, adding, adding, that the Earle of Chastillon approached. But at his entry he obserues the ground A had bin newly remoued: he heares the noise of armes in the Church & chambers of the castle, which were lockt vp, and some armed men which he saw going from a hall into a chamber increast his ieaousie. But the impatiency of a soldier, complaining that Chastillon stayed too long, confirmed his beliefe. He suddenly returnes, & passing the bridge, he aduisech Taisier to saue himselfe with his men. Taisier had not leisure but with three, all the rest being spoiled by the deuices which they had prepared at the entry of the castle. And when as they heard Gentilvry into the Earle of Chastillon that he should returne, they presently shoot at him as farre off, hauing left all hope to annoy him nearer. Pau seeing his practice not so successefull as he expected, is wonderfully danted. He thinks he is now at the pits brink which he had prepared for another. They lead him to the D. of Bouillon, who resolues to teare him in pieces with horses. The Baron of Onaw holds opinion, that it were better to leade him to the K. of Nauar: and fearing lest the French either through compassion or corruption should yeeld unto the prisoners perswasions, will himselfe haue the guard of him, and doth fo clog him with chaines, as every member shrinks vnder his burthen. Yet within few dayes after he freed himselfe and escaped, verifying, that men vnable to resist the force of wine, are vnfit to guard prisoners or townes.

The Prince of
at the army.

This losse of horses and baggage, makes the Reistres to mutine againe, growing impatient, neither seeing their pay, nor the K. of Nauarre: for a baie, they force Chateau-lan- don, and spoile it. The Prince of Conti's ariall neere vnto Chartres, (where the Duke of Bouillon resigned him the charge and the white cornet) pacified this mutinie. Then the Suiffes treated with the King, by the D. of Neuers meanes: his Maiestie hauing now con- quered them by their alliance with this Crowne, so ferue him, or to retire themselves: some of the Captaines follow the Kings party, others receiving 400000 crownes returne to their country: but some of them at their ariall lost their heads. By this defection, the army is halfe decreased: the toyles of the warre tyre them: the discommodities proue at length inuportable: many of the troopes dis-band: they foresee an apparant danger, if they giue battell. They take Councell the 24. of Nouember, to turne head, and to draw this languishing army vp to the head of Loire. But the Duke of Guise had well obserued from the beginning, that striking the shepherd, he shall disperse the flocke. The Baron lodged at Anneau neere to Chartres, with seuen Cornets of Reistres: but hee trusted too indifferently to a promise made by the garison of the said Castle, not to commit any act of hostility, and to furnish him with victuals for his money. The Duke manned it by night with good store of Harguebuziers: and at the first found of the trumpet, to horse, he enters the towne with all his forces, euen as their Carts stopt vp the streets and gates in the morning. Being thus surprized, and hauing no meanes to recouer the fields, they are forced to returne into their lodgings, and to remaine at the Conquerors mercy, either slaine or taken. The spoile was great, 800 Wagons, great store of armes, Jewels, and chaines of gold. Two thousand horse of combat and of cariage. So as in one night, all the Dukes footmen were in a manner horrid, rich in spoiles, and rich in prisoners. The Baron, with some few others, leaped ouer the walls and saued themselves, through the fauour of the night, and in a marish. He makes a stand halfe a league from Anneau, and rallies them together that escape. The Suiffes that remained come vnto him: all determine to breake. The Prince of Conoy, Duke of Bouillon, Chastillon, Cleruani, and the rest, become answerable for what is due, so as they will march on. They might easily haue forced through the Duke of Guises armie, but they were surprized with feare, a passion which doth easily vanquish the quicknesse of mans iudgement.

Reistres defeated at Anneau.

The army hath now but one wing to fly withall: it is a body without armes or legs: yet the hope of payment makes them continue their course vp against the river. But the disorder was great: feare accompanieth them, many Gentlemen slip away dayly to their houses: and most of them which remained could not easily resolute to fight. They must make long marches to auoid the enemy: they had no guides, no Smiths for their horses, who were spoiled for want of shooes, no bread for the souldiers, no forrage for their horses, their troopes wasted, most of them were without powder, without bullets, and without meanes to recouer any: the Lanqueners are reduced to 2000, and most vnarmed, and the Suiffes haue changed party. The Reistres thinke of nothing but of their returne into Germany: the French slip away hourly. The Duke of Elsermon coasts them with the Kings army,

A armie, and wisheth they would accept of a capitulation, to disappoint the Duke of Guise of an absolute victory which he did expect. The D. of Guise pursues them, yet is it not fit for the Kings estate, he should wholly vanquish these maimed troopes: the seruant would then presently attempt against the master. Moreover, this army still holding the field, the Realme should be much impouerished: and ioyned with the King of Nauarre, they might effect great matters.

The King offers them a safe conduct to returne, vpon condition that the French should deliuer vp their colours: the Reistres trusse vp their Cornets, and that all sweare, not to beare armes in France without the Kings expresse command. The 8. of December they B accept of this capitulation at Lency in Maconois, and so dis-band. The Lord of Chastillon protests neuer to deliuer vp his Ensignes but to the K. of Nauarre. Hee vnderstands the Reistres threaten to cary him away as a pledge: but he frees himselfe from their mutiny like a gallant Gentleman: And being loth to trust this safe conduct, or to fall into the hand of the duke of Guise his capitall enemy, he resolues to passe through Auvergne with ten or twelve men well mounted, and marching by night onely to recouer Geuandun, and from thence into Languedoc. Capitaine Gentil dissuades him, and makes him resolute to take the way of Viarez with the remainders of the shipwrack, assuring him to lodge him within few dayes by the Petard in the towne of Pont S. Rambert. Hee had onely remain- ing forty Cuirasses, thirty Harguebuziers on horsebacke, and 400 foot, with the which C he had come to the Reistres. Some Noblemen and Gentlemen desire to runne the same fortune. Mony (being so sicke that he could scarce sit on horsebacke) Lieramont, Rebours, Saint Auban, Ouinulle, Legualda, Rouffelle, Fereing, Bandans and others. Gentil marcheth in the head of the footmen, and couereth them with some ranks of horse, and Chastillon is in the reere to make head against them that should pursue them. But as they thought to take Pont Saint Rambert, they were in danger to be taken themselves.

Retreat of the
tillon.

Mandelot, Governor of Lyonnois, had newly lodged 400 men there by the com- mandement of the D. of Guise, to cut off the bridges, and to fight with the Reistres which they thought would passe that way. Mandelot, Cherrieres, the Earle of Tournon, Pelloux (who commanded a great garison in Nonnay) and all that had any authority come to take from D them all meanes to passe but by force. There is nothing, before, behind, nor of either side, but opposite to his retreat, his sword makes his way: he passeth through all that he encountereth like lightning, and forceth his enemies to fight, or to fly, hee giueth occasion to the children of the country to call it The battell of turne-tayles. This passage failing them, Gentil takes his way vpon the left hand, and at midnight takes a great village between Lyons and Pont Percier. As they refresh themselves, the neighing of horses which they heare giue them notice that the enemy approaches. Mandelot followed them with six or seuen hundred horse, and without a thicke cloud which did then miraculously couer them, they had been exposed to his mercy. The cloud and the rough way vncasie for horses, kept the enemy from approaching any nearer, besides hee feared some ambush. They passe the E bridge at Percier, and who so had charged them in a great plaine beyond the bridge, they themselves confesse, that the place, with watchings, and the toyles of the way, had made them altogether vnable to resist.

Mandelot and others pursue Chastillon.

The cloud vanisheth at the breake of day, and Mandelots scouts seeing them aduanced in the Plaine, they gallop after to ingage them in the fight. Chastillon would haue charged them, but Gentil discouers the whole troope, who had come time enough if they had fallen to blowes. They passe the Plaine, and plant their footmen by a riuers side, where through the fauour of some Willowes, they might second their horsemen being in fight. His first enemies appeare: Chastillon chargeth them so resolutely, as there remained about thirty vpon the place: The whole troope arises and repulseth him so furiously, as hee is put to rout, and loseth some of his men at armes, who were caried prisoners to Lyons. Gentil, Ouinulle, Legualda, Rouffelle, Fereing, Bandans, and some other horsemen second the footmen, whom the enemy prest, causing them to march on, and to turne head at euery freight and commodious place they came vnto. Night being come, Mandelot, who had followed them thirty houres together, went to refresh himselfe, giuing leisure to this tyred troope to lament and bewaile the mischance of their Commander, whom they suspected to be vnterly lost.

He was in the like paine for his footmen, who he thought had been defeated: when as approaching approaching neare vnto the mountaines of high Viarez, the Lord of Chastillon, S. Amban, Lieutenant of his Company of lighthorse, Captaine Gache and some others, comming to ioyne with them, to saue these poore men from a generall ruine, and by their presence reuiue the vigour of these footmen to endure with their accustomed courage three assaults from diuers garisons to the shame of them that charged them, before they could reuenter Rou-touton in high Viarez. Mandot went to Court, to giue an account of his diligence, but he receiued reproach both of the King and the Duke of Guise: for that hee had not charged Chastillon in that great village, or past the bridge at Percier before him, to haue defeated him in the Plaine, The which did also bring him in disgrace with them of Lions who neuer after loued him. The strangers thinke to refresh themselves at Geneua, but the most part were not able to get thither: and many of the Commanders, either with languishing and griefe, or as the common saying was, with the sweet Wines they drunke with the Duke of Epemnon, gaue vp the ghost. The D. of Bouillon dyed the 11 of Ianuarie, in the five and twentieth year of his age, leaving Charlotte his sister for his heire, married since to the Vicount of Turenne, now D. of Bouillon, and Matthell of France.

D. of Bouillon.

Another troope of Reistres marched towards the French Conté: the Marquis of Pont, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Guise, pursuing them (against the publike faith) vnto the mountaines of Saint Claude, enter the territories of Montbelliard and Hericourt, where by a lamentable reuenge vpon a poore innocent people, by the burning of 200 Villages, by the forcing of many wiues and maids, and by the murder of a great number of all ages, all sexes, and all qualities, they leaue the markes of the inhumanity, and the brutish fury of the League, and carie the spoiles of their triumph into Lorraine.

Assembly of the League at Nancy.

All the chiefe of the League assemble at Nancy, where they resolute to make the last triall of their ambition. The season inuities them, mens humors are well affected. The Catholike consciences, freed from the fury of strangers, confesse themselves wonderfully bound to the Duke of Guise: the people extoll the victory of Anneau, and the dispersing of this great armie: the Nobilitie of the league looks bigge, the Clergy reioyceth, the Preachers tongues are firebrands of sedition, they speake in derision of the King in their Pulpits, (before time the Pulpits of truth are now become the Chaires of Iuglers: ) they make the King a Saul, and the Duke of Guise a Dauid; Saul slew his thousand, but Dauid his ten thousand.

They publish generally in their Sermons, that the King had leauied the Reistres, to oppose them against the Dukes holy enterprises, and to expose Paris as a prey: but by the Dukes valour and constancy, religion had now triumphed ouer heresie. The Pope sends vnto the Duke a Sword grauen with flames. The King of Spaine, and the D. of Sauoy, conceiue great hopes. The D. of Parma salutes him, and amongst all the Princes of Europe (saith he) Henry of Lorraine alone deserves to command in warre. They make bonc-fires in all places, and sing the wondrous woikes of the Duke of Guise, to the Kings disgrace. The people of Paris especially (possessed with the praises of the House of Guise, and the disorders of the King, the dissoluenesse, lecherie and hypocricie of the Court, vnder a shew of penance) leane to the party which they hold almost certaine: they disdain the present estate, apprehend what is to come, and thinke to lose nothing by the change.

Henry of Lorraine discouers all this, and thinke to make his profit of so goodly an opportunity. He knowes moreover, that Iouber and Miron haue given their opinion of the Kings disability to haue children. Hee makes himselfe more pleasing to the people, who feare the succession of a Huguenot Prince: hee entertaines them with great familiarity, but with an humour aspiring vnto tyrannie. Hee sees the maiestie of his Soueraigne disgraced, his enemies retired to Rochel. England ready to be inuaded by a proud army from Spaine: he giues care to the counsell of the Arch-leaguers, increased to the number of fixtene, by reason of the fixtene quarters of Paris. Hee is crafty, aduised, foreseeing, generous and valiant: but variable, corrupt, a dissembler, secret and patient. Hee will by no means vse his owne name in any thing, yet will hee effect that by another which hee attempts or takes in hand. Hee aduertieth the Cardinal of Bourbon (who goes but as hee is led) that this goodly opportunity must not be lost. But the secrets of his heart were contrary to his outward shewes.

This

The disposition of the D. of

A. This assembly at Nancy tended chiefly to force the King to make his Will, and to allow the legency vnto them: It was therefore concluded: That the King should be urged to ioyne his forces effectually with the League. To place such a stamp on their Officers as should be named: To bring in the Inquisition of Spaine, and to publish the Council of Trent; but with a moderation of such things as derogate from the priuileges of the French Church. To confine to the restitution of the goods sold by the Clergie for the Charges of the warre. To giue them lawes to be made and fortified as the time and necessity required. To forsake the Huguenots bodies and goods, and to entertaine an armie vpon the frontiers of Lorraine, against the Germanes, who threatened reuenge for the insolencies committed in the County of Montbelliard.

B. But to subiect the Kings authoritie to the designs and practices of the League, what was it, but by this means to aspire to the Crowne? To haue him ruine them hee loued, and that were allied vnto him in blood: what was it, but to make a bush of a Forest, and a desert of a goodly Kingdom? And this word of Inquisition, is it not hatefull vnto all men? It was necessary for the Spaniards, who had no better means to plant and maintaine Christianity. But the tediousnesse and manner of their proceeding is horrible, the malice and calumnyation of their spies and informers abominable; their prisons vnder ground fearful: their racks and tortures intolerable, the yellow gowne without sleeves painted all ouer with Diuels, the Mytre, and Corde: and for the last act of this pittifull Tragedy, the fire had made it detestable to the Fleatings and execrable to the French. As for the reception of the Council of Trent, the soueraigne Courts of this Realme haue neuer so aduersed our Kings, for the prejudice they should doe vnto the Crowne, and the priuileges of the French Church. To require redemption of the Clergie goods, and to haue the King force them that were benificed to redeeme them, was it not to haue him make warre for the Church, and the Clergy should giue the alarme, and shadow themselves vnder the temporality, whilst that the Nobility should goe to fight, and the people languish? The League had obtained some townes of assurance, and the Parliaments laboured to put downe the Huguenots. To conclude, the King had not refused the chiefe of the League any demand that he might lawfully grant, and had yielded them many things which hee D. might by this authority refuse.

Besides the motions of the Kings apprehensions, the first beginning of his misery is, that almost all his Councillors of State are corrupted, they conceal the truth, they fit themselves to his humors, they are fearfull, weak, and inconstant. Without doubt that Prince is miserable (saith an Emperor) from whom they conceal the truth. They perswade him, the D. of Guise party is strong, that the Townes and Prouinces looke onely after him: if he enters not into it, he must be subiect both to League and Huguenot. Yet he meanes to be master ouer both, but he takes not the safest course. He becomes the head of the Guifs party, and talking of nothing but of the voyage of Poitou, thinkes to winne the peoples loue, and to stop the murmuring of the League.

The Kings
corrupted.

B. The Prince of Condes death made the enterprise easie. A great debility of the stomacke, a difficulty of breathing, a great costiuenesse, a continuall vomiting, with an alteration and extreme paine, surprised him the third of May, halfe an houre after supper, and the second day of his sickness, a suffocation of all his vitall spirits, sent him from the bed vnto the graue. He was a Prince indued with all the qualities fit for a great Capitaine, vnder whose magnanimity the Protestants conceived great hopes. The body was opened, and the iudgement of Physicians was diuers. The bottom of his belly was pale & burnt: his bowels overflowed with a reddish water: the stomacke about the orifice pierced through with a round hole, and the vitall parts being viceried, made some suspition, others held that it was the remainder of the potion hee swallowed in the year 1552, which making an impression in the bowels, had by little and little weakened the stomacke, of the paine whereof, as also of his side, by reason of the blow hee receiued at the battell of Contrai with a Lance, hee had complained many weekes before his death. The Colledge at Montpellier did subscribe to this last opinion.

Prince of Condes.

In the meantime the King doth not greatly affect this enterprise against the Huguenots: he desires to diuert the warre which the League would make inuicible, but the Commander vnder whom hee assembles his forces, makes him fall from a tower to a precipice. They had long before made the Duke of Epemnon an aduancement odious to the people.

The League made him the only Author of all disorders but the succession of the office of Admirall, and the government of Normandie, wherein the King had installed him since the death of the Duke of Joyeuz, and their disdain for that hee had crossed the Duke of Aumale in his enterprises vpon Boulogne, and other places in Picardy, shall soon discover the violence of an ambitious spirit, who thinks that the very heavens should give him place.

The Duke of Guise finds, that the warre which hee made against the Princeesse of Sedan by Rosne his Lieutenant did but blemish his new trophies. Shee had already chased him from Douzy: she had by the Lord of Nueil slain the core of the most resolute of his troopes, almost as many hurt and drowned in flying, and so led prisoners to Sedan. The consideration of an innocent pupill, makes this warre execrable, and makes them odious that attempt to take from another without any iust cause. The Parisiens faint, if hee come not to confirme them. They call him: and he leauing Sedan and Iametz, thinks it is now high time that the King either yeeld or breake, and that now they must shew the effect of the conclusion of Nancy.

Hee comes to Soissons. The King is very iealous of his approach: and knowing the Parisiens humour and deuotion to the Duke, he sends him word by the Lord of Belliere (a man of great and sound iudgement, who for his great employments, both within and without the Realme, was then one of the chiefe of the Kings Councell, and lately the most worthy Chancellor of France) that hee should doe him a pleasure, nor to come to Paris in a time so full of troubles and factions. If hee come against his will, hee will lay vpon him the cause of all the miseries, which his presence shall breed. But to lose all, there is but one hazard: Pompey thinks, that striking the ground with his foot hee shall raise vp an hundred Legions. He comes to Paris at noone the ninth of May, followed onely with eight Gentlemen, not to amaze the King. He lights at the Queene-mothers lodging, and goes with her to doe his dutie vnto the King. The people follow him by troopes with great ioy: every one blesteth his comming, every one makes new wilhes. The Parisiens had long forgotten that ancient and chearefull salutation of, God save the King. When they see him passe, they change it into God save the Guise, God save the pillar of the Church. A doting Gentlewoman sitting vpon a stall, puts downe her maske. Good Prince (saith shee) seeing thou art come, we are all saved. Hee makes his reuerence vnto the King, but not so assured as hee was accustomed: hee layes open the causes of his comming, and iustifies his actions as well as hee could. Then seeing the King ready to cliche, hee retires to his lodging, and not one Courtier accompanied him as before.

At dinner he growes more resolute. They meet both after dinner at the Queene-mothers lodging. The King full of ielousie and feare: The Duke with a braue and resolute countenance. The people attend the issue of this conference. The next day the Archbishop of Lyons (the chiefe pillar of the League) arrives: the Dukes friends and seruants enter: the fixtreme Tribunes of the Rebels and Conspirators bring and carry away sundry intelligences. To conclude, all now prepare to execute that whereof they failed the last yeare. A notable error of State: for destroying the principall, the necessary perillous of himselfe. The King had sufficient forces to suppress these first insolencies. He had the names & surnames of his enemies: most of them were danted with feare, with their long paces and goings from one to another: others did hide themselves: and some dreamed of nothing but of flight. The multitude is apt for tumults. A chearefull and resolute countenance of the King might easily have dispersed this tempest. But in stead of confirming him, they make him more irresolute: they talke of nothing to him, but of the Dukes practices with the Parisiens, and that by his long delay he will be prevented. He meanes to anticipate the houre, and thinks it sufficient to terrifie them: for the effecting whereof, he commands the Marshall of Biron, to draw his guards of Suisses and French out of the Suburbs into the Citie, and lodgeth them in diuers quarters, to feare the people, if they stirre. Le Goff with his company, held the little bridge neare to our Ladies Church. Grillon, Saint Michaels bridge: the Marshall d'Amont mans our Ladies bridge with Harguebuziers: the Suisses are diuided into diuers places, before the Towne-house, in the new market-place, and at Saint Innocents Church. But either through want of iudgement, or for want of men, they had forgotten the place Maubert. The people grow amazed: the chiefe of League terrifie them with the apprehension of a spoile: they shut vp their shoppes.

A Their trafficke, tooles, pens and paper, are converted into Halberts, Pertuisans, Harguebuzes and Swords. The shollers come from the Vniuersitie, and ioyning with some multitudes of the people, they seize vpon place Maubert: the neighbours arme, all the Citie is in combustion: some cry out for Barricado's, there is nothing but stopping of the wayes: they flanke them, and man them, they make them from thirty paces to thirtie, euen to the Centinels of the Louure, they draw the chaires: no man passeth without the word, or a Passport from the Colonels or quarter Masters. The Earle of Brisac, Bois-Dauphin, Chamou, and other heads of the League, charge the Suisses, and kill some: the rest being terrified with this v unexpected fury of the people, without Commanders, without conduct, and without assurance of the Kings intention, chooseth rather to yeeld their pikes, then to charge them in this violent occasion. Without doubt a more manly courage and constant resolution had forced the Parisiens to fortifie themselves in the bottome of their Cellars. Cities begin a mutine boldly, but they execute it faintly, if they see any resistance, vsing still more words then deeds. The consideration of wife, children, and shop, doe easily quaille their first heat. S. Paul, (a simple Gentleman, but a chiefe man in this party) causeth the Kings Guards, to retire with their hats in their hands, and their armes downe. They cry out generally against the Tyrant, against the Huguenots, against the Politicks. It fares with them in a manner as it did in former times with the English and Bourguignons.

C The Queene-Mother had alwayes made her profit of the variety of Factions: shee is now deceined, the D. of Guise will not employ her in that he hath designed: she takes her Coach, and comes amazed to intreat the Duke to pacifie this tumult. Belliere followes to the same end. But the Duke answered, These are wild buls broke loose, whom I cannot stay. So great a designe was not attempted to faint in the midst thereof. It was no longer time now to dissemble: the maske vacouered, and the foard founded, they must goe on, and seize vpon his person, without whose ruine their victory would be imperfect, for the effecting whereof ten or twelue thousand men were ready to enter by night at the new gate, to beset the Louure, and to shut vp all the passages. Foure Gentlemen, familiar with the Duke, aduertise the King hereof: yet can he hardly beleue it, but that the people will alwayes willingly yeeld to the Kings clemency. Yet his Councell desired to be out of Paris. They lay before his Maiesty the general reuolt, in the which Philip the faire was forced to save himselfe among the Templers: the party coloured hood of red & sky colour, wherewith Charles Duke of Normandy, and afterwards King of France, the sist of that name, and surnamed the wife, was hooded, to save himselfe from the peoples insulency, during the Captiuitie of King John his father in England: the reuolt of the Mallotins: the mutine of the Caboches: the crosses of Saint Andrew: the deposition of Salcedo: the aduertisements of the King of Navarre, and the conspiracies of the last yeare, which now hath broken the bankes, and overflowed all.

His feare increaseth, yet hee settles his countenance. It is reason (saith hee) so provide for these disorders, to assemble the Councell, and to give all men contentment. And the better to disguise his intent, he sends backe the Queene-Mother vnto the Duke, to perswade him to come vnto the Louure, and to assure him, that hee shall retorne with such satisfaction as hee can desire. Shee intreats him in this vrgent necessitie, to make knowne vnto the King, that hee hath more will to preserve, then to ruine his Crowne, & to settle the State which this mutiny hath wonderfully shaken. To intreat an enemy, is to shew that hee feares him. The D. seems cold: hee layes the motives of these tumults vpon the people, to whose assistance hee is drawne, more by the violence of necessity, then by his own desire. It were a great indiscretion (saith hee) for mee, to cast my selfe naked into a suspected place, at the mercy of my enemies. The King vnderstanding by his Mother, the Dukes obstinacie in his designe, resolves for the safety of this person. He goes from the Louure with a small traine, with a shew to walke in the Tuilleries, and from thence he goes to lodge at Trapes. I give thee my curse (saith he, turning at Chalior towards Paris) disloyall and ingratefull Citie: a Citie which I have alwayes honoured with my continuall aboad: a Citie which I have more enriched then any of my Predecessors. I will neuer enter within the compass of thy walls, but by the ruine of a great & memorable breach. Cursed likewise be you all, for whose content I have purchased the hatred of so many.

Speech betwixt
the Earle of Brisac and the Ambassadour of England.

O Duke! thou hast drawne thy sword against thy Soueraigne: but God hath stayed this arme from striking. It is a folly onely to terrifie him, who may finde meanes of reuenge. Many of his Faction blame him to haue erred in the mayne point, wherein consisted the perfection of his victory, by this attempt hee hath blemished his reputation with all Princes. All Kings are Brethren, one Royall blood summons another, they haue an interest in this cause, they affect troublers of anothers Estate, but they cannot endure them in their owne. Hce therefore thought it good to send the Earle of Brisac vnto Sir Edward Stafford being then Ambassadour for England, to informe him of the subiect of the Barricadoes, who came accompanied with certaine Gentlemen to visit the Ambassadour in his Lodging, to offer him (amidst these popular insurrections) a safeguard, intreating him not to bee amazed, nor to retire himselfe, vpon the assurance and protection of the Duke of Guise. The Ambassadour answered, that if hee had beene a priuate person in Paris, hee would haue cast himselfe at the Duke of Guises feet, to thanke him most humbly for his courteous and kinde offer; but being neere vnto the King for the seruice of the Queene his Mistris (who had a League of amity and friendship with the King) he neither could nor would receiue any safeguard but from the King.

The Earle of Brisac told him, that the Duke of Guise was not come to Paris to attempt any thing against the King or his seruice: that hee was onely forced to defend himselfe, that there was a great conspiracy against him and the City of Paris: that the Town-houle and other places were full of gibbets, whereon the King had resolved to cause many of the city and others to be hanged. Wherefore the D. of Guise intreated him to aduertise the Queene his Mistris of all these things, to the end the whole world might bee informed. The Ambassadour answered that hee would easily beleuee that hee had spoken this vnto him. That great and bold enterprises remaine many times incommunicable in the bowels of the vnder takers, who (when they please) discover them with what colour they thinke fittest for themselves. But hee would tell him freely, that what had past at Paris would be found strange, & of dangerous consequence by all the Princes of Christendom, who haue interest therein. That no cloake, how goodly soeuer, could make it allowable, being the duty of the subiect to continue constant in his due obedience to his Soueraigne. That if there were gibbets prepared, men would easily beleuee it, if the Duke of Guise wil shew them: and admit it were so, it were an odious and intolerable thing for a subiect to seeke to hinder by force the iustice which his Soueraigne would doe by armes. That hee promised him willingly that hee would aduertise the Queene his Mistris being wiser then hee, to beleuee what she pleased. Then the Earle asked him if he had any armes: to whom the Ambassadour answered, if you question with me as one that hath been sometimes a friend and familiar with Monsieur de Cusse your Vncle; it may be I would tell you; but being as I am you must pardon me. Your house will be presently searched, said hee, for they thinke you are armed, and it is to be feared ye will be forced. I haue two doores in my lodging replied the Ambassadour, the which I will cause to be shut and defend them as long as I may, to the end the world may know how vniufully the Law of Armes is violated in my person. After which the Earle of Brisac said, I pray you tell me as a friend, haue you any armes? to whom the Ambassadour answered, seeing you aske me as a friend, I will tell you: if I were a priuate person here I would be armed; but being an Ambassadour, I haue not any but the publique faith. I pray you said the Earle of Brisac, cause your gates to be shut. I will not doe it said the Ambassadour, an Ambassadors house must be open to all commers, and goers: moreover, I am not in France to remaine still at Paris, but neere vnto the King where soeuer he is. This discourse passed betwixt the Earle and the Ambassadour of England, which I haue thought good to insert at large.

Without doubt the providence of God had prepared a strange Catastrophe for the Duke, for the King, and for his Realme: who at this time, by his singular loue to this Crowne, did direct the successe which they expected of this shamefull and reproachfull mutiny. O Paris! King Charles the 8 had in former times made the twelfth day of May famous, by the absolute conquest of the Realme of Naples: and now thou dustiest to haue this twelfth day noted with red letters, and hereafter to be celebrated, for that in the

A same day thou hast presented vpon the Theater of thy rebellions, a King dispossessed of the capitall City of his Realme. Nay rather, what coale can sufficiently note to our posteritie this mournfull and vnforgotten day? What law of forgetfulness, may wipe out the remembrance of thy shame, ingratitude and treachery: what loction can wash away the spots of thy pollution, filthinesse, and villanies? what fire shall ever consume the memory of the rebellions, tyrannies, and seditions, of this fatal and abominable League: O Barricadoes, you are the spring of those floods, which shall for a time drowne this Estate: and the instrument wherewith that inscrutable wisdom would chastise, both the King and the Realme.

B Fatal and cursed day of the Barricadoes, the birth day of our miseries, and the funeral day of our happinesse, which hath broken the bounds to those streames of blood which haue drowned our fields; which hath made liberty captiue; truth criminall; rapine iust; and tyranny and inuasion lawfull: which hath pild a crowne from a Kings head, and the Lawes out of the heart of the Realme: which hath armed a President to mutine the people of his quarter: which hath made cowards courageous to set vpon the Kings guard: which hath made the most wicked insolent, and caused them of the League to triumph through the streets of Paris, as a perfect image of all villany: which hath made the sixteene Tribunes to publish that wretched rebellion, and to qualifie it with the title of iust defence against the King; aduertising all the townes of their confederacy, that God had preferred that holy and religious City from a great massacre, and from a fearful sack; that the Duke of Guise had prevented the councill of the politticks, and especially of the D. of Elpernon, who had so posselt the Kings heart, as he had caused him to resolve to ruine the chiefe and most Catholike families of Paris, to suppress their liberties, and to deprive them of their religion, thinking there was no better meanes to force obedience in a people, then to keepe them vnder, and to deprive them of their wealth, the which made them insolent, mutinous and rebellious.

The Duke of Guise at the beginning of this bold and insolent attempt, writes presently to his most truly friends, to repaire speedily vnto him with armes and horses: but no baggage. I haue ouerthrowne the snuffes (said he) to Entragues Gouernour of Orleans) cut in pieces some part of the Kings guards, and hold the Loure so frailty best, as I will give a good account of what is within it. This victory is so great, as it will be remembered for euer. But oh Duke! is it presumption that bandies thee against the rules of reason, or weaknes which abates thy courage and resolution; in suffering him to scape, who within few moneths shall heape this thy victory vpon thy head, and other bringings a sudden repentance vnto man, and makes him wise too late. Thou seemest, oh Duke! to touch the heavens with thy forehead, and hell with thy foot: but learne, that our Histories are full of the violent deaths of those proud spirits, who seeke their glory and profit with the ruine of their Country, the preiudice of States, and the subuersion of common peace. That great God which reuengeth the injuries of Kings and people, layes publike ruines vpon them that doe them. The slaughter at Vassy kindled the fire of the first ciuill warres. So thy father dyed, soone after the new troubles which followed. Euen so, the like storme threatens thy ruine in the midst of thy violent passions.

Entragues had assembled the Nobility of the League at Baugency: but the 14 of the moneth, he writes vnto them: Our great, could not execute his designe, the King having found himselfe within Chartres: I wish you to retire to your houses, as quietly as you may, making no shew to haue scene any thing. And in the end: I am so amazed, as I know not what to doe. I beleuee him. Kings haue long hands; they catch a farre off, and their blowes are dangerous. So hereafter the King shall free himselfe from the Leagues party; but hee shall be fittle the better. The Duke is no less troubled in minde, seeing the Sunne of the Royall Maiestie eclipsed: hee seems grieved, rebukes the people, causeth outrages to cease, deliues the French companies their armes, and puts them out of the Cities, but in Saint Anthones care, quite contrarie to the way which their Masters tookes. In such mutinies no mind, (be leuee to resolve) continues still constant in one Estate. The D. of Guise fees now, that the greatness of the Clergy apprehends these newe insurrections: their callings haue more grace vnder the beauty of a King, then in the shadow of a Democracy. The French Nobility (at the least of ten parts) will not be drawn into

to the humours of the Princes of the league, their proper and essential forme is to oppose themselves against the subversion of this Estate. The Gentlemen hold their honours, dignities, charges, fees, and iurisdiccions by homage of the King: and foresee, that a royalte cannot be suppressed, but the Nobility must likewise perish: there is the like reason (but without proportion) of the obedience, and fee due vnto a King, as of a rent due vnto the Lord of a Mannor, he that hath withdrawne himselfe from the first, will likewise free himselfe from the last. Hee sees that the learned and men of honour abhorre this disgrace, lately done vnto the King. The Court of Parliament resolues to abandon Paris. All France is offended with the Kings departure: and without the Kings person, the Tragedy of Chilperic cannot well bee acted, nor the instructions of the Aduocate David perfectly effected. It is therefore better to play the dutifull seruant, and making vnto the King some shew of respect, seruice and obedience, to labour to returne into Grace, and at the first opportunity to effect their purpose.

The Duke seeks to returne into fauour,

So the D. of Guise, not able to support himselfe in these high attempts, falls flat down. He protests of his innocency to the King, and of his endeours to checke the peoples furie: he offers to prostrate himselfe at the Kings feet, to iustifie his honour, the which hee sayes is strangely wounded by his enemies, that are about his Maiestie. But on the other side, the glosse doth ill agree with the text: he chooseth a Prouost of Merchants, and Sheriues at his deuotion, receiues the Arcenal, the Bastille, and other places of strength: depose many quarter-masters and Capitaines, takes an oath from such as he inuents: seizeth vpon the Kings treasure, as he had done at Châlons, Reims, Soissons, and through all the townes of his obedience. And if this chiefest continueth (saide hee) I protest to preserve both the Religion and the Catholikes.

The Queene-
Mother im-ployed for a peace.

Then by the other Letters written to Bassompierre a Lorraine. The King leaues forces and so do we. He is at Chartres, and we at Paris. Elsperson is chased out of Normandy: the Kings seruants are imprisoned in many great townes: the lesser send to submit themselves to Paris and so. Whilst the Duke prepares a false for the fore which he had made, and the Parisiens perswade their associates, to maintaine themselves ioyntly against the King of Nauarre, with whom (they said) the King had made himselfe a partisan, to the preiudice of Religion, and the Catholike Church, his Maiestie exhorts his Lieutenants and Gouernours of his Prouinces, to retaine the Nobilitie, and people, within those limits of duty and respect, which tye them to their Soueraigne, and the chiefe cities, not to frame their affections after the modell of Paris. But he speaks no more like a King: his stile is the style of a man that flies, that feares, that intreats. And to repaire this disorder, hee employes the Queene-mother. But how could this turbulent spirit cure the infirmities of the Estate, being irreconcilable in her hatred to the Princes of the blood, and transported in her affection to the children of her daughter, the Duchesse of Lorraine? Shee aduise the King, to passe ouer quietly the insolencies of the league: but there is no likelihood, shee should more regard the profit of her sonne, then the aduancement of the Marquis of Pont her grand-child. She brings to this new common-weale (for the Royalty seemed now to be changed into a Democracy) complaints, and teares against the brauings and force of a courageous Prince, and a furious multitude. And promising effects of greater zeale to Religion, more respect in the distribution of offices, and more moderation in the exaction of Subsidies, shee presumed to give contentment to those who made shew to employ themselves for a generall reformation; and to reduce the most violent to their obedience.

Seuen demands of the League.

But this serueth but to breed a second treaty like to that of Nemours. Paris without the King, is a body without forme: the most iudicious finde it, and lament his departure. The late orders of religious men haue great credit with him. They send the Capuchins in procession vnto Chartres, to mitigate the heat of his cholere, & then the chiefe of the city went to excuse the motives which had forced the people to defend themselves, and to beseech him to retire to Paris, where he should be receiued with as great ioy, as his subjects were grieued, to vnderstand of his departure: what hee should finde better seruants, then those which had counselled him to ryme, and then to leave them: and that it would please his Maiestie to grant them seven principal points of their petition: the extirpation of heresie, by the force of his Maiestie, and the holy vniion: the banishment of the D. of Elsperson, and of his brother la Valtre: warre in Guienne, by the King in person, and by the duke

A of Mayenne in Dauphiné: Abolition of the tumults of Paris: Confirmation of officers chosen for the managing of ciuill causes since the Barricades: A restoring of the goodly and ancient ordinances of the Realme: And an abolition of parties, gifts and abuses brought in by Elsperson, and la Valtre.

answer,

The Queene-mother presents these Deputies, and the King vrged by the League to grant their request, lets the Cardinall of Bourbon, and the other Princes vnderstand: that the peace and warre, the battels wherein he hath so willing exposed his person, and the last ouerthrow of the Protestant Reisters, haue alwayes beene sufficient testimonies of his zeale to the maintenance of the onely Catholike religion within his Realme: to the B extirpation of heresie, and false doctrine: but iacobusies and distrust had prevented him from reaping the fruits of the aduantage which he had ouer the said heretikes. That for a present reformation of affaires, and to prevent the feare the Catholikes had to fall vnder the command of Heretikes, he would call an assembly of the three Estates of France: and resolues presently to reuoke many impositions which oppress the people. As for the private complaints against the D. of Elsperson, and his brother: I will (saith he) alwaies make it knowne in all occasions, that I am a iust Prince, and will preserve the common profit of my Realme, before any other consideration.

The D. of E-spersons insultation.

But the two brethren, Elsperson, and la Valtre, say: to what end should they make an enterprise at Paris, to take the Duke of Elsperson, who was then in Normandy? and why C made they Barricades, euen to the gates of the Loure, armed the people, and seized vpon all the chiefe places of the citie, to chase la Valtre from Valence, and other parts of Dauphiné where hee remained? and if the confusions of former ages haue kept other Kings from acknowledging our fathers seruices, and hee hath rewarded his merits in his children, what be those ialous and malicious heads, that enuy our fauours with his Maiestie? what censure? what rigour? what law may keepe a King of France, from aduancing to authority some fauorites, who reuiue in them the vertues of their ancestors? Moreouer, the League makes mention, in what places our fauour hath been employed: the treaties of the D. of Elsperson in Guienne: his being acquainted with Cleruants negotiation for the Huguenots of Metz: the enterprises he hath made vpon Cambray: his late fauour to the D Reisters in their returne: his secret conference with Chastillon, the consultations of that tumult, which hath lately hapned in Paris: the taking of Valence, Tallard, Guillestre, and other places, from the Catholikes of Dauphiné, and his practices to stay the yeelding of Aulnoye. But we say, would to God we had in the like sort taken, Châlons, Diion, Montreuil, Cambray, and all that are subiect vnto his Majesty within the heart of France. They terme vs fauorers of Heretiks: And yet we haue, in six moneths taken from them by the sword, all their conquests in Prouence (the King, since the death of Henry the bastard, and Grand Prior of France, had giuen this gouernment to the D. of Elsperson) which former Gouernours could not doe in twenty yeares. The taking of Sorgues in Dauphiné by vs two, during the frozen time of winter: and the ouerthrow of the Huguenots Suisses, by E la Valtre: but especially the last diuision of the Suisses from the Reisters, which made the way for the D. of Guise, to defeat them at Auneau, and the discontent, wherein the Duke of Elsperson left the K. of Nauarre at his departure out of Guienne: are not these sufficient testimonies, that their accusations are as frivolous and malicious, as the sale of offices wherewith folke charge them? for iustification whereof the Duke of Elsperson offers to present his head at his Maiesties feet, if it be proued that hee had euer any such thought in his soule. Contrariwise, who hath during the reignes of Henry the second, and Francis the second, managed the treasure without control but the House of Guise? whereof the latter follow the steps of their Predecessors? Who hath forced the King to exact vpon his subjects but the warre which they haue kindled and drawne his Maiestie into? what F house did euer from so small a beginning grow to so fearfull a greatness? To conclude: no man shall blame vs for being Pensioners to the King of Spaine: to haue hindred our King from the recovery of the Seigneuries of the Low Countries: nor to haue stolne away the reuenues of his generall receipts. We will no wayes hinder this goodly reformation: we are not in Court, nor in the Kings presence.

Let vs see the first fruits of this so commendable a gouernment. Haue you left Paris? haue you yeilded it to the King your Lord, and natural Prince? Nothing lesse: you haue reuolted Corbeil, Melun, and Pontoise: you haue (with false persuasions) withdrawne the

the best Cities of the Realme. But we will (in protesting to bee ready to deliuer into his Maiesties hands, with our liues and honour: all the offices, charges, governments and places which it hath pleased him to commit vnto vs) inuite our accusers to doe the like. And if they will pretend inequality of persons: let them vnderstand, that whatsoever either party holds, it appertaines vnto the King, neither can they keepe it, but at his pleasure. Thus the two brethren iustified themselves, whilest the Court of Parliament makes knowne vnto the King by their Deputies, their griefe for this insolency, which had forced him to abandon Paris. They appeale vnto his clemency and bounty. They present for an humble excuse of his officers, the weakenesse and feare which had forced them to yield to so violent a reuolt: beseeching him to returne into his Citie, and to giue rest and content to his Maiestie, order to his affaires, grace to their purple robes, and authority to their offices: and by his presence, to disperse the mutinies which diuisions had bred.

For answer. I doubt not (said the King) but you would willingly haue reformed this disorder, if it had been in your power: neither of your persisting in the same affection and fidelity which you haue testified to my forefathers. I am not the first that hath bintoucht with such afflictions; neither will I leaue to be a good father to such as shall be good children. I will alwayes intreat the Parisiens with the quality of a father, as children that haue strayed from their duty, not as seruants to haue conspired against their master. Continue in your offices, and receive from the Queene my Mother the commandements and intentions of my will.

This answer was soft and cold: but after dinner, hee adds a sharper conclusion, and calling backe the Deputies. I know (saith hee) wherefore garisons are set, either to ruine a towne, or for distrust of the Inhabitants. But what cause had the Parisiens to presume, that I would ruine a towne, whereunto I haue brought so many commodities by my presence, as ten or twelue townes would thinke themselves greatly benefited thereby? and what distrust could I haue of a people whom I loued? of a people in whom I trusted? Haue they lost a loafe, or any thing whatsoever by means of these pretended garisons? I sought the preservation of my good Citie of Paris, and the safety of my subiects, meaning by a strict search, to put out a great number of strangers, whom I knew to be secretly crept in. They haue offended me, yet am I not irreconcilable; neither haue I any humour to ruine them.

But I will haue them confesse their faults, and know that I am their King and master. If not, I will make the markes of their offence remaine for euer. I will reuoke my Court of Parliament: my Chamber of Accounts, Aides, and other Courts of Iustice. I will take from them the Vniuersities, their Honours, Freedomes, and Priuiledges. I will omit no means to be reuenged. Not that I am reuengefull, or accustomed to vse seueritie: but I will haue them know, that I haue as much resolution and courage, as any of my Predecessors. I am no Vsurper, but a lawfull King by succession, and of a race that hath alwayes commanded mildly. Let them not take religion any more for a pretext. There liues not a more Catholike Prince, nor that desires more the extirpation of heresies, then my selfe. I would willingly lose an arme, that the last Heretick were painted in this Chamber. Returne to your charges, and be of good cheere, I will be for you: and let them vnderstand what I haue said vnto you.

The D seeks to make his

Now the most desperate Leaguers found, that the absence of the Court made their fare but simple, made their shops without Chapmen, and their traffick cold: the shame to be without a King, made the most audacious mutinies to hang downe their heads: the violence of rebellion quailed: many found the dealing of Paris too audacious. And now Paris studied to returne to the Kings obedience: when as the Duke of Guise fearing the losse of many of his friends and seruants, resolues to make his peace. Hee now speaks of nothing but the Kings seruice, the obedience of his Maiestie, the preservation of the Estate, the reformation of disorders, and the subiects ease, and (by the intercession of the Queene-Mother) seeks his fauour which hee had lost. The Queene-Mother terrifies the King. Those of his Councell, (who for the most part are seruants to the League) keeps him in this humour: and propounds vnto him a generall reuolt of his subiects, with the intelligence, and fauour the League had within Chartres, the which causeth him, for his greater safety to goe to Roan. Finally, they cry out against the Huguenots. My Liege (say they) will you lose the name of most Christian, in winking at these heresies which vndermine

A mine the truth? will you alone among threescore and one Kings, your Predecessors, suffer so detestable a medley of truth and falshood?

This Councell caries him away against them in whom hee should most trust, who lamenting the decay of his authoritie, and the weakening of his forces, see that his intentions inclined to his owne ruine. Hee seemes to be in choller with the King of Nauarres party, to haue the League on his side, (but hee telleth no man, that he pretends to vse their forces against themselves), and draws certaine Articles of the reunion of Iuly, whereby hee frames his Edict, not so much against the King of Nauarres religion, as to exclude him, in fauour of the League, from that, which none but God could take from him. But whilest they finish these accords, hee suddenly surpriseth the Isles of Charon and of Marans.

The King by this Edict admits no Religion, but the Catholike: hee promisseth neuer to make a peace nor truce with the Heretikes, nor any Edict in their fauour. He will haue all his subiects to ioyne with him, that by their common forces they might root out the said heretikes. He binds his subiects to sweare, neuer to yeld obedience after him, to any Prince that shall be an Heretike, or a fauourer of Heresie, degrades from all publicke charges, either in peace, or warre, those of the reformed religion: promisseth all fauour to the Catholikes, so as they shew themselves obedient and faithfull, and depart from all vnions, practices, intelligences, affociations and Leagues, contrary to the vnion which hee made by this Edict: hee declares them guilty of treason, that shall refuse to signe to this new vnion, or shall afterwards depart from it: and finally, hee aboliseth all that was done and past. But (signing this forced Edict) he wept.

The Leaguers are now wonderfully puffed vp with hope: yet this reuerence of the royall Maiestie is so naturally grauen in the hearts of men, as the onely remembrance of the twelfth of May makes their hearts to tremble. They feare the scorpions taylor, and that the King by his great facilitie, should determine against them some mournfull Catastrophe in the last act of the Tragedie. And thereupon two things amaze them suddenly: newes comes, that the fearefull and huge Spanish armie, wherein were a hundred and thirty great Ships, and twenty thousand fighting men, vnder the command of the Duke of Medina Sidonia, had by fortune of sea, after their departure from the Grongne in Galicia, lost three Gallies of Portugall, many were scattered, and many bruised and made vnpromisable for the voyage, and were afterwards so encountered by the Admirall, and Drake the Vice-admirall, shewt of Portland, vpon the English coast, as they forced them to turne head, and to retire in disorder towards the towne of Calais, (hoping there to ioyne with the Prince of Parma) with the losse of one gallion, which caried some part of their treasure, and also the instructions for the order which the Generall should follow, having conquered England.

A bad beginning, for so braue and proud an ostentation, where they promised themselves an absolute victorie. But the progresse and end was yet more fatal. The English Fleet presseth them so neere, as they force them to leaue the Rendezuous in confusion: their General Galleasse pestered with other ships, was cast by the current vpon the sands, neere to the Port of Calais, and remained with the artillerie in the gouernours power: The rest were scattered by the English artillerie. The Spanish army lost twelue ships, and about fise thousand men, who had no other sepulchres, but the vast Ocean, and the bellies of sea Monsters: Finally, taking their course to the North, bending towards Scotland, and Ireland, those seas were no lesse fatal to the Spaniards, for seuentene of their great Ships were sunke, and many others cast vpon the sands and rocks, and the rest of this Armie was so miserably shaken, as of a hundred and thirty ships, hardly thirte arriued in Spaine. Where the Duke of Medina had no other excuse vnto his Master, but the ignorance and treacherie of his Mariners, with the small experience they had of those Northern seas; the want of succours from the Prince of Parma, the tempesty shipwracks, finally ill fortune, but not one word of the iudgement of God vpon this gyant-like attempt, to bring all England slauess to the mountains of Grenada, or to the mynes of Peru.

The second reuolt for the Leaguers is, that the King will not returne to Paris, howe soeuer they importune him. I will prepare my selfe (saith he) for the warre against the heretikes: and for the Parliament which I intend to call, and to giue all Princes that are vntied, ted, contentment and satisfaction. They doubt the Barricadoes haue left much spleene in A the Kings heart: and to prevent all contrary euents, they thinke it not yet time to satisfie the oath which they had made, to renounce all intelligences and Leagues which they had made both within and without the Realme.

They take new Councils and resolutions at Paris, to maintain this authority and credit gotten with so many crosses and disgraces vnto the King, and so to presse him, and to subiect his will vnto theirs, as he shall not see, speake, nor moue, but by the eyes, tongue, and finewes of the League: to haue the Deputies of the Parliament-House of their faction, with instructions drawne out of the Articles of Peronne, Nancy, Nemours and Giniulle.

To vrge the King against the Huguenots, and to sollicite him to ease the people by the discharge of taxes, thereby to make him odious, if he refusethe the first fruits of their vni- on: To make them strong at the Parliament, and to that end to fend for all the Nobility of their owne faction, and their adherents, to assist with their armes. To hold good correspondencie with the Duke of Parma: and to aduertise the King of Spaine, that this accord made with the King, tended onely to effect their common designs. To retaine Piffier Colonell of the Suisses, and Balagny Gouernour of Cambray, with the priuate conuentions passed betwixt them. To prevent lest the Duke of Nevers, whom the King resolved to send into Picardy to suppress the violences of the League, should winne away their most trusty friends. To binde the Citie of Paris vnto the Lord of Villars, gouernour C of New-hauen, for the summe of 30000 crownes yearly, to haue him fauourable to their party.

These new Councils bred new teares. The King cannot containe them in subscribing of these new Articles: but his misfortune forceth him to hazard his estate, to preserue his person. Hee knowes well, that these are but imaginations: that his Edict of reuinion will bee oblerued by none, but by himselfe: or so farre as it toucheth the subuersion of his Crowne. And yet too much bounty, or too great apprehension makes him scrupulous to prevent it. The Protestants offer to try this great quarrell at their owne perils, so as hee will remaine a Neuter, and suffer them to oppose against the mutinies of the League. E Hee reiects this aduice. For there is lesse danger (saith hee) to remaine with those which pers- D sist in the vniety of our Religion, then with those which are diuided, and become heads of new opinions.

So whether it were of a good meaning or of purpose, hee returnes to Chartres. Hee sees, imbraceth and maketh much of the Duke of Guise, and there all his fauours and bounties are liberally bestowed on the chiefe Pillars of the League. Hee giues the Duke of Guise the generall command ouer all the men of warre within the Realme. This was not the name and title, but in effect the office and charge of Constable. Hee makes the Cardinall of Guise Legate of Auignon, the which he promisseth to obtaine for him of his Holinesse. To the Duke of Mayenne, a goodly army for the warre of Dauphine. To the Duke of Nemours, the government of Lyons, as his father had enjoyed it: and hee determined to giue the Seale to Peter of Espinac Archbishop of Lion, to winne him vnto him by this great bounty, promising to procure him a Cardinals Hat of Pope Sixtus, by the means of the Cardinall of Gondy, whom he had sent to Rome. Without doubt he had receiued more honour by being Chancellor of France, then in being Chancellor of the vniou. (The Chancellor Hurault Earle of Chyuerny, and the Lord of Belleuere, and Villeroi, had then leaue to attend the Kings pleasure at their houses.) Hee declares the Cardinall of Bourbon the first Prince of the blood, deciding (by a doubtfull speech,) that great question of prerogative, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew, wherein there hath been so much written, and so much disputed: perverting the ancient order of succession, and making the Cardinall to serue the passions of the League.

They present vnto the King (being but six and thirty yeares of age) a successour, who had euen then passed a Climatrical yeare of threecore and three. Was it not the Leagues meaning, vnder the Cardinall of Bourbons image, to raise vp a stranger, and violently to aduance his tyranny, to vsurpe the royalty? To conclude, the King continues, renues and amplifies his fauours to all such as haue any credit with the League: he doth nothing without them; he opens the very secrets of his heart vnto them, and (for their sakes) causeth every one of their partisans to taste some portion of his bounty, and makes

Councils disturb the Court.Troubles against the D.
of Epseron in Angoulême.

A makes show to beleeue, what hee sayeth day to day, but this Council blinds his eyes, so as hee cannot discern what is the duty of a good King: they disguise the truth from him, and study onely to satisfie their ambition and conceits. So as to please them, euen in this, hee himselfe puts out those eyes, whereby hee did see most clearely, and giues them leaue to retire to their houses, where to shew themselves from the conclusions of State.

The Duke of Epseron was out of Court: but hee had laich out from the King, to command in the Prouinces of Anjou, Tourain, Poitou, Angoulmois, & Xantong: Being at Loches, hee is advertised that the League passed with some inhabitants to deliuer them Angoulême. He posts thither, and the people receiue him with great honours. The Kings Lieutenants. Hee publisheth the Edict of reuinion, his words and deeds reuise nothing but a courage resolved to preserue the Catholike Religion. But behold suddenly a strange Catastrophe. Some Leaguers had perswaded the people, that hee meant to draw the Huguenots troopes into the Castle, and so subdue the towne. The Maior (being the head of the Conspiracy) enters into the Castle on S. Laurence day, vnder colour to present vnto the Duke certaine Pistols that were come from Court: he mounts vp to his Chamber, at his entry hee dischargeth two Pistols, and seekes to force the house. The Duke was then in a Cabinet, attending the houre of Masse: where hee read the History of Pierre Guesclin, in old time dearely fauoured by Edward the second King of England preferred before all others in Court, enriched with the Kings treasure, and the peoples wealth, but after banished the Realme, and in the end beheaded at the suite of the Estates.

This slanderous Libell being printed at Paris, not so much against the Dukes honour as the Kings, compared the Duke with Guesclin, and concluded, that vnder Henry the third, hee should end his dayes by the like tragedy. Vpon the first tumult, the Dukes Gentlemen fly to armes, and repulse this armed multitude: the Maior being hurt with the shot of a Pistoll through a doore, dyed within seven houres after. The alarm flies into the towne. The people arme, storme, and make barricadoes. But the Duke kept the Castle: the Citadell was at his deuotion, and might by either of them draw in necessary succours to vngage him.

D The Seigneur of Tagens, the Dukes cousin, advanced with succours: Borders Captaine of the Citadell being prisoner among the conspirators, loued the liberty of his place, more then his owne life: Merc, Messieurs, Masquerole, and Bouchaux, summoning the besieged, found nothing in them but a constant resolution to dye rather then to yield: and the people were willing to capitulate, when as Tagens by his arriuall pacified the sedition: Armes were laid aside, and the prisoners of both parts deliuered. The Duke of Guise hauing made his peace with the King, and disappointed his most faithfull Counsellors: yet one thorne troubled his foot, the Huguenots Estate. Hee therefore ceaseth not, vntill hee sees them assailed in Poitou and Dauphine: and whilst the Duke of Nevers prepared his armie for Poitou, hee sends the regiment of Saint Paul to the Duke E of Mercour, to annoy the Protestants, and not to suffer them to reape any commoditie in the country.

The Duke Mercour goes into base Poitou, besiegeth Montagu, repaired by Calum- biers, whom they of Nants had hourly at their gates. But at the first brute that the King of Nauarre was come out of Rochel to succour Montagu, hee retires straight to Nants, and left the regiment of Gersy, to make the attack, the which was ouertaken, beaten, and defeated two leagues from the suburbs of Nants. On the other side, the Duke of Mayenne marched towards Dauphine, but hee planted the limits of his voyage in Lions. Now are two mighty armies in field, the one vnder the Kings authoritie, the other of all Leaguers: But this is not enough. The King by a solemne oath in the Cathedral Church at Rouen, had sworn the execution of the Edict of vniou: hee hath sent vnto the Bishops, and commands them to presse the Huguenots in their Diocesse, to make profession of their faith, and to abiure their errors in open Parliaments, royall iudiciall sessions, and monasties.

This Edict must be confirmed as a fundamentall Law of State, and the King presb, to assemble the three Estates of the Realme, as he had promised by the Articles of the Peace. Henry grants a Conuocation the 1 day of September at Blois: there (in the presence of the notablest persons of euery Prouince, Senghalsie and Bayliuist, and propoundeth fully the

the complaints and griefes of euery man, but not meddling with any practices, or fauouring the priuate passions of any.

But amidst these Commissions from the King, the League wanted no policy to send secretly (to them that were most affectionate to the aduancement of their desires; and to the most passionate Leaguers of the Realme) Articles and remembrances which they should put into their instructions, and labour to bee chosen of the Parliament. So as in a manner all the Deputies carried the badge of the League, and their instructions were conformable to those which had been sent vnto them. The King comes first vnto Blois: hee gives order for the place, and for the Deputies lodgings. The D. of Guise follows: but it was a great indignation for the Duke to goe to Blois, seeing the King would not come to Paris. The Deputies come one after another: but the King finding not the number sufficient to begin so solemne an act, he defers it vntill October.

In the meane time, the King studies, by the credit which authoritie gives him ouer the three Estates of his Realme, to bring the Duke of Guise into open view, and to receiue punishment for all his offences past. And the Duke assures himselfe, that the most part of the Deputies would countenance his cause, and would serue him as instruments to controll the Kings power. So euery one labours to aduance his designe, and to deceiue one another: but hee which shall be deceiued, will verifie, that there is danger in delay. The 16 of October all the Deputies were ready, for the Clergy a hundred thirty and foure Deputies; amongst others foure Archbishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generals of orders: for the Nobility a hundred and fourecore Gentlemen: for the third estate, a hundred fourecore and eleuen Deputies, all Lawyers, or Merchants.

The 17 day, being the first sitting of the prime wits of all France, rauished euery man with hope to heare rare propositions, and resolutions of great affaires for the reformation of the state. The Kings oration being full of liuely affection, true magnanimity, and pertinent reasons, deliuered with an admirable eloquence and grace without any stay, will testifie for euer, that hee exceeded all the Princes of his age in speaking well, and that hee could grauely, pertinently, and very suddenly make answer to the most important occasions that were offered.

Mantelon, Keeper of the Seale, continued his Proposition, commended the zeale and integrity of his Maiesties intentions, promised the Estates, that vnder his happy command, they should reape in this Conuocation, the same effects which had bene tried in diuers reignes: he exhorted the Clergy to restore the beauty and dignity of the Church: The Nobility, to frame themselves after the mould of pietie, bounty, iustice, and other vertues of the French Nation, so much honoured in all histories: The people to reuerence iustice, and to obserue good orders, to fly wrangling suits, swearing, blasphemies, play, lust, vsury, vniust getting, corrupt trading, and other vices, which be the seeds of troubles, and seditions, and the ruine of flourishing Estates. Hee layes open the Kings great debts, his charge and care to root out heresies, his religion, piety and deuotion, ending his speech with a commendation, vnder the Kings obedience, of the vnion and concord, necessary for the maintenance of religion.

Renauld of Beaulne Archbishop of Bourges, Patriarke and Primar of Aquitania, thanked the King for his loue to his subjects, and God, to haue installed on the throne of this Crowne, a King endued from his youth, with the spirit of wisdom, to gouerne his people, who had cast the lightning of the high God, euen vpon the face of the enemies of his diuine Maiesty, hauing by diuers and dangerous voyages, through diuers Nations gotten the knowledge of affaires, who by his onely wisdom and vertue, had lately dispersed a great and mighty armie of strangers, and giuen vs hope, that vnder so good and great a King, we shall see heretofore suppressed, peace confirmed, the seruice of God established, Churches and Temples restored, iustice and peace embraced, charitie abound among men, and by vniuersity of Religion begin here on earth to reigne with Christ, the Idea and pattern of that heavenly kingdome, whereunto we aspire. The Baron of Senefei testified the Nobilities affection to the Kings seruice, confessing, that to him alone belongs to worke those good effects, for the establishment of the honour of God, the Catholike religion, things profitable for the Estate, and necessary for his people, offering in the name of them of his order, the zeale, faith, and duty, which the Gentlemen of France haue alwayes borne vnto their Kings, their armes, meanes, liues, and persons,

A to maintaine the obedience, honor, feare and respect, whereunto the lawes both of God and man tie the subjects to their Soueraigne.

Michel Moreau Prouost of the Merchants at Paris, President for the third estate, first thanked God, who had cast his eyes of pity vpon this Realme, in the extremity of their afflictions: then the King, to haue yeelded to the humble petitions of his subjects, heard their griefes and complaints, shewed a great desire to restore his people to their former estate, Religion to her former dignity, to rule and settle all orders in their ancient forme, being diuided by this iniury of times, protesting that in so doing their most humble and faithfull seruice should not falte vnto the last breath. And so the first sitting ended.

B In the second, The Tuesday following the King at the instance of the Archbishop of Ambrun, the Earle of Bisflac, and the Advocate Bernard, speakers for the three Estates, to content the importunity of the League, did againe sweare the oath of the Vnion, lately made at Rouen, and making his Edict of Iuly last, a fundamentall law of the Realme, to binde him, them, and all their posterity: (yet not derogating from the liberties and priuiledges of the Nobility) he caused it to be publicly read by Ruy Siegneur of Beaulieu his chiefe Secretary of State.

C And to make the memory of so solemne an oath more autentike to posterity, he commanded the said Secretary to make an act, that all the orders of the Realme had sworn in the body of the State, all with one voyce, the Clergy laying their hands vpon their breasts, and the rest lifting them vp to heauen. An oath performed with great ioy, and generally reuiuing of that happy acclamation of God (sane the King, so many yeares forgotten among the French nation: and followed with a singular testimony of the Kings clemency, remitting the Parisiens offence, for the common good of the Catholikes of France, and the ease of his people, whose miseries made him treade vnder foot his iust displeasure. Hold (saith he to the Prouost of Merchants of Paris) this word assured, as from the mouth of your King, and take heed that Paris fall not into a relapse, which will be fallall and not recoverable.

But there was a brute spread ouer all France, that vnder colour of this assembly, they practised an exemplary reuenge against the chiefe of the Estates. Advertisements came D from all parts: this feare went from chamber to chamber, the most apprehensiu desired to be satisfied. The Archbishop of Ambrun makes report vnto the King, I know (saith the King) the liberties and prerogative of the Parliament: they ought to trust in my word: it is as sinne to grow in zealousie of your King: and these reports come not but from such as haue no loue to their King, but seek to make him odious to his people. There shall neuer any cause grow from me to disturbe this Assembly. In the end, the familiarity and shewes of loue from the King to the Duke and Cardinall of Guise, and (for their sakes) to the chiefe of the League, made them lay aside all suspicion of a bloody act, whereof they were advertised from all parts. And without doubt, if the League had not stirred vp the colles of forepassed indignities, the fire of his wrath had not perchance deuoured them. This blast past E ouer, there are other attempts no lesse dangerous. The League sets them on worke that beares their badge, to hit the marke whereoe they aymed. To put the King in disgrace, and to install the duke of Guise in his throne, (for the King of Nauarre is now by this new fundamentall law, excluded from shewing all succession.) But what meane they to doe? The Colloffe they seek to build, shall be their ruine: the fire they kinde shall burne them: the knife they forge, shall be sheathed in their own bowels, and finally, shall keane of this League a shamefull and reproachfull memory. To his pretended marke, they must make the Kings actions odious to all the world, reproach to him his vnreasonable prodigality, his dissembling, the oppression of his people, the creating of new Offices: thereby to bandy against him the most apparent families of the third Estate, wronged in the suppression of them: or else (neglecting to redresse it) they should declare him an enemy F to the people, and a Tyrant ouer his Realme, and so the people should presently resolute to confine him into a Monastery.

They shew before him the wonderfull coldasse of the greatest part of the Catholikes to his loue and obedience, seeing themselves forced to liue amongst them that had burnt their Churches, prophaned their Altars, massacred the Priests, and spoiled their goods. They beseech him to defend the Church, and to prefer the injuries done to religion, before the violences committed against the Seate. They propound vnto him, the excessive excessive impositions and subsidies, which had already withdrawne most part of his subjects: and the filthy avarice of Strangers, who by continuall inuentions did cruelly impoverish France. They represent vnto him the abuses of the government, in bestowing benefices to all men indifferently, either married, or soldiers: the lust, dissolutenesse, and ignorance of Prelates: the sale of Offices and places of iudgment. They exhort him not to deale in spirituall causes, or at the least to proceed holily, as it belongs to holy things. To degrade a great number, as well of Prelates, as of ciuill Magistrates in Ioueraigne Courts and inferior iurisdiccions, and to punish with death those ministers which by corruption haue crept into the Church, Iustice and government, else he cannot preferre the Estate. In the end, they presse him to reforme the excess and disorders of his Court, the which are odious to so many Noble spirits; fraught with holiness, magnanimity and courage; to so many great and rich minds as be among the Nobility, which being employed, would in few moneths repaire the ruines of this Estate.

Such as finde themselves interested in the cutting off the superfluous number of Officers, and in the buying of their places, diswaide the King from this resolution, but to maintaine them in the honours which they enjoy vnder the countenance of his Maiesty. The third estate exhibit their complaints, of the excess of taxes and subsidies, where with they are oppressed, of the customes, forraigne impositions, rents vpon salt, entries, loane, gifts, increase and decrease of the prices of mony, with many other exactions and furcharges, whereof the King receiued not any benefit, but what was dipt in the blood of his poore people. The Nobility complaines of seruices done without recompence, and indiscreet distribution of the Kings liberality, The Clergy exclaime that mony which hath bene drawne from them, had nothing advanced the cause of religion.

From complaints of the languishing people, grew the suppression of Officers of the new creation, and an intent to ease their subsidies. But oh politike stratagem! The King yielding to haue them reduced to the year one thousand five hundred senenty six, fees himselfe deprived of all meanes to leaue his armies, and to entertaine the greatnesse of his Maiesties estate. If he refused it, an occasion is giuen to mutine the Estates, to chafe away such as are neere his person, and to grieve him a gouernour.

The D. of Guise on the one side, diswaides the King to subiect his authority so much, but on the other side, he prickes them forward to be vehement in their pursuits. In the end, the King passeth this grant of reduction: but hee hopes to make it knowne vnto the Estates, that with so small meanes he cannot maintaine his royall dignity, nor the warre against the heretikes, which they had so solemnly sworne. They deuise of meanes to make vp the stocke, and demand an account of such as had gouerned the treasure, and abused the Kings bounty. But whilst they turned ouer their papers at the Estates, let vs see the progresse of the two armies which wee had left in field. That of Neuers consisted of French, Swisses, and Italians, with many voluntary Gentlemen. Sagonne was Marshall of the light horse, la Chastre Marshall of the field, Chastaigneray, Lauerdin, and many others commanded the troopes. Mauleon was the first object of their armes. It is a rashnesse to be obtaine in the defence of a place which is not to bee held: but it is a treachery to let intreat them whom wee haue receiued to composition. So this first victory was bathed with their bloods, who trusting in the force of their courages, neglected the weaknesse of their walls. Montagu was defended some dayes by Colombiers, who at the first saluting the Duke with a furious skirmish, puts him to some losse. But the Cannon hauing both shaken their walls and their constancies, they entred into capitulation, the which was honorably granted the last day of November.

La Ganache, situated vpon the marches of Bekany and Poitou, annoyed both the one and the other Province. Let vs leaue the army there, to see how the Duke of Mayenne spends his time at Lions. The designs too lightly grounded vpon a peoples mutinie are alwaies ruinous. The Duke of Mayenne knows it well: and moreover, there is nothing but blowes to be gotten in Dauphine. Hee desires rather to attend the issue of the Estates in a pleasing and delightful abode: but this stay is a great scourge to Mandelot. Hee fears to be dispossessed of his government. It is giuen to the Duke of Nemours, and therefore hee wonderfully suspects the Duke of Mayennes presence. Finally, hee grew so ielous, as surprized with apprehension, with the cholicke, a fever, the gout, and the fluxe, hee carried (the foure and twentieth of November) this testimonie into the

A the ether world, by the mouth of father Edmond Auger, a Iesuite, in his funeral sermon. That he had neuer signed the league, & that he died firm in his religion, & in the Kings seruice.

Whilst the King laboured at the Parliament, to cut off all difficulties which prolonged the war, and the Duke of Mayenne being at Lions, suffered the heat of his passage into Dauphine to grow cold, Charles Duke of Sauoy foreseeing the dissipation of this Estate, he thought, that as a sonne and husband of two daughters, issued from the blood of France, he should be the first which should set his hand to the diuision. The Marquisate of Saluces is in the midst of his territories, he thinks, that for such a prize he may well break friendship and alliance with the King his near kinsman, who of mere courtesy he had newly deliuered vnto him Sauignan and Pignerol.

With this designe (seeing the Kings thoughts otherwise engaged then beyond the Alpes) he makes a leaue of men, threatens Genoue, makes a shew to besiege Montferrat, causeth the Marquis of S. Carlin to goe to horse, and on All-Saints night surpriseth the Towne of Carmagnole, and then the Citadell, being vnfurnished of victualls, which S. Siluic, successor to la Caste had drawne forth, with hope (said he) to refresh them: so as in lesse then three weeks he possessed all the Marquisate, leauing a reproachfull suspicion against the Captains of the Citadell, to haue treacherously exchanged the double Canons of that ancient arceual of the warres of France, beyond the Alpes, with the double pistoles of Spaine. This conquest made the Duke proud, and already in conceit hee had

C deuoured both Prouence and Dauphine. For a colour he writes both to the Pope and King: That the general respect of the Church had made him seize vpon these places, lest Des Dignities should make it a retreat and refuge for Huguenots: and the priuate interest of his Estates, which he desires to maintaine in the purity of the ancient religion, vnder the obedience of the holy Sea: and by his Ambassadour he disguiseth this wrong with the goodliest colours that may be. He makes a shew not to hold these places, but vnder the Kings authority: but in time hee vnrups all acts of Souerainety: hee displaceth his Maiesties officers, beates downe the Armes of France, sets vp the Croisse of Sauoy; and in a brauery hee causeth peeces of siluer to bee coyned with a Centaure treading a Crowne ouerwhelmed vnder his foot, and carrying this deuice; opportune. The King list-

D ly moued with this usurpation, applies this branch to the body of the conspiracies of the League, here hee solutes now to pacifie the ciuill wars, to attend after forraigne: and euen then he determines to giue the Protestants a peace, and to vlc their assistance against such as make a benefit of the disorders of the realme. Such as respected truly the glory of the French, gaue him to vnderstand that he must appeale both Huguenot and Ligueur, and seeke reuenge of this new indignity: and hunt the Wolfe which breaks into the fold, whilst the Shepheards are at variance. Shall a petty Prince take from a King of France, the pawne which remains to recouer Naples and Milan: foure hundred peeces of Cannon, which might beat the proudest Forts of the Spaniards to powder: that ancient fee of Dauphine, comprehended in the gifts which Prince Habert made to the Crowne of France whereof our Kings haue so often receiued homage & fealty of the Marqueses and haue often seized thereon for forfeiture and treachery?

E All the Kings seruants, all the Courts of Parliament, all the assembly of Estates, iudge that these be the effects of the League, and that this inuasion is not without the intelligence of the Duke of Guise: euen those which fauour his part cannot digest it. But to auoid this common hatred which was ready to fall vpon him, he beseecheth his Maiesty, onely to assure his people, and make them to taste the fruits of contentment; which hee had promised in the oath of the holy vniou, that he would quench the fire which the Huguenots did nourish in this realme, and giue him this Commission against the Stranger, he will be the first that shall passe the Alpes, to make the Sauoyard cast vp his gorge. But could they hope for any remedy from him, who by his continual practice with strangers, had giuen life and motion to the mischiefe? So the King, considering that neither his dict of reuolun, nor the oath to depart from all associations, produced the effects were promised: and that the League (continuing to the perniciou designs of the Stranger) had made the way for the breach of the said vniou, hee thinks himselfe no more bound to the oath of the vniou, and neuer was desirous to be reuenged of all the offences past. In the meane time hee dissembles his discontent.

As the Duke was about to depart from Lions, the King of Nauarre (seeing the practices of the League had excluded him, whereas he should hold the first place) held another in the Towne-house at Rochelle, and by their aduice he sent (in the name of the French exiled for religion) a common petition to the Estates, beseeching the King, To restore them the liberty of the first Edict, which they call of January; To appoint a Nationall Councell, where controversies of religion may be mildly disputed, and holily resolved; To grant them restitution, and free enioying of their goods; To suffer their Petition to be enrolled, and the contents thereof granted by his clemency, to the end that nothing may be done to their prejudice.

Nothing lesse. This petition was directly against the principal intentions of the Estates, effected to advance the League. And therefore not satisfied with the oath which the King had made vnto them by the Edict of Vnion, they wrest from the Kings owne mouth a more particular declaration, touching the perpetuall insufficiency of the King of Nauarre, and other Princes of the blood his cousins, adherents (say they) and fauours of Heretikes, to the succession of this Crowne.

The conclusion of this Parliament (should haue beene for the good quiet of the Common-weale. And doubtlesse some small number (whose wills were not tyed to the passions of the Leaguers) wished that remedie which had beene practised in former times against most pernicious heresies: which was a free and lawfull Councell, vniuersall or nationall: but the greater part ouer-ruled both the King and the Estates. The League, to ruine the State, will overthrow the pillars, which be the Princes of the blood, and if the branches of Valois and Bourbon, that is to say, if all the race of Saint Lewis be not degraded, they cannot passe ouer the Crowne to the family of Lorraine. The King by his Edict promisseth to dispose of the succession: but he and the Queene his wife are yet in the vigor of their age, they hope that God will blesse them with heires males. Hee takes no pleasure they should harpe vpon this string: it is a blemish to his authority, and dishonors him before he is ready to sleepe: when as a Prince hath named his successor, his testament is made.

Yet he is content to satisfie the violent appetites of the League. He suffereth them to dispute of the succession, and (in the assembly of all his subiects) to exclude the lawfull successor: he is content they should propound that which most part of the Deputies had already refused. The Clergie had the fourth of Nouember condemned the King of Nauarre for an Heretike, the chiefe of them relapse, excommunicate, deputed of the government of Guienne, and of all his dignities, vniuersity of all successions, Crownes, and Realmes. The Archbishop of Ambrun, the Bishop of Bazas, the Abbot of Cisteraux, and other Clergy men impart it to the Deputies of the Nobility and third Estate: all consent to the first conclusion, and appoint twelue of every chamber to acquaint the King with their resolutions.

But the King of Nauarre had often giuen them to vnderstand, that he was borne during the permission of both religions, instructed and bred vp in one from which hee cannot in conscience depart without better instruction: neither hope nor despaire of a Crowne can draw him to so violent and rash a change: hee should thereby incur the blame of inconstancie, infidelity, and hypocrisie: hee is, and alwaies will bee ready to receiue instruction from a free and lawfull Councell. These submissions are full of iustice and consideration: he defends nothing obstinately, it is the honesty and zeale of his conscience that binds him. There is no reason then (said the King) to condemn him without hearing. Let vs consider with iudgement and fore-sight, whether it be expedient to summon him againe to sweare the Edict of Vnion, & to declare himselfe a Catholike.

The Parliament is not of this aduice. The Cardinall of Bourbon his Vnckell (by the Deputies) hath once obtained absolution for him: the Queene mother hath laboured to win him: the King hath sent Doctors to reclaim him: he is bred vp from his Cradle in this new opinion, condemned by the Councell of Trent and many others. The Consistory hath receiued him into grace, he is fallen into the error which he had abandoned: it is therefore an Heretike: he is relapse, and unworthy of obedience, vniuersity of respect, and worthy to be prayed for. The holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schismaticke, excommunicate, incapable of the succession of the Crowne: the Estates therefore must ratifie this sentence. To conclude, an Heretike cannot raigne in France, it is an incompatible thing with the Coronation and oath which he ought to take, hurtfull to the honor

A of God, and preiudiciall to the good of this Realme, Soft and faire, Nature and the common consent of Nations will, that the accused should be heard, God himselfe, who hath no need to be satisfied by humane witnesses, and is not bound to any iurisdiction, would not condemn our first father before he called him into iudgement, examined him, checked and reposed him, and heard his excuses. Heate then the King of Nauarre, he may say vnto you, that the Pope by surprise hath noted him of heresie: he knoweth not yet any other truth then that wherein the Queene of Nauarre hath bred him. If hee hath at any time yeelded vnto the force and violence of the time, he had not then his will free, and as soone as opportunity gaue him meanes to retire from Court into his Country of Bearne, he stamed his helpe to the modell of that which had bene prescribed him: but protesting alwaies to the Estates and Parliaments of France, that he hath no greater desire in his soule, then to see the seruice of God vntied vnder one religion, by the meanes of a free and lawfull assembly of the vniuersall Church, or a nationall Councell of the French Churches. The Deputies notwithstanding (especially the Clergie) will allow of no reason. They are for the most part transported with passion, and apprehend nothing but what may advance the league. If the King rescindeth this article, the Duke of Guise will dissolve the Estates, and lay all the blame vpon his Maiesty. Hee hath so well provided for his affaires, as he holds himselfe master of the Castle of Blois, and of the Kings person. There is neither gate, hall, chamber, nor cabinet, but the keyes are at his pleasure. He hath great forces ready. He checks them that speake not to his liking: their voyces and consents are forced in the Parliament-house: he puts in, and puts out, & doth what he pleaseth. Those whom the King and Parliaments hold insupportable, finde access and support with him. To conclude, let the first Princes of the blood, the first of the most ancient and most famous house that doth at this day weare a Crowne, the first of that royal branch of Bourbon, which only remains after so many sisters and cousines of Anjou, Angouleme, Berry, Bourgonne, Angoulême, and Orleans, and which only succeeded that of Valois, deputed of the right which nature hath giuen him, without calling him, or hearing his iustifications. The clergie saies, hee ought to be no more cited, his heresie, his incapacity to the Crowne is apparant. The Bishop of Chalons in Champagne deliuereth this conclusion to the Nobility. The Bishop of Cominge, to the third Estate: and the Archbishop of Ambrun to the King, to make a law thereof: and then followed the last and lamentable act of the Tragedy of a dispossessed King.

But oh men! the Eternall looks on you, and laughs at your counsels: he now comes vpon the stage to act his part, and to bring forth effects far from his thoughts. The King is aduertised from all parts of a great conspiracy against his Maiesty. The Duke of Epernon assures him by letters. The Duke of Mayenne (zealous it may be of his brothers greatness) aduertiseth his Maiesty from Lions, by a Knight of honour: and the Duke of Aumale, from Blois it selfe by his owne wife, that the Duke of Guise had very pernicious designs: that the houre of the execution did approach: that they resolved to seize on him and to lead him to Paris.

These aduertisements kindle a new courage in the King, he means to preuent him, and discouers his minde to foure, whom he knowes as faithfull to his Maiesty, as enemies to the damnable projects of the League. He must suppress this new law in the East, whom the people worshipped already. The present necessity will not suffer him to bring him forth in view: the Popes respect retaines him: his oath to protect the Estates makes him irresolute: the troubles which this execution will cause in people disposed to the league, makes him doubtful: yet he must die. He hath no quality in France but of a simple subiect: and yet without the Kings authority, consent or sufferance, he hath built a league, had intelligence with the stranger, leaped men of warre, armed vpon towres, and broken the publicke peace.

He continueth his practices, against the oath of the Edict of Vnion, with the Cardinall Morisne, Legate to the Pope, and Don Inigo de Mendoza, Ambassadour of Spaine. He confirms his priuate confederations with the Governors of revolted towne. He publisheth by his declarations, that he hath not taken arms, but for Gods sake and the Kings seruice: and yet by the surprize of so many towne, hee hath hindered the advancement of the Kings army in Guienne against the Huguenots. The object of his amerie is the safety and religion of the Catholikes, and to deuide the King of Nauarre of all hope of succession to the Crowne: and in the meane time it appeares, that hee hath fought the loue of the King of Navarre: he hath promised to give him his sonne in hostage, and to meet him with feuentene Princes of his house at the river of Loire, to serve him, and make him King of France. Many letters intercepted discouer, that after his Maiesties pardon of many capital crimes, he renues his designs against the King and his estate. The surprize of the Marquise of Salustiers by his intelligence. Hee disgraceth the Kings actions, hee blames him to haue vnwillingly made war against the Huguenots: to haue sold the said Marquise, that vnder colour of recouering it, he might diuert the war against the Hereticks. In stead of reducing the townes held by the Huguenots, he keeps his Capitaines and men of war at Blois, vpon assurance of a profitable change. He hath caused bookes to be printed in fauor of the lawfull succession of the house of Lorraine to the Crowne:

At the Barricadoes this voice was heard: It is no longer time to dally, let vs lead my Lord to Rheims. He hath suffered himselfe to be saluted by the people, with cries and acclamations which belong onely to the Soueraigne Prince. He hath vaunted that he was able to take the King prisoner, or to do worse although he entred but with eight horses into Paris being assured of the force and wills of the Citizens: he hath seized on the places of strength within Paris, made Gouvernors, Magistrats and Officers at his pleasure: he hath corrupted the Estates, as the Deputies speake not but by his mouth: they produce nothing but what hath bene first examined in his Councell. Many cry out that hee flatters C too long before he strikes. Hee speakes no more but in termes of a Soueraigne, with pride, disdain, and threats: he hath refused to subscribe the Edict which the King would publish in cases of treason: he doth already seale Letters-patents with his great Seale: he forbids the Commons to giue victuals or munition to such Companies as the King had sent vnto them. There remains no more but to confirme in his person that ancient greatness sometimes usurped by the Masters of the Palace: and to deale with the King as Charles Martel had done with Chilperic. In the end they represent vnto the King the processe of Saluado, a party in his conspiracie; the counsellors of Nancy, and of Paris in Lent last, whereof the chiefe point was: To seize vpon the King: the instructions of the Advocate David: the letters of the Queen Dowager of Denmarke to the D. of Lorraine D der sonne: the attempt of the Barricadoes, and (to heape vp the measure) the practices, corruptions, and violences done by the Duke of Guise to the Estates. The like and lesse crimes haue in former ages brought more famous heads then the Duke of Guises to the blocke. The leaguers and practices of an Earle of Harcourt, of a Constable of S. Paul, of a Duke of Nemours, haue brought them to shamefull ends.

Pope Sixtus, now liuing, hath of late put to death the Earle of Popoli of the noblest families of Italy, onely for that he had concealed some banished men in his house. The D. of Guise himselfe did of late pursue with all violence the disobedience of the D. of Anjou. His Holinesse hath beleueed, that religion was the onely motiue of the Duke of Guises armes. The Barricadoes, with the vsurpation of the Bastile, and Bois de Vincennes haue made him to change his beleefe. Hee himselfe hath laid vnto the Bishop of Paris, that the fact was too bold, that the Estate is interested, and that the offence is irreconcilable. Hee hath written vnto the King, aduising him to assure himselfe of the Estates, as at what price soeuer: that in such imminent dangers, he must seeke out all extraordinary remedies: and vpon this consideration he granted the King a Confessor to absolve him of all, reseruing the matter to the holy See.

Objections.

Yea, but the Estates are vnder the Kings oath and protection. Without doubt an oath was neuer broken without repentance. But how is the Soueraigne bound to his subiect, who by rebellion hath violated his oath to his Prince? Necessity forceth the law: great punishments of Rebels haue bene often done in great assemblies. The Kings of England and Poland do practise it well, and our Charles hath died his Sisters nuptials with more blood then wine. Moreover, the D. of Guise hath great credit with the people of France. It is true, but his party hath no credit but with the multitude, the which is a very moveable and an inconstant foundation. Men of account, Townes, Governours, and the Kings Officers mutine not, but by means of the multitude, and seeing him fallen that gaue motion to their rebellion, they will containe themselves. My Liege, say they who feare lest this violent counsell which they gaue him in so violent necessity should bee discouered

A the Duke of Guise will surprize you. They haue already published in Paris, that this is your Climatricall yeare: they shew forth the razor that shall shauo you: they demand how long they shall suffer you to liue in a Cloyster. The lightning goes before the thunder: the guilt of treason is extraordinary in the head: so the punishment goes before the instructions and formes of Iustice. One must punish the offender, and then informe of the offence. The mildest Common-weales, most polittike, and greatest enemies to rigor, held alwayes, That whereas the estate is in danger, they may begin with the execution. In the end, the King is satisfied, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigor of his reuenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition. By the Kings countenance, or some words let slip by some one of the foure, they find in danger to continue long at the Estates. But the more the Duke of Guise enters into discoussi, the more the Kings good countenance disswades him. And the Archbishop of Lion attending a Cardinalls haue within a few dayes from Rome: retyring your selfe from the Estates (said he vnto him): you shall beare the blame to haue abandoned France in so important an occasion, and your enemies making their profit of your absence, will some ouerthrow all that which you haue with so much paine effected for the assurance of Religion.

Man doth often lose his iudgement vpon the point of his fall. Aduertisements were come to him from all parts, both within and without the Realme: from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine and Saouoy, that a bloody Catastrophe would discolore the Assembly. The Almaines had well obtruded it: it was generally brayed in the Estates, that the execution should be on S. Thomas day. The eue before his death, the Duke himselfe sitting downe to dinner, found a seroule vnder his napkin, aduertizing him of his secret imbush. But (as ambition blinds those whom she had raised vp to the Pies nest, and the fury of Gods iudgements confounds such as trust in their authority) he wrote vnderneath with his owne hand, They dare not: and threw it vnder the table.

The Duke of Guise following the counsell of the Cardinall Mefin, had the one and twentieth of December incensed the King anew, by some bold & presumptuous speeches: My Liege (said he) seeing I find that the affaires decline from bad to worse, and that those things which seemed curable, are growne desperate, I beseech your Maiesty to receiue D againe the charge you haue committed vnto mee, and giue me leaue to retire myselfe. He spake this, to the end that by this discontent he might take an occasion to dissolve the Estates, and bringing the King into an extreme haire with his subiects, he might play the last act of his long fore-plotted Tragedy. The King had the 22 day following, prepared seven of his five and forty (they were Gentlemen whom he had appointed to be next his person, besides the ordinary Archers of his guard) to execute his will, and by many dispatches had assured those townes which he held to be most iurious. The 23 he assembled his Councell somewhat more early in the morning then was usually: hauing a decoration, to goe after dinner, and to spend the holy dayes at our Lady of Clercy. The Cardinalls of Vendome, Guise, and Gondy, the Archbishop of Lion, the Marshalls of Amoult, E and Retz, the Lords of d'O, Rambouillet, Maignan, Marcell and Petreuelle Superintendants of the Treasore, were assembled. The Duke of Guise came, and attending the beginning of the Councell, sends for an handkercher: (the groomer of his chamber had forgotten to put one into his pocket.) Pericay, his Secretary, not daring to commit this new aduertisement to any mans report, eyes a note at one of the corners thereof, saying Come forth and see your selfe, else you are but a dead man. But they say the page that carried it with all speed by S. Prix the chiefe Groomer of the Kings chamber. The Castle gates are shut, and the Councell sits about eight of the clocke.

The spirit of man doth often prophesie of the mischance he doth pursue him so wilfully. F they dispute of a matter propounded by Perreuilles, the Duke seales strange alterations, and extraordinary dis temperatures, and amidst his distrust, a great fainting of his heart. S. Prix presents vnto him some prynces of Brigadoes, and rayns of the Sun. Hee rises, and thereupon the king calls him into his cabinet by the name of the Secretaries of this sitting as it were to confer with him about some lesser or importunite. The duke leaues the Councell to passe vnto the Cabinet: and as he did lift vp the tapestry with one hand to smee they charge him with their swords, daggers and poniards, yett not with compassiollence, but he shewes the murderers the last sentence of an inuincible valor and courage. Thus

Thus lived, and thus died Henry of Lorraine, Duke of Guise: a Prince worthy to be in A the first ranks of Princes, goodly, great, tall of proportion, amiable of countenance, great of courage, ready in the execution of his enterprizes, popular, dissembling, but covering the secrets of his mind with his outward behaviour, embracing all times and occasions, politicke in stratagems, making much of his souldiers, and honoring his Captaines. But a Prince who hath blemished the greatest beauty of his praises by extreame ambition, fatious, a great bragger, vaine in beleiving of Sooth sayers, who assured him of his greatness, and of the change of his family into a Royall; proud, not able to submit his hopes, even to those from whom he should hope for his advancement, giving men to understand by his inclination, that he was not borne to obey, but to command, and with this designe he framed the minds of the French, by his first actions, to beleieve that he had parts fit to make a strange alteration in a Realme, But let vs apply that great diuine Oracle, and tremble at the apprehension of the horror of Gods iudgements: For this cause will I destroy thee in the end: thou wilt put thee out of thy tabernacle, and thy root out of the land of the living. The high shalt scite and feare, and shall laugh at him, saying: Behold the man that hath not taken God for his ayde and succor, but hath trusted to the multitude of his riches, and hath fortified himselfe in vanity.

At the noise hereof, the Cardinall of Guise (being amazed) recouers the doore to goe away. Lurcheant flayes him with the Archbishop of Lion, and lodgeth them in a little chamber about the Kings lately built for Capuchins and Fenitants. The Cardinall in the heart of this tumult casts forth some words, which hee would neuer have delivered being well aduised: They report it vnto the King. The Kings commands La Basside and Valency, being both of the five & forty, to kill him. The first excuseth himselfe, the other accepts the charge, and accompanied with sixe others, goes to the Cardinals chamber, to make him a companion of his brothers death: but being ready to doe the execution, I know not what cold apprehension quenched this heat, which had moued him to bathe his hands in the blood of so great a Prelate without respect of his Order.

The Cardinall of Bourbon, the Duchesse of Nemours (mother to the Duke of Guise), the Duke of Nemours her sonne by the second marriage, the Prince Ginville now Duke of Guise, and the D. of Elbeuf had at the same instant guards appointed them, to be assured of their persons. Pericard being kept prisoner, discovered all the practices of the League, and by the instructions he had in his keeping, he informed the King at large of all his matters designs: The Earle of Brisac, Bouillon, and some other Gentlemen (faithfull to the Duke of Guise) the President Newly, and Præuost of Merchants at Paris, Compan and Catelanche, Sherifes of the said towne, and Le Roy Lieutenant of Amiens, were put in prison: the rest stayed neither for boots nor spurs to dislodge.

A Justice Secretary to the Duke of Mayenne, and son-in-law to Armonville Maior of Orleans, had already by speciall posts, aduertised his master of what had past: and so practiseth them of Orleans, as Entragues coming from Blois to be assured of the towne, found a generall renouell: Doubtlesse the Inhabitants were inclined to the Kings obedience, if before he would have granted them, at their humble sute, another Governour at his Maisties choice then him, who at the first had hinged them, and afterwards by his wilfulness suffered them to runne into the Labyrinth of Rebellion. It is good to yeeld something to a mutinous multitude, and not to thrust them into despair. The execution done, the King carries newes thereof to the Queene-mother. Madame (saith he) I will hereafter reigne alone, I thinke no more companions. She answered him, God grant my sonne it fall out well for you: but haue you given order to shew the towne where the name and memorie of the Duke of Guise hath credit and authority. This unexpected speech did wonderfully moue the Queene-mother, birth of the Cardinall of Bourbon gave her a deadly wound. Madam (saith he, the coming to visit him being a prisoner and sicke) you haue brought us to slaughter. She excusing her selfe that she had neither consented nor given countenance to this action, left the Cardinall doubling his complaints, and transported with griefe, he died the six of January following. At night they draw the Cardinall and the Archbishop from their Chamber, to lodge them in a straiter and more obscure place, and to passe the night, whilst that the King (with-held by the consideration of the quality of a Prelate, a Prince of France, Archbishop of Reims, Cardinall at Rome, and President of his Order at the Estates) could either of his execution or free-

A dome from prison. But Iustice hath no respect of persons: and treason is a worse pre-ident in a Cardinall then in a simple Priest. Moreover, the Cardinall might haue been in his brothers credit, and his threats seemed dangerous if hee liued longer. So the King gives Captaine Gast commission to kill him. He craves pardon: but 400 Crowns doe easily find four ministers for the execution. The Archbishop had his life saved, at the humble sute of the Baron of Lux his vncle. The King loved this Gentleman, and pretended to draw from the Prelate all the Quintessence of the league. The punishment of these two freed the King of Nauarre from being the cause of the misery of these ciuill waies, seeing the King had thereby, not the first author of these troubles. But this Prince was neuer seene without a singular constancy in his greatest crosses, nor an admirable modesty in his highest prosperities. He vnderstands of the death of two of his mightiest enemies, and would gladly haue seene the Kings wrath and forces turned against the house of Lorraine, whereby he might make his profit in France by the fall thereof, and apply it to his advantage. But Noble minds neuer looke on their enemies head, but with a heavy and mournfull countenance. He lamented not so much the death but the misery of them of Guise: and yet continues his enterprize which he had vpon Niort, and the 24 of December, vnder the conduct of S. Gelin, Parabel, Harambure, Ranques, Preau, Valieris, and others, he forced & scaled the towne being amazed, and spoiled it, without any slaughter but of five and twenty, or thirty men, no railing of women, nor injury to the Clergy. The same day he receiued the Castle by composition from Malicorne, furnished with five great Cannons, and two very long Caluerins; with the which the Lieutenant of the towne, a wicked and a turbulent man, vanted (when they were cast) to salute the King when he approached the walles of Niort. But the great fury of the victors armes, hauing flaine him in the beginning of the fight, was the cause he made not an exemplary compensation for the outrage and the vaworthy speeches hee had vsed against the said King and the Princes of the blood.

The Duke of Nevers, on the other side, battered Ganache, and the fourth of February (having spent 800 cannon-shot) he made two breaches, and gave an assault, with the holle of about 300 men, and growing resolute in this conquest, whilst his honor was engaged, he lets Plessigette, Captaine of the place, vnderstand that he had won reputation enough in the defence of so weake a place, that his obsequy should preiudice the King of Nauarres affairs: that the King by the execution done at Blois, had sufficiently declared was against the league, and that he meant to employ the said Kings forces against them. Plessigette aduertiseth the King his master: he marcheth to succor him, but his violent trauell on foot to get him heat in an extreme cold season, made him stay dangerously sicke at a feuer at S. Perre, as the newes of his death was carried to Court. So Plessigette yielded vp the towne, his armes and baggage (sued. But this royall army came to nothing: the Duke went to refresh himselfe at his house, wauncing some months doubtfull of his party: and the king of Nauarre (whom God would vs in so confused a time, to bring him vpon the Theater, nor as a disinherited child, according to the iarent of the Estates, but to reach men that their struing is in vaine against the decrees of his diuine providence) hauing recovered his perfect health, assured himselfe of the places neere vnto Niort, S. Maixant, Maletaye, Chastelleraut, Loudun, Lille Boucard, Mirbeau, Fumonne, and others, pretending to doe the King some great and notable seruice.

The King by this blow had amazed, but not suppressed the league. He had begun well for the warranty of his Estate, but he must neede doe things by halves. In stead of going to horse making his armes to glister, shewing himselfe betwixt Orleans and Paris; calling backe his army out of Poitou, to oppose against the attempts of the duke of Mayenne, and (being armed, and the towne amazed at this great effect) to disperse the mischief which oppressed him within few moneths, hee returns to his first remedies, being soft and feartfull, against a mad multitude, hee is content to send wordes, whereas his swordes already entered into sedition: he releases some prisoners whom hee held last dangerous, continues the Estates, renues the Edict of Union, and by a general forgetting of what was past, thinks they will lay downe their armes against him, to employ them against the King of Nauarre. But a multitude grows mad with rebellion, and is remained impotent. The King finds, that in less then six weeks, Towns and Princes are in the hands of those Princes that were under his obedience. And what hee thought to begin at now ceaseth ceaseth to raigne. So God, who laughed at the vaine attempts of the one, will likewise A heape vpon the other, remedies no lesse violent then those he had practised.

Now many awaked from their amazement, began to stir: the people studied of new mutinies and new armes. Orleans shut vp their gates: the towne made barricadoes at gainst the Cittadel: Paris shewed the fury of their mutiny against the Louvrie, they beat downe the Kings armes, imprison his seruants, and swell by their ranfomes and spoile as by a voluntary contribution, they leauy a great sum of money for the war. Marteau, Gotschall, Compagnon, Reland and others (deliuered vpon promises to reclaime the Parisiens) had contrariwise seduced the people. The sixtene Tribunes (let vs know them by their names, euen as they are set downe in an oration made by the Bourgeois of Paris to the Cardinall Casimir la Bruyere, Cruci, Buffe le Clerc, the Commissary Louchard, Merlier, Schaals, the Commissary de Bari, Drouart an Aduocate, Aluequin, Emennot, Lablier, Mas- fier, Passart, Oudineau, Tellier, and Marin a Proctor of the Chastelet (euery one of which had many Agents and followers) like sixtene furies, coming out of hell, sharpened their weapons; and kindled the coales of murder and dissolucence, first at Paris, and then in a manner in all the good townes of the Realme, being seasoned with the leuaine of these furious Tribunes. The Preachers (hire-brands of these furies) came not into the pulpit, but to powre forth reproaches, and iniuries against the King, and by an liade of curses to kindle the peoples minds to rebellion. The people came neuer from their sermons, but hauing fire in their heads, readinesse in their feet to runne, and disposition in their hands, to fall tumultuously vpon such as were not branded with the marke of the league.
 He was neither a good nor a zealous Catholike that had not a bed-rowle of our-rages to detest and abhorre that execution of Blois.

The porters at the Palace babled nothing, but a cursing of the Kings life: an Elegy to lament the calamity of these two brethren; an Oration in memory of the commendable exploits of the Duke of Guise in Hungary against the Turke, at Iarnac against the Protestants at Poitiers, at Montcontour against the Reistres of Thorez, at Vimory & at Auneau.
 They cried aloud at Paris that France was now sicke, and could not be cured but by gi-uing her a drinke with the blood of France. And because they haue got the body at their deuotion, those things hee possesseth must suffer for it: his furniture at the Louvre, his pictures are broken, his armes beate downe; his Images dragged vp and downe, his great scale defaced: they call him impietous, vniuill, villaine, prophane, tyrant, damned. The Col-ledge of Sorbonne concludes by a publike act of the tenth of Ianuary, That the people of France are freed from the oath of obedience and fealty which they ought to Henry of Valois:
 and that lawfully, and with a good conscience they may arme against him, rescine his reuen-ues, and imploy it to make warre against him.

On the other side, Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne, dreaming on his brothers death, provided for the assurance of his owne life, & consulted with the Archbishops Of-ficiall, the Lord of Senefall of Lienneois, and some others of the chiefe, whether there were any safety for him within their towne. We are (said they) bound vnto the King before all others. Make no trial (we pray you) of your seruants, in that which shall be contrary to the Kings will. Arme not vpon your selfe against him: without doubt hee will seeke your seruice, when you shall submit the passion of reuenge vnto reason, and will aduance your house to the good of all France, the which trembles with apprehension of the calamities which this warre shall cause. If the people call you, to set them at liberty, you shall abandon them to the spoile: and to defend the Monarchy against the King, you shall make your selfe the head of a confused and monstrous Anarchy. God did neuer forget the protection of Kings against their malicious subjects. They bee the Images of God, the children of heauen: and whoeuer armes against them, armes against heauen.
 Moreover, the winde of the peoples fauour; may for a time fill your sailles, and carie you designs violently to sea, but they are inconsistent, light, and dissolay. And if they haue shaken off the yoke of dutifull obedience and loue to their King: what shall they doe to a Prince, whom they shall not be bound, but as to the Protector of their mutinies?

They spake truly, for after the trial of all sorts of government, France must in the end returne to her royallty, and the Duke (by a commendable resolution) might haue vnted the wounds which his brother had diuided. But when as others represent vnto him the aduan-tage he should haue to succeed in the fauour, credit, and authority of his brother, and by Parisians inconsole.

A consequence his owne hopes: hee reiects the integrity of the first counsell: confutes all the friends of his house to reuenge, parts from Lions on Christmas day: in his passage he assures himselfe of Macon, Chalons and Dijon. The Court of Parliament there, refused to consent to this rebellion, and therefore the chiefe were driuen away, and some imprisoned: others (apprehending the losse of their commodities) did easily submit their neckes to the yoke of a new Democracy. At Dijon he receiued letters from the King, promising to surcease the punishment of forepassed faults, with the death of his brethren; whom (said he) I haue caused to die, to saue my life from the danger whereof you did aduertise me. The Duke (attributing the Kings clemency to some weak and abiection, proceeding from feare, either to haue him his enemy, or to lose his friendship) growes obstinate in his resolution, reiects the Kings Officers, giues commission to Rohé, Saint Paul, and others, to command in Champagne and Brie, and to seize vpon the best places: hee comes to Troyes, where the towne (long before corrupted by the infected humors of the league) receiued him with as great honor as they could haue done their King: and in all places where he passed, they were easily drawne into rebellion, all townes framing themselues after the modell of Paris and Orleans.

Three thousand men sent from Paris, to succor the Cheualier d'Aumale (besieged in Orleans by the Marshall of Aumont, with the Nobility of the Court, some troopes of foot and horse, and the Kings guards) had bene defeated neere vnto Estampes, by Fargu and Montigni: but the Marshall vnderstanding of the Duke of Mayennes approach, raised the siege, and retires to Boigny. In the meane time, the King himselfe in person did view and examine the conclusions of the Estates: but this sudden enterprize of the Dukes, made him to leaue the worke imperfect, and to prouide for the safety of his person: and for a conclusion, the fifteenth and sixteenth of Ianuary, he heard the Deputies griefe and complaints vpon the disorders which afflicted France.

The Archbishop of Bourges, President for the Clergy after the Cardinals death, in-tured the cause of our miseries to contempt of Religion, which breaking the bonds that tie vs vnto God, had in like sort diuided the hearts and wils of families and commonalties.
 He greatly commended the Kings zeale to Religion: insisted long vpon the abuses of the Church, which the corruption of the time had bred: the vnworthy promotion of Prelats: the nomination (to Abbates, and other spiritual dignities) of all sorts of persons, souldiers, ignorant men, suborned men; guardians, slymoniake, women, and children; touching the alienation of the Clergy lands, plurality of benefices, vlturpation of there-uenues of Hospitals, dep rauation of that goodly ancient order, whereby none might come vnto Commanderies of the order of the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, vnlesse he were a Gentleman of three descents: disorders of Vniuersities and Monasteries, in former times the nurseries of holy Fathers. Then he turned his discourse to the disorders noted in the Nobility of France, who were in former ages the terror of all nations, and from whom neighbour nations confesse to haue learned the exercise and profession of Cheualry: vpon the excesses of men of war: vpon the wasting of the treasure, and other disorders which spring from these first heads: finally, he beseeched the King, to make a good reformation, whereby his people should multiply, Iustice should daily flourish, and peace should be set in the Realme.

Charles of Cofse Earle of Brissac, chiefe Panter and chiefe Fauconer of France, newly restored to fauour, and President for the Nobility, (shewes that they be not the hands of Fortune, which enuironed his Maiesties fore-head with this double Diadem. It is God, who hath established him our King, who had before chosen him King of a more remote nation, for the piety, faith, clemency, and magnanimity wherewith he hath bene indued from his tender age. That heresie, schisme, and discord, which are crept into the peoples hearts, haue not taken their beginning vnder his reign, whom God hath raised vp amidst the furies and afflictions of France, to be reuenged by him, and aduanced aboue and rage of those, who (after so many religious ages) have violated the sepulchres of their fathers and ours, and would take from amongst vs that onely religion which the holy fathers have planted in old time throughout the world.

Then having represented the zeale and affection of the Nobility to assist the King, to restore Religion, and the State to their former beauty, following the example and the hereditary vertue of their Ancestors, who had chased and vanquished the Gothes, Vandales, Arriens, Albigeois, Lombards, Sarazins, Turkes and Pagans: and continuing the defence of the faith, and the victories of the French Kings, have left no other limits to the reputation of their valor, then those which the Sunne takes in making of his course about the earth. He beseecheth his Majesty, to fauour the ancient priuiledges of the Nobility, to recompence in them the seruices to their Predecessors: to confirme the military discipline of Kings his fore-runners: not to suffer any by fauour or purchase, to challenge the title of Gentlemen: to maintaine the priuiledges of the Knights of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, to cut off the superfluities in Iustice: to moderate the subsidies: order the treasure, establish the Magistrature, plant discipline among souldiers, reforme the Church, and to punish the enemies thereof. Finally, he wished a thousand happinesse to the King, and peace to his people. But this braue and commendable humor shall not hold him long, but he shall returne to his first party, by a new detection.

The Advocate
Bernard.

Bernard Advocate of the Parliament of Dijon, began his oration with a solemne thanks for the Kings promise, fully to execute the Edict of the Vnion: he exhorted all the townes and subjects of the Realme, to vntie themselves not only in religion, but also in good correspondency for the Kings seruice, continuation of his dignity, and defence of the estate. He discouered all the other infirmities of this polittike body, the which (besides the vice of partialities) haue strangely corrupted it: as Blasphemies, Adulteries, Vitchecraft, Simony, outrage in souldiers, inuention of subsidies, and new Edicts, executors of extraordinary Commissions, Brokers, and buyers of Offices, who waste the treasure, and bring the people to beggery. An inuective against so many Edicts registered with this Apostill: *By commandements many times reiterated: seeing that in good and iust Edicts, the Soueraign Princes command is not necessary: against the treasure ill employed, and the strange oppressions of France. Then requiring a conclusion of the Estates, he beseeched his Majesty to open the eyes of his wisdom for the ease of his poore people: not to change his godly resolutions: and to dismiss the Deputies, considering the mutinies that were in their Prouinces: to goe and make proofe (said he) of the effects of their good wills. But these wills were for the most part subiect vnto those that (vnder a goodly shew of waire for religion and the publike good) studied of nothing but rebellion, cruelty, treacherie, trouble, and confusion. Thus the Estates ended, and the King fore-seeing the extreme oppression of his subjects, in so great a leauy of armes, abates the fourth part of their subsidies, and sent to all the Prouinces, to assure them of his good intent. But his subjects were too much affected to mutinies, too capable of disobedience, too ready to spoile the wife and the rich. The mourning of the Duchesses of Guise, Nemours, and Montpensier, being set at liberty by the King, to bind them to bee intercessors to his rauenous people: the furious cries of Boucher, Guarin, Cuzill, Rons, Pelletier, Guineestre, Hamilton, Christin, Lucain, Maulestre, Camolet, Feruand, and other such Preachers (very fire-brands of sedition) the persuasions of the Proud of Merchants, of the Sheriffes of Paris, and other Magistrates of townes, freely released by the King: had too wickedly seduced them. But the Duke of Mayenne arrivall at Paris, confirmed the Labaranters more in the execution of the foresaid decree of Sorbonne.*

Parliament at Paris, imprison-
ned.

This decree (quite contrary to those by which this College hath so often commendably withstood the vnde and violent proceedings of the Court of Rome, against the Estate of this Realme) could not take effect, whilst that Maiestical and reuerent Parliament, the true guardian of this Crowne, had either some authority. So one of the fixtence, Buffy le Clerc a poore petty lawyer, lately much honoured, being admitted to present himselfe bare-headed upon his knees before this excellent assembly, followed by some of his acquaintance and companions, and a band of armed souldiers, entered the fixtenth of January, armed with a Cuirasse and a Pistoll in his hand, into the great Chamber, with an intent to carry away the first President De Harbey, and the other Presidents and Councellors, who persisting in the fidelity of their charge, might cross the mad and fatal designe of

A of the league. The whole body ashamed to see themselves dismembred by this insolent and presumptuous attempt, followed their head. Buffy then leads them away all, in triumph, two and two, prisoners to the Bastille and Louvre. Such as were Royalists were kept there, the rest (which leaned to this popular fury) preferred their houses from the spoile which this Tribune had pretended, and were sent home. Some aduertised of this new Commission, saved their persons, but not the confiscation of their goods and retenuances. That man was happy that found a friend where to hide himselfe, or that could get away disguised in his seruants weeds, and so march many daies on foot to recover Tours, or some other place of the Kings obedience. All diuine and humane Lawes were subuerted, B. respect of equity abolished, and the reuerence of publike authority defaced. The Officers of the Parliament being enlarged, giue the place of the first President to Barnabé Brisson: then they make a declaration in manner of an oath, for the entertainment of the vnion. The Princes of Loraine and many gentlemen sweare vnto it, the fixtence subscribe it, one amongst them prickt himselfe in the arme, to signe it with his owne blood: but remaining lame thereby, he was mockt by his companions.

The people made a general counsell of the vnion, consisting of forty chioise men of the three Estates, the which was confirmed by the Parliament, to dispose of the publike affaires, and to confer with the Prouinces & townes of the League. For the Church, Brecht Bishop of Meaux, Rozé Bishop of Senlis, Villas Bishop of Agen, Prenost Curat of S. Seuerin, Boucher Curat of S. Bennet, Aubry Curat of S. Andrews, Pelletier Curat of S. James, Pignat Curat of S. Nicolas, Launay Chanoine of Soissons, & sometime minister at Sedan: for the Nobility the Marquis of Canillac, the Siegneur of Menneville, S. Pol, Rofne, Montberault, Hantfort, Saussay for the third Estate, Maestranli, Neuilly, Gogucley, Mordorge, Mechault, Bafon, Marillac, Acharie, de Bray, Beaucier, Bryere Lieutenant Ciuill, Anroux, Fontanon, Drouart, Crucé, Bordeaux, Halsequin, Soly, Bellanger, Pencher, Senault and Charpentier, all Lawyers or men of trafficke. The great men enter presently into icalousie of this number, whereas the people commanded: so as (by the Dukes importunity and the aboue-named Princes) they add vnto them Henneguin Bishop of Rennes, the Abbot of Lenoncourt, the Presidents Ianis, Yesue, Le Maître, Dormesson, Videnville, D'Ameurs a Councillor, Villeroi, both father and son, Sermolise, Dampierre, La Bourdaisiere, Le Fay, and many others, who to carry it away by plurality of voices, called vnto them the President Le Sueur, Bragelonne Treasurer, Romland a Sheriffe, & others, who assisting one another with their voices, ouerthrow many things which those that were deputed for the people were ready to decree, for the confirmation of their tyranny.

the vnion.

The Duke of Mayenne (to settle his affaires) suffers these base companions to play the petty King. Those of the Clergy, exceeding the authority of the Church, doe in their sermons excommunicate the father that knoweth his sonne to be the Kings seruair, and reueales him not to the Councell of the vnion: the sonne that discouers not his father, the wife and the husband that accuse not one another, the kinsmen and friends that discover not the goods of their kindred and friends being absent, to be employed in the warres. The Nobility reapes some profit of the ranfomes and spoiles of the Royalists and Politicks. The people condemne, imprison, spoile and ranfome, of their absolute power, and sell the goods of any that beares not the marke of their enraged faction. This furious combustion of Paris, sets all the Realme on fire: townes and prouinces frame themselves after the mould of the capitall City. Chartres begins the dance: expels Sourdis their Gouernour, and receiues Reclainville a Gentleman of Beaufe, a partisan of the League. This town imports much for the Estate of Paris, as one of their chiefe graniers for corne. The Duke of Mayenne postes thither, to be assured thereof, and the people receiue him as their Redeemer.

Exceeding insolencies.

F. Being arrived there, Roman sends for him. He goes: and in all places as he passeth, they meet him, present him their keyes, and sweare to obey him. Those of Mans murder many of the Kings Officers and seruants, spoile others, seize vpon Farge their Gouernour, and send him prisoner to Paris. Angiers was assured for the King: but the Duke of Montmoroux Gouernour of Britan, subdued in a manner all the Pringuite to his party. Thoyssin murders Duranti their first President (a man who in all the fires hee had formerly kindled, did now shew that hee had any left of a Huguenot in him.) and Doffe

the Kings Aduocate. Aix, Arles, and Marseilles plant vp suddenly the Ensignes of the League, and follow the dance with the rest. Lion iumps with them, and growing suspicious of the passage of Colonel Alphonso Corse (afterwards Marshall of France, under the title of Orsino) to command the army in Dauphiné which the Duke of Mayenne had abandoned, they declare the occasion why they take arms, i. weare to maintaine good correspondence with the Princes, Gentlemen and Inhabitants of Paris, and other townes vnted, and to put in execution all the Duke of Nemours commandements, who was now escaped out of the Castele of Blois. But we shall see this people as easie to mutine against him, as they were now ready to allow him for their Gouverneur. Châlons retained almost all Champagne in their duty and obedience. Rosné was Gouverneur there. But the whole body of the City, aduertised of this great execution at Blois, let him vnderstand: that seeing the Duke of Guise his master was dead, his authority was extinct, and that acknowledging no other Soueraigne but the King, they would preferre their City from all strange enterprises. Langres deserves an honorable testimony, to haue lesse then all other fostered rebels, and to haue constantly opposed themselves against all the attempts of the league. In other Prouinces the townes bandy directly one against another, and the most modest affecting neither party, keepe themselves from the forme. The King beholds this pitifull Tragedy, acted vpon the Theater of his Estate, and thinks yet to reclaime his subjects by mildnesse. He pardoneth, he absollteth, he forgets all, so as euery one will performe the duty of a subject, and againe promitteth the oblation of his Edicts of vniou, in fauour of the Catholikes, as for the extirpation of heresie. But in the end, patience provoked, turns into fury. He sees that the Princes, the Prouost of Merchants, & the Sheriffs of Paris which were dismissed, doe like vnto Nes Rages, they cast oyle in stead of water vpon the fires that are kindled. Seeing therefore, the more he seeks by mildnesse to reduce these strangers to the right way, the more violent they grow in their furious passions, he now vseth his authority, hee makes sundry proclamations, as well against the D. of Mayenne, the Duke and Cheualier of Aunale, as against the Cities of Paris, Orleans, Châtreaux, Rouan, Amiens, Aubeuille and other adherents, pronouncing both heads and members, disloyall, rebels, gully and convicted of the crimes of rebellion, treachery and treason in the highest degree: degrades them and their posterity of all honor, it by the beginning of March they submit not themselves to his obedience. And to ioyne armes to his declarations, he makes a speedy leauy of twelue thousand Swisses, by the Lord of Sanfey, who molested the Duke of Sauoy vnder the Kings authority, about Geneva, where hauing taken the townes of Bonne, Geu, Thonon and their Castles, he besieged the fort of Rapaille, where the dukes succors led by Cont Martinegnes, were defeated; Martinegnes slaine in battell, with about 2000 men, and the place yielded: in the end hee calls the Nobility vnto him, sends forth many Commissions to leaue fouldiers, transports the execution of Iustice to Tours, which was wont to be in his Parliament at Paris hee commands his chamber of accounts, and all his Officers of the marble table, to repaire presently to Tours, to attend their charges, and deperives from all honors, charges, dignities, E and priuiledges, all townes adhering to these new reboules.

The Dukes attempt.

This did but kindle more the fires of rebellion. The D. of Mayenne armies both herse and foot, practiseth without the Realme, seeks to the King of Spaine, sends out patentes and Commissions vnder a new seale, vsurpes all the parts of Royall Maiesty, goes to field with his troopes, makes choise of the most resolute, and goes to Vendôme with a designe to surpris the King in Tours being ill accompanied. All the great councill was at Vendôme, vnder the assurance and word of William de Harcourt Governor of the towne. But the rich ransomes of these Lords were an enticing bait to a dissol and wicked foule. He suffers Rosné to enter, and deliuer them all vnto him, to dispose as of prisoners of war: A Treachery added to other crimes which shall cost him his head in the market-place of Vendôme, when the towne is taken.

The league increased daily, and the King had need to vse the King of Nauarres forces, and where could he finde more trusty French men to vnto his duty. To this end he sends to his brother in law, Duke of Bourbon, the Duke of Angoulême, his daughter to King Henry the second, and invites him to make a truce betwix them, that by their common forces they may more commodiously withstand the furious attempts

A of the enemies of the Realme, Peter of Mornay, Lord of Bahy, Marshall of the campe for the King, and Philip of Mornay, Lord of Plestis, Marsh his brother, Superintendent of the King of Nauarres house, treat this truce for the two Kings, and conclude vpon these conditions; that the Towne, Castele, and bridges of Saumur should be put into the King of Nauarres hands for the safety of his passage and of his forces. That all matters vntill a firme peace were concluded (the which should be treated of before the end of the year) should remaine in the state they were in: and for a respite for sicke and wounded men, one of the three places which should be reduced by their common forces, provided alwaies it were no head of a Senehawey nor Baylwick: So the King of Nauarres being placed Du Plestis gouernour of the Towne, Castele and Senehawey of Saumur, and Du Faur at Langeau vpon Loire, heessed all suspicions, and all impressions of distrust which they gaue him to disert his enteruew. He passeth Loire the 28 of Aprill with foure hundred masters, and a thousand Harguebuziers on horse backe, to ioyne with the forces of Normandy, Maine, and other places that attended him; and the last of the moneth doth his duty vnto the King within the park of Plestis les Tours, the one making a great shew of loue, the other of a free and ready resolution (laying alid allieutousie and impressions of distrust, whereby some would haue diuerted this enteruew) and both of a singular and mutual content.

Three dayes were spent in discourse and conference. The King of Nauarres had repassed the riuer, to cause his foot to aduance: and the Duke of Espernon (who was newly armed with foure hundred horse, and two thousand foot) marched towards Blois, to keep the inhabitants in awe: when as the Duke of Mayenne (who stayed at Vendôme) seeing the Kings forces diuided, and trusting in the intelligences he had with some great personages about the King, makes a march of twelve leagues, and the 8 of May appeares with his Vanguard about the suburbs of Saint Symphonian of Tours; whither the King was gone to walke, He was scarce thirty paces from the suburbs, when as a man came running to the towne, and knowing his Maieity, My Liege (saith he) retire you selfe, the league follows me. So the King mains the suburbs, with the Régiments of his guards of Picardy, of Rouen, of Gerz lately conuerted from the league to the Kings seruice (grieved with that shameful sight hee had made vnder Duke de Nemours, being chased by the King of Nauarres vnto the Suburbs of Nanter) hee caused them to make barricadoes, sets the Marshall D'Almont at the gate vpon the bridge, and the Swisses of Colonel Galati within the Towne. Hee sends for the King of Nauarres, who was at Chinon, and the Duke of Espernon at Blois. The Duke of Tremouille and Chastillon Colonel of the King of Nauarres foot-men, arise within few houres. They fight as many barricadoes on foot, then they made the retreat with the Lord of Grillon, who commanded the regiment of the Garde, hauing a Harguebuze shot through the body. Their troopes arie towards the cuning, whom the King caused to be lodged in some islands seere vnto the enemy all night.

E In the meane time the Duke of Mayenne begins the skirmish, forceth some barricadoes, and kills many fouldiers. Gerz (seeing with too braue a resolution to keepe the enemies from taking vp of his har, which was fallen from him in descending his barricado with his pike) lost his life. The Duke comes, and about foure of the clocke winnes the suburbs, and threatened the towne. The Inhabitants trembled, and those with whom the Duke had intelligence studied to effect their designs. As the night gaue some rest vnto their armes, the King of Nauarres troopes arise: the Duke of Espernon did defend him. As soone as the day began to break, the Duke aduerted of these new succours, burnt two great Arches of wood, and the houses at the entry of the bridge, and with a speed equal to his coming, returned the same way, leaving a great suspicion against such as accompanied the King, to haue sought great means to deliuer him without striking stroke.

His Maieity aduised to giue his enemy a free passage to retorne. It were folly (saith hee) with a pleasant countenance) to beget a double Henry against one Carolus; which is the Duke of Mayennes name. It is a horror to thinke of the insolencies, spoiles, murders, wastings, sacriledge, blasphemies, trelligions, which these braue Champions (armed for the defence of the Catholike religion) did practis in these suburbs, even in the Church of S. Symphonian. The Viceroy and the Chaplaine beaten and bound all night, did see the coffers broken, the goods carried away, women and maids (that were fled thither as into a sanctuary) ransomed: and which is worse, they steale away holy things, as Coopes and Ornaments of the Altar, the Robes and Vellments of Priests, & many Chalcies of diuers mettalls, carrying away those of silver, as belonging to heretikes and royalists (as they termed them) and therefore good prize: and the others that were not silver they left behind, being (say they) of the vniion. The Cheualier D'Aumale and his people shewed themselves braue artificers in these exploits.

Doubtlesse the vniion hath more disunited the Church, and more ruined the Catholike religion in few yeares, then the Protestants had done in many. We haue seene their soldi- ers (and amongst them many Priests and Monkes that had cast away their frocks) force Nicars & Curats of Parishes in Lent (with a dagger at their throats) to giue them calmes, sheepe, lambs, pigs, kids, hens, capons, and other flesh, vnder the names of pikes, carpes, barbles, soles, turbots and herings, whilest the College of Sorbonne, and their Preachers, thunder out against their lawfull Prince and Soueraigne. The essentiall forme of a zealous Catholike was then, to rob Churches, to ransacke widdes and Virgins, to murder men against the Altars, and to spoile the Clergy, not to be the Kings seruants, which that age held for a crime, but to vomit out against him all the indignities, and all the wickedness, which irreligion and impiety could inuent in mad fouldiers.

We know the Lion by his pawes. The towne of Arquenay (three leagues from Lauall) had a Church guilt & enriched by the Lords of Rombouille, and at that time filled with all the goods of the Inhabitants. Commerande, with a regiment of seuen or eight hundred men (hauing ouer-runne and spoiled the Countie of Aniou, and the Countie of Lauall) comes thither with his men to lodge, in the end of Aprill, who burnt the doores of the Church, sackt it quite, hauing no respect of the feminine sex: they slue a poore man at the foot of the crucifixe, complaining that in the same place they had ransomed his wife: they did their excrements in the holy water stocke; perfumed all the Church with their stinkiness, applied to their owne vices the ornaments of our Lady, sold the coopes, the banner and reliques to the Monkes of Eurons: the Chalcies and croisse of silver to them of Va- gure: and to heape vp the measure of their villanies (hauing taken the Pire of silver and some foure and twenty of their holy takes in it) one of them attired himselfe like a Priest, D causing some twenty of the fouldiers to kneele downe, and with his hands imbrued with blood and sacriledge, distributed them vnto them, and trode the rest vnder his feet. The like they did within few daies after at Thorigny.

It sufficeth amongst so many to haue noted this horrible impiety in particular, that posterity may leaue, that armes doe not edifie but destroy the Altars: and that piety dwells not much among such as follow the campe. The re-union of the two Kings had greatly troubled the Leaguers of Paris. Now they cease not to draw Articles, instructions and aduertisements, both within, and without the Realme: they forget nothing that may confirme the building of their confusion. They send their Deputies to Rome, the Commander de Dios, the Councillor Coguelay, the Abbot of Orbais, and the Déane E of Rheims: who iustifie their actions to the Pope: demand a Legate, promise the publication of the councell of Trent, beseech his Holinesse, to bee grations and fauourable to their designs, and to the towne of their association, and to contribute to the charge of this common warre, whereof they must beare the chiefe burthen. Indeed they had need of much money, to furnish the expences of so many petty Kings: but some filled their co- fers, others payed their debts, and some bought lands & Lordships. Thus the people are the instruments of great men, and the shelle whetstone all kinde of stormes and tempests doe beate.

Liberty exceeded in all places, and rage against the Kings authority seemed desperate. The fire of this reuolt had kindled the heart and all the corners of the Realme: and generally there was nothing but inroades, spoiles, surprizing and sacking: when as suddenly many checks amaze the League, and giue hope of a speedy reuiuing of the Kings affaires. The Duke of Montpensier, assisted by the Lords of Hallor, Creueccour, Bacqueuille, and Larchant was in Normandy, with forces for his Maiesties seruice: and for the first fruits, hauing defeated the garrison of Falaife, taken three Captaines, curbed off their companies in peeces, and dispersed the rest, they besieged the towne, and had brought it ready to yeeld, when as the Earle of Brissac (who of late did wonders in speaking well

A at the Estates in the Kings fauor) advanced with about three hundred Gentlemen, and five or sixe thousand foot; whom they called Gaultiers, and made the Duke abandon the siege to encounter them. They lodged in three villages: the Duke forth two, his such as make resistance, and chastise the rest with small difficulty. The Earle with all his horse, leauing a thousand or twelue hundred prisoners, and about 3000 slaine vpon the place, amongst the which were found many Gentlemen.

After this attempt of the Duke of Mayenne, in the suburbs of Tours, the King sends the Lord of Lorges to discover the enemy: the Duke of Aumale hath intelligence there, and sends some troopes to charge him. The Lord of Chastillon passeth at Boisgency B with two hundred horse, and as many harguebuziers to second Lorges, and causeth Fou- querolles to aduance with twenty Gentlemen towards Bonneuil. They meet with Re- clainville, who commanded in Chartres. He offers to discover them, they charge him, and kill five or sixe of his men: he retires in haste, and giues the alarm to the troopes of Picardy, led by Sauuise & Les Brosse, who commanded about three hundred matters, and a good number of Harguebuziers on horse backe, and on foot. The two Commanders Chastillon and Sauuise are in front one against another. No man makes shew to recoyle, and both resolute to fight. Sauuise puts his Harguebuziers before, and placeth his Län- ciers in hay; approaching softly without disbanding. Chastillon disposeth of his foot, makes two battalions of his horse, and sets Charbunier and Harcumbe on his left hand, C with their companies of light horse, and then he aduanceth to the charge. Sauuise chargeth resolutely. His Harguebuziers on horse backe very neere. Chastillon too men re- ceive them in like sort, and with one breath enter amongst the horse that were come to the charge: they kill many horses with their swords, and lose but three fouldiers. Sauuise chargeth the light horsemen vpon his right hand, and breaking the first ranks, had vñ horse Chastillon, and some eight or ten Gentlemen, but with the losse of five and twenty horse, as these rise and fight on foot, Harcumbe and Fouquerolles comes in: they charge Sauuise & his men, kill about sixscore Gentlemen, ouerthrow the rest, and force through them. Thus broken, without meanes to make a new head, every man flies, every one placeth his fastie in the heeles of his horse. Chastillon goes to horse-backe, and D pursues, chasing, beating, and killing about three score more in the right, with all their Harguebuziers. Two Cornets were gotten, and forty Gentlemen taken, most being hurt in the conflict. Sauuise caried Boisgency, dyed there of his wounds, not able to bee perswaded by any meanes to acknowledge the King, or scarce to aske God forgiveness.

Senlis had of late daies, by the meanes of some good Inhabitants, shaken off the yoke of the League. It was a troublesome thorne in the Parisiens feet, being distant but one small daies iourney to come from their City towards Picardy. To pull it out, the Duke of Aumale goes from Paris, with some troopes of Salagny, Chamou, Trémont, Congie, Men- neuille, and an army of the Inhabitants chosen out of euery quarter: he besiegeth, batters E it, and makes a breach, but is repulled from the assault.

Now they aduise the besieged to provide for their safeties: when as the Duke of Longueuille appeared, being followed by the Lords of Humieres, Bonniers, la Noue, Girry, and other Commanders, the Duke of Aumale turnes head, and prepares to fight: but La Noue (whom the King had especially commanded to assist the Duke of Longueuille with counsell in matters of warre) did so wisely make chioice of the houre and opportunity to charge, as the Duke of Aumale, Salagny gouernor of Cambray, and the rest (parting in practice the vic of their long spurre-rowels, lately inuented as a mournfull prediction to the League) saued their persons by the swiftnesse of their horses, and left the field dy- ed with the blood of fifteene hundred slaine vpon the place, in the light and purfuit; ver- fying the saying: Hee that flies betimes, may fight againe. Chamou, Menneuille, and di- uers others could not run fast enough. The artillery, baggage, and many prisoners remay- ned at the victors discretion, who by the kings commandement went to receive the army of strangers which were come to the frontiers. The Kings meaning was to subdue Paris. The greatest of the Hidraes heads being cut off, did weaken the whole body, and gaue hope to his Maiesty by that meanes to find what hee had lost, the tone and audacities of his subjects. To this end he sends the Duke of Espernon, to take from the Parisiens the commodities about the citier, and assembles his forces to compass them in with his

Thus the war growes hot: the Nobility goes to horse on all sides to reuenge the wrong A done vnto the King: but the more his troopes increased, the more bitter his subiects grew against him.

No prosperitie is so great, but it hath some crosses. As the King attends the forces which the Prince of Dombes (now Duke of Montpensier) brings him from Tours, comes comes that the Earle of Soissons (whom he had sent to command in Britan) had beene defeated at Chastaigneron three Leagues from Rennes, and led prisoner with the Earle of Anau-gour, and many other Lords to Nantes: that the Duke of Mayenne had taken Alençon. That the Lord of Aubigni (a younger brother to the house of Gordes, and a partizan of the League) had chased the Colonel Alphons out of Grenoble, and seized on the towne. The taking of these Barles caused the King to send the Prince Dombes thither, who more happily reduced many places to his Maiesties obedience.

But was it reasonable to neglect the imprisonment of a Prince of the blood, and of the companions of his fortune, seeing that the hazard of armes doth not depend vpon him that leads them, and that God doth sometimes crosse them, to the end that man should not make a buckler of his strength, but acknowledge his owne weaknesse. To loose their liberty, the King commands Captain Gentil to make an attempt vpon the towne and Castle of Nantes, and to Sardini, to giue him directions, guides, and beates for his descent vpon the riuer of Loire. As they labour in the execution of this commandement; Behold Sardini is taken and led prisoner to Gibrour in Aniou by Hurtand, Saint Offange C and the Abbot of Saint Maur. So his Maiesty reuokes his first commandement, and wils him (being assisted by Pucharie Gouernor of Angiers) to attempt to force the Castle of Gibrour by Petard. He views it, and after the discharge of six Petards he becomes Master of the place, of Hurtand, and of his companions: but they had already transported Sardini to Roch-fort. It did much import his Maiesties service to haue this prisoner set at liberty, so as at the instant pursuit of his wife, the King caused Pucharie and Gentil to treat an exchange with Hurtand and the Abbot, suffering the designe of Nantes surcease, to aduance other executions which they had in hand.

Varennes taken.

Varennes in Maine, is situated betwixt Laual, Mans and Sable, by the taking whereof he should giue many strokes with one stone. They did amoy these places which were D held by the factions of the Realme, and the Spanish Partizans, and they made the succors easily for Saint Sufanne and Pichellieres, which were besieged by Bosdauphin and Lasnes. Five blowes with a Petard forced it, and Rocheport did afterwards free those two places from the seruitude which did threaten them.

Gibrour taken.

Nine other Petards did ioyne vnto the former the conquest of Gilbertiere neere vnto Maulcon in Poictou, and this taken by Gentil, laid the way open to surprize others who had fortified themselves in an Island of the riuer of Loire, beneath Rochfort, and hindred his descent to Nantes. Maluier Lieutenant for the King in Poictou, hauing assisted him with a hundred men armes and 200 Harguebuziers, he passed by night into the Island and clesed Aniou and Poictou of this furnished Vermin. After which he went to view Gan-nache, and as he returned, hauing for his guard fiftene or sixtene horsemen which hee led commonly at his owne charge, with Pucheries light-horse and some others; Behold the Seigneurs of Aillon led 400 souldiers to Poictiers, he follows him by the tract, and d cleas them by moone-light. This first exploit performed by Gentil in seuen moneths, had made the enterprise of Nantes more easie, if the King had not retained them by him, whom he had commanded to assist him, and called backe Gentil himselfe to imploy him in other places during the siege of Paris, to the which his Maiesty did march. Being arised, the King sends him to Lamet Gouernor of Couilly, by whose induction he takes Cruse and Monanteuil by petard. Worthy doubtlesse of our History, hauing neuer spared his paines, the perill of his life, nor his expences, in petards, rolling-bridges & other Engines which he had often made at his own charge, in entertaining of spies for his guard-hauing not any one vein, but he had prodigally opened it, nor motion, which he hath not with great affection bided to exploit with happy success the Stratagems which industry had suggested. The successe of the Kings affaires made men to iudge, that the league would soone be ruined, the Kings army increasing hourly. Three hundred horse of La Chastre (who presently after the Tragedy of Blois had made shew to iustifie himselfe vnto the King for the strict familiarity he had with the D. of Guise) were defeated by the duke of Montbazon, and the

A Marquis of Nefle his Lieutenant, and fifty of his company slaine: the taking of Jargeau, Pluier, Janville, and Blamps, terrified the Parisiens. They call backe the Duke of Mayenne: and he finding the Duke of Longueuille far off, goes into Bry, assures some places, and takes Montreux-saut-yonne, by composition from the Duke of Elpemon: but the Kings approacheried him suddenly to Paris, where (suffering his troopes to lue at discretion in the suburbs) he caused an ill impression to grow in some which could not well digest this confusion in the State.

An army of about twenty thousand men, gathered together by the Duke of Longueuille, ioyning with the Suisses and Lanquesens of Sansty, and Pontoise reduced by force to the Kings obedience: soone after the Kings arriual, all the Kings forces ioyned in one body, being about 40000 men, lodged about Paris: and the taking of S. Cloud, made the Parisiens ready to yeeld: wheras a diuellish Monke, an excrement of hell, a Iacobin by profession, James Clement, at the age of two or three and twenty yeares, vowes (said he) to kill the Tyrant, and to deliuer the City besieged by Sennacherib. Thus resolu'd, he imports his damnable proiect to Doctor Bourgoing Prior of his Couent, to Father Commet and other Iesuits, and to the heads of the League, to the chiefe of the sixtene, and to the fortie Councillors at Paris. All encourage him to this happy designe: they promise him Abbeyes and Bishopricks: and if hee chance to bee made a Martyr, no lesse then a place in heauen about the Apostles. They caused the Preachers to perswade the people C to patience seuen or eight daies: for before the end of the weeke, they should see a notable accident, which should set all the people at liberty. The preachers of Orleans, Rouan and Amiens, clatter out the like at the same time, and in the same termes.

The first of August, the Monke goes out of Paris, and marcheth toward S. Cloud: vpon his departure, they take about two hundred of the chiefe Citizens and others prisoners, whom they knew to haue goods, friends and credit with the Kings party, as a precaution to redeme that cursed murder, in case hee were taken before or after the deed. In his way he was stayed by the Regiment of Coulban, which was then in guard; telling them that he went vnto his Maiesty, to let him vnderstand something which concerned his seruice. Coulban caused him to be conducted by two souldiers to the Kings quarter, D which was at S. Cloud, commanding them, that (if haply the King were not there) they should bring him to some one of the Councill. They meet with La Guesle the Proctor generall, and leaue him with him, hearing of his Maiesties absence. He heares him priuaty in his lodging: the Monke giues him to vnderstand that the first President and o-ther of the Kings seruants had sent him, to aduertise him, that there is a good number of Partizans at Paris, who if it please his Maiesty to giue them a day and houre, will keep him a port open. And to purchase the more credit to his words, he shewes a certaine paper written in Italian Characters, the which hee said was a letter of credit from the first President, accompanied with a passport from the Earle of Briennes, signed Charles of Luxembourg: And seignes that he had obtained it to goe out of Paris vnder colour of going to E Orleans. That he had many priuate instructions which hee might not deliuer but to his Maiesty alone.

The Seigneurs of La Guesle, conceiuing him to be a spie, examined him when he saw the first President, and of the forme of their faces that were with him; and by what meanes he entred into the Bastile. Hee answered as if he had knowne them well, and added that hee was assisted by the fauer of Portails son, the Kings Chirurgion, for the knowledge which he had of his wife. The King being aduertised by La Guesle, commands hee should be brought the next day, but he is examined first by Portail vpon his pretended acquaintance with his wife, to whom he answered pertinently, and gaue good obseruations. The next day being come to the Kings lodging, they were called by du Talle the first Groomer of F his Chamber. At the first La Guesle caused the Iacobin to stay neer the doore, and taking his papers he presents them to his Maiesty, who hauing read them, commands the Iacobin should approach, whom he asked what hee would say, to whom he answered that it was a secret thing. Some distrust made La Guesle to speake, being betwixt the King and him. Speake aloud (said he twice or thrice) there is not any one here but the King trusts. His Maiesty seeing him make difficulty to speake, commands him againe to approach. The Baron of Bellegarde, master of the Kings horse, and La Guesle (who were alone in the Chamber) retired two or three paces. The King bends his eare, but in stead of hearing what what he expected, this wretch draws a knife out of his sleue made of purpose, thrusts his Majesty into the bottome of the belly, and there leaves the knife in the wound. The King draws it forth, and with some straining of the Monke, strikes him above the eye. Many ran in at this noise, and in the heat of choller killing this monster of men, prevented the true discovery of this enterprise, and the authors thereof, worthy to bee noted with a perpetuall blot of disloyalty and treason. The Physicians held the wound curable: and the same day the King did write of this attempt, and of his hope of recovery, to the Governors of Prouinces, to foraigne Princes, and to his friends and confederates. But feeling that the Kings of Kings had otherwise determined of his life, he did first comfort himselfe, in foreseeing that the last houre of his crosses should bee the first of his felicities: then lamenting his good and faithfull seruants, who straining should find no respect with those whose mindes had beene so abandoned to mischief, as neither the feare of God, nor the dignity of his person could disswade them from this horrible sacriledge. One thing said he) doth comfort me, that I read in your faces, with the griefe of your hearts, and the sorrow of your soules, a goodly and commendable resolution, to continue vnited for the preservation of that which remains whole of my Estate, and the reuenge which you owe vnto the memory of him who hath loued you so dearly. Referre the difference of Religion to the conuocation of the Estates of the Realme, and learne of me, that piety is a duty of man vnto God, ouer which worldly force hath no power. Thus spake Henry, euen as the last pangs of death caried him within few houres after from this vnto another world: but (a notable circumstance) in the same Chamber where the Councell was held on that fatal day of Saint Bartholmeu, in the yeare 1572. By his death he extinguished the second Parcell of the third Race of Capets, in the branch of Valois, leaving the Crown to the third Royall branch of Bourbons, whereunto the order of the fundamental law did lawfully call him.

The 63 French King.

Ehold the Theater of mans life: diuers passions appeare in diuers acts: hatred, rebellion, infidelity, treason and fury shall play a long and tragick rowle in many Scenes. But as our new Succellour hath eaten the bitter roots in his youth, so in his age he shall reape the sweet fruits of vertue, being honest, feared and respected, both of his own subjects and strangers. God gouerns the being of this world by course and temper of diuers seasons, men reape not before they haue sowed, neither doe they sow before they haue laboured. Thus he gouerns the society of mankind by certain degrees; that man may know, that he deserves not the sweet, that hath not sowed of the sowre: and that the force of his wit can no way aduance the happy successe of his estate, without the helpe and grace of that great Guardian, who by miraculous meanes preserues Estates from apparent ruine.

This Raigne hath two parcells. The beginning is painfull, full of crosses, and confused: vntill that our Henry (solemnly installed) be acknowledged lawfull King by all his subjects: for till then, the most impudent and passionate called him the Bearnois in distinction: others more modest, left him his first title of King of Navarre, or at the least, of Prince of Bearne. But the successe will teach vs, that euen now the Lord would succor this Monarchy, and in despite of all the violent oppositions of man, make our King to triumph ouer all domesticall and foraign infelicities, which had disallowed him for the lawfull succellour, and almost dispossessed him of his Realme.

This declaration retained them that were least scrupulous in their duties: and his promise not to alter any thing in Religion, might have shaken many of the League. To cross him, the Duke of Mayenne publisheth an Edit of the seventh of August, in his name and the Councils of the holy Union established at Paris, attending a general assembly of the Estates of the Realme, to invite (said he) all French-men that were good Christians, for the defence and preservation of the Catholick, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and the maintenance of the Royall estate, in the absence of their lawfull King, Charles the tenth of that name, for whose liberty he invited them all to armes. But he desired no more the liberty of his pretended King, then our Henry did to force Religion, the support whereof serves them for a goodly cloake.

Violent decrease.

Some Parliaments grow incensed at these sudden changes in the State, and seeme to entertaine the people in doubt and feare of the subversion of their Religion. That of Bourdeaux commands all men vnder their Iurisdiction, by a Decree of the 19 of August, to observe inviolably the Edit of Union to the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church: & declarations were thereupon made. That of Tholousa is more violent. They decree, that yearly the first day of August, they should make processions and publike prayers for the benefites they had received that day, in the miraculous & fearful death of Henry the third, whereby Paris was delivred, and other townes of the Realme: forbidding all persons to acknowledge Henric of Bourbon, the pretended King of Navarre, for King: declaring him incapable euer to succcede to the Crowne of France, by reason (said the Decree) of the notorious and manifest crimes contained at large in the bull of Excommunication of Pope Sixtus the fifth. Without doubt the authority of the Soueraigne Court is much blisfited in pronouncing a Decree, which they must reuoke by a contrary sentence. Thus the league kindled againe the fires which the King had somewhat quenched: the Kings troopes decreased hourly, sickness diminished their numbers, and the D. of Mayenne increased. The King therefore diuides his Army into three: one vnder the command of the Duke of Longueuille into Picardy, the other into Champagne vnder the Marshall d'Aumont; and he is aduised to passe himselfe into Normandy, with twelue hundred horse, three thousand French foot, and two Regiments of Suisse, as well to receiue succours out of England, as to assure some places and passages fit for his designs, but with direction to payne at need. In his passage he causeth the Kings body to be conducted and left at Compiègne, and reduceth to his obedience, Melen, Gisors, and Clermont: he receiues from Captaine Roulet both the place and the hearts of the Inhabitants of Pont de l'Arche, foure leagues from Rouen, a passage very commodious for the trafficke betwixt Rouen and Paris. He visits Deep: confirms the towne of Caen, forceth Neufchastel to yeeld, hauing by Halleis and Guitry his Lieutenants overcome the succours that were sent thither, and laie seuen or eight hundred men vpon the place.

The King retires his siege from Paris.

His conquests.

All these surprisles could not draw the Duke of Mayenne out of the walls of Paris. But when as he sees the King lodged at Dernerat, a league from Rouen, and the towne of Eu vpon Bethune brought to his obedience: at the instant request of the D. of Aumale, and the Earle of Briſſac commanding within Rouen, he goes to field, with about three thousand horse, and fifteene thousand foot, French, Germans, Italians, Flemings, and Spaniards. He promiseth the Parisiens to pursue, besiege, take, and bring the Beamois prisoner, and makes them already by supposition to hire shops and windows in S. Anthoines street, to see him passe in chains vpon the Bastile. He passeth the river of Seine with this mighty army, and recouers Gournay (being lately taken by the D. of Longueuille) Neufchastel, and Eu; and then he aduanceth to stay the course of the Kings prosperitie, who triumphed in Normandy.

This proceeding made the King imagine, they should not part without blowes, and full of that generosity, constancy, and ready resolution which he did alwaies carry in accidents which did seeme dangerous, sends for his Lieutenants, the Duke of Longueuille, and the Marshall d'Aumont to approach, for that he perceiues a dangerous fire in the Estate which was very sicke. The King parts from Deep, and marcheth towards the Duke: he lodgeth at Arques, three miles from thence, betwixt two hills diuided by the river of Bethune: at the foot of the one is the Village, and the Castle which commandeth it. He views the situation, and findes it fit to receiue the enemy. And not to lose the advantage

A rage which time or industry might giue him, he casts vp a trench of seuen or eight foot deepe on the top of one of the hills, raiseth the defences, furnisheth it with artillery, and foure companies of Suisse: provides for the safety of the Village, casts vp Trenches vpon the weakest places of approach: and a thousand paces off, neere to the rivers side where the enemy should passe, hee lodgeth eight hundred French Harguebuziers in an Hospital, to cut off the enemies passage. The Duke (whose army was now about thirty thousand men) chooseth rather to leaue the shortest way, then to fight for this passage: and passing the river above, he encamps on the other hill right against Arques, and three daies after, the 16 of September, marcheth against the Poller, a suburbe of Diepe, where the Lord of Chastillon did fortifie, leauing some number of horse, and troops of foot to guard his hill and lodging of Martinglife.

There is no such policie as to strike first, and to charge the enemy while he consults, being irresolute whether he shall fight or retire. The King knowes it well, his owne experience hath often tried it. He therefore sends to view this army, to discouer their forces, and to obserue their countenance. He leaues the Marshall of Biron to command at Arques, and lodgeth in a mill, which they had entrenched vpon the approach to this suburbe. There they make a furious skirmish. But the Leaguers hauing lost nine or ten Captaines, and a great number of their most resolute souldiers, they had no will to proceed. They leaue the place, and lodge at the nearest village to the Suburbs of Diepe: an open place, without defence or houses. So many commodities were scarce tolerable. Chastillon also dislodged them soone, and made them to keepe another quarter.

On the other side, the Corps-de-gard (lodged in the guest house) would not suffer the enemy which kept both the hill and the lodging, to approach neare the River side. Being impatient then to haue any such vigilant neighbours, they resolute to charge this Corps-de-gard, and to become masters of either bank, that they might approach more freely to the Trenches at Arques. The Marshall sees them come, and drawing them on by light skirmishes, makes them beleaue they shall haue the better: but suddenly with a furious charge he scatters them, some here, some there: and many seeking to saue themselves from the sight, drowne in the river. So this army is charged in three places at one instant: D at the Mill by the King: at Martinglife by Biron, and at the Poller by Chastillon. These first amazements whet their courages. They are daunted for this first checke. Battells are variable, and it may be, a second attempt will giue them a more happy successe. Being thus resolute, the Duke leaues that great designe he had vpon Diepe, and propounds to set vpon the guest-house. Three or four volles of our Cannon (said he) will beat it down. They shot, but preuaile nothing: and seeing their attempts vaine, they leaue force to sie to surprizes.

The first charge in three places.

The 21 of September they passe the water in the night, without drum, without trumpet, and without light, they put themselves in battell, and meane at the breake of day to worke some great effect. But they haue a vigilant enemy, who will see all, know all, and doe all: the King causeth a long trench to bee drawne from the top of his hill vnto the guest-house, and mans it with foure companies of Suisse and Lanquenets, and some French, supported by the Earle of Auvergne, (who in this war gaue braue and singular proofes of his valor) commanding three companies of light horse, and three other companies of men at armes, seconded also by the companies of the Princes of Condé, and Conty, and on the top of the trench he placeth the Marshall of Biron with the Companies of Chastillon, and of Maligny, (afterwards Vidam of Chartres) and a good number of the Nobility.

All these Companies march by the fauour of the Cannon (which played from the Castle to their advantage) and charge the Duke of Mayennes Corner, ouerthrowes Sagonne with some horsemen, dead vpon the place, and disperse the rest. But a new supply forceth them to retire. The Suisse of Colonel Galati stay their violence. The Lanquenets of the League (degenerating from the ancient constancy of Germans) approach neare the trench, but seeing themselves weake, and engaged with the hazard of their liues, they make offer to yeeld vnto the King. Those within the trench giue them their hands to receiue them. The King seeing them ioyned with his men, runs to charge them, not knowing they had called vpon his name. But seeing his Maieſty, they yeeld themselves, and lay downe their weapons, He receiues them, and assures them of the pay they had gotten in fighting

Giury, into Brie, and passing farther into Beaulieu, takes Issouille by composition, then A from Chasteaudun he sends to invade Vendosme, his ancient patrimony. Maisne Benhard commanded about four hundred men of Garison, and eight hundred Touilles men armed against their Soueraign and lawfull Lord. The Artillery had no sooner made a hole of four paces wide, but the souldiers, impatient, ste to the assault, take the Castle, and to enter the towne pell mell with the garison, so as his Maiesty seeing himselfe in lessthen half an houre in possession both of Town and Castle, he gave the inhabitants their liues, but the souldiers the spoile.

The treacherous part of Benhard to the great Councell, (as we haue said) with the treason of a vassall and subiect, and the seditious preachings of Iesse the Friar, were the B cause that these two principall motives of rebellion suffered for the people: the one headed vpon the Pauement, and the other hanged, Lauerdin, Montoire, Montrichard, and Chasteau du Lait, became wise by the example of Vendosme, and opened their gates to the Marshall of Biron, who entered into the towne with all his Company very peaceably.

The King seeing himselfe neare vnto Tours, goes thither: the people receiue him the 21 of the moneth with an admirable shew of ioy, he giuing the same day audience to the Ambassadors of Venice, who in the name of the Seignoury, congratulates his Maiesties happy coming to the Crowne; with offer of seruice and loue to the King, and Crown of France. Beaulieu, Dunois, and Vendosme being subdued, the Kings army marcheth in to Maine: the Earle of Brillac vnderooke to succour Mans, which the King threatened: C to that intent he aduanceth with two regiments, and some horse to la Ferté Bernard: but terrified with the noise of the Cannon, he returnes, and contenting himselfe with a pillage of forty horse, and some baggage of his Maiesties Reistres which he met by chance, he proclaimes his victories at Paris. Bois Dauphin commanded in Mans, accompanied with a hundred Gentlemen, and twenty Ensignes on foot, who in fewe would die with their armes in their hands, rather then suffer the King to enter. But must they cause the people to spend a hundred and fifty thousand crowns to fortifie the towne and suburbs: burne so many houses without the towne, to yeeld it at the third volley of the Cannon? Let mee, oh ye people! that great men play with you, as with a tennis ball, and bee not wedded to any other party, but that of our Soueraigne and lawfull Prince. You run rashly into a bad action: they fortifie you at your owne charge, and you are the meanes to vndermine your selues.

The taking hereof caused the Castles of Beaumont and d Tontenoyes to yeeld, with the Townes of Sable, Laual, Chateaugonthier, Mayenne, Alençon, Falaise, and many others in the Prouinces of Touraine, Anjou, Mayne, Perche, and Normandy. So as in lesse then two moneths, his Maiesty marched with his army (furnished with many Cannons, and a great number of strangers, English, Suisses, & Germans) about eight score leagues, hauing achieved many memorable sieges, taken foureteen or fifteene good townes, assured many Prouinces: and in all places as he passed, He came, he won, and overcame. Thus our Conqueror made the round of a third part of his Realme, not finding any let to stay the course of his prosperities: when at the Court of Parliament at Rouen, no lesse violent and presumptuous then that of Thouless, pronounced their guiltie of treason both against God and man, and the Estate and Crowne of France, that had opposed themselves against the holy Vnion: and all Royalties and their successors deprived of all prerogatives of Nobility, their offices to be void and not to be recovered: vnnworthy to possesse any offices, benefices, or dignities, and all their goods forfeited. These armes were too weak to terrifie his Maiesties seruants: this decree did little aduaunce the league. And the Duke of Mayenne (seeing the King far off, partly through shame, partly through despair, and importuned by the Parisians) was constrained to passe their excommunications by some great exploit: but the taking of Bois de Vincennes and Pontoise ended all his Conquests.

So many and triumphs did wonderfully make the League, the people grow weary with the burthen of imports, the spoile of souldiers, and a thousand calamities that did oppress them. To diminish them in the hearts of this towne, the monks and corrupt tongues of the Preachers charmed the blinde with an impression of many intelligences both within and without the Realme: by the scope of a false and great sicour from Spain, by the publication of many books, which they most industriously used a brande

A brands to feed this combustion, and by counterfeite deuices, they made the Kings name and his actions very barefull vnto the multitude.

The King in the meane time, continuing the course of his victories in base Normandy, where hauing taken Houffleur, a Port town, he came & raised the siege of Meulan, where the Duke of Mayenne had lien fifteene daies, being distant from Houffleur about thirty Leagues, where he offered him battell. The aduantage (being twice as many in number as the King) could not draw him to it. The memory of Argues was yet too fresh, and the supply of fifteene hundred Lances, and six hundred Hargobuziers white hies Duke of Parma sent him, vnder the command of Count Egmont, made him forbear. Whilest the Duke goes to ioyne with his strangers, the King takes Nonancourt, and then besiegeth Dreux.

In the beginning of March the Duke turnes head towards Monte, to passe the river eight Leagues from Dreux. His Maiesty hath intelligence thereof, and giues him leaue to approach within two leagues. To giue and win a battell is indifferent vnto him. He causeth his army to march towards Nonancourt, to view the foard of the river of Eure, which runs there: he himselfe treads out the place of battell, he imparts it to the Duke Montpensier, the Marshalls of Biron and Aumont, to the Baron of Biron, Marshall of the Field, and to the chiefe Captaines of his army: he makes choise of the Lord of Vicq for Serient Maior of the Field: he appointed the rendezvous for his troops at the village of S. Andreu, some leagues from Nonancourt, vpon the way to Yury, and the place of battell in a great plaine neare vnto it. All these old souldiers found the place chosen with so great iudgment and military wisdom as they altered not any thing.

The King hauing deliuered it vnto the Baron to appoint euery man his place, said, It is we desire of glory, nor motion of ambition, nor appetite of reuenge, that makes me resolve in this combat, but the extreme necessity of my iust and naturall defense, the piety of my peoples calamity, and the preservation of my Crowne. Let vs refer the event of this enterprise to the eternal Providence. Then afterwards lifting vp his eyes to heauen: Thou knowest, O God (said he) the secretie of my thoughts. I beseech thee put mee not in the number of those Princes, whom thou hast forsaken in thy wrath, but of those whom thou hast chosen to repaire the ruines of a desolate Estate, and to relieue my miserable people oppressed with the violence of war. O Lord, I yeeld my selfe to the disposition of thy holy and infallible will, and desire not to live, nor to raigne, but so far forth as my life may be to the advancement and glory of thy name, and my authority the raigne of vertues, and the banishment of vices. These, and such like religious words, moued all the Campe to prayers, and workes of piety, euery one according to his deuotion.

This done, the King disposeth his army according to the plot which he had laid. He diuides it into seuen squadrons, and in euery one 300 horse, flanked on either side with foot-men: the first he giues to the Marshall of Aumont, with two Regiments of French. The second to the Duke Montpensier with 500 Lanquenets, and a regiment of Suisses. The third to the Earle of Auvergne and Giury, either of them commanding a troope of light horse, and on their left hand four Cannons and two Culterins. The fourth to the Baron of Biron. In the fit were five ranks of horse, and sixscore in a front, Princes, Earls, Barons, Officers of the Crowne, Kings of the Order, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the chiefe families of France, besides those which the Prince of Cony, and La Guishe great Master of the artillery brought that day. His Maiesty was in the head of this troope, shining in armes like the Sun amidst the seuen Planets, hauing on the side of him two batrels of Suisses, with the regiments of his guards of Brigneux, of Vignoles and S. Iohn. The sixth to the Marshall of Biron, with two regiments of French: The seventh were about two hundred and fifty Reistres. These squadrons were all in a front, but somewhat beading at the ends, in forme of a Cressant. There was nothing more terrible then to see two thousand French Gentlemen armed from the head to the foot.

The Duke of Mayenne appeared a far off, and had taken a village betwix both armies: but his Maiesty fortheth them to dislodge, and wearies them with skirmishes, to draw them to fight: and the approaching night leaues our warriors burning with desire to haue the day call them to the Field, to make proofe of their seruice and duties to their King and Country. At the break of day the men at armes were in their squadrons, the souldiers in their battalions, and by nine of the clocke euery man did fight in his gesture, in his threats and words. At the same instant the enemy shewes a body of about foure thousand horse, and twelve thousand foot, and almost in the same forme, but most glistering with more feathers, more men, and lesse courage, almost like a Cressant. The Dukes Corner was about two hundred and fifty horse, augmented with the like number by the Duke of Nemours, who joyned with him, and was almost in the middle of his squadron as that of the Kings, but flanked with two squadrons of Lances, that came out of the Low countries, who were about eighreene hundred horse marching altogether. On the side were two regiments of Suisses, covered with French foot, then two lesse squadrons of Lances, seven hundred on the right hand, and five hundred on the left, two Culverins and two Bastards.

The Sunne and the wind might have greatly annoyed the Kings army. To prevent this inconvenience, his Majesty advanceth above an hundred and fifty paces; gets both the Sun and the winds, and findes the enemies number greater than hee esteemed. But this multitude serves as a spur to every Capitaine to encourage both himselfe and his men. The King goes to the head of his Squadron, begins his first works by prayer; exhorts and encourageth them with a countenance full of Majesty, ioy, and constancy: Mariants arrives and gives him intelligence, that the Lords of Humieres, and Motuare within two thousand paces of the field. But the King had well observed the point of his happinesse, and with a great noise his enemy that honour to strike the first stroke.

He that begins well, hath halfe ended, saith the Proverbe. He commandeth La Guisclie to discharge his Cannon: it pierceth through the thickest squadrons of the enemies, and shoots nine volleys before theirs could beginne; six hundred light horse, French, Italians, and Wallons, advance with a full Carriere to charge the Marshall d'Aumont on the one side, on the other side their Reistres charge the Kings light horse. The Marshall joynes with them, and makes them turne their tayles presently: their groue of Reistres is so violently repulged and driven backe, as they run suddenly to rally themselves behind the other troops. Another squadron of Lancers, Wallons, and Flemings (seeing his Majesties troopes separated somewhat from the rest which the Reistres had charged) come hotly upon them. The Baron of Biron makes it good, and not able to charge them in the front, takes them behind, pierceth a part of them: the rest breaks away like a billow against a rocke: the Baron had two wounds, one in the arme, and the other in the face.

A second charge.

Now comes the Duke of Mayenne with his body of horsemen, in the which were the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale, having upon their wings foure hundred Carabins, (which were Harguebuziers on horse backe, armed with Murrions and Plaistrons) who make a furious salley five and twenty paces off upon his Majesties troopes. This done, the King parts like a violent lightning from the head of his squadron, being 600 horse, hee chargeth two thousand of the enemies: hee breaks them, scatters them, and is so engaged amongst the thickest of them, as (notwithstanding the great plume in his Caske, and that in his horses head which made him apparant) he remained a good quarter of an houre unknowne euen to his own people, in this great forest of Lances; amidst a great shower of strokes, giving a good testimony, that if before he could doe the office of a great King and Capitaine in ordering, so could he now performe the duty of a brave souldier, and resolute man at armes in fighting.

A bloody charge.

But above all, of a most milde and mercifull Conqueror: who in this bloody fight, did found forth that gracious speech, Save the French, and downe with the stranger. Doubtlesse he is well kept whom God keeps. Some were greatly amazed, others trembled and quaked, having lost the sight of the King. This great body whose foundation was so much shaken, began to waver: those who euen now presented their faces so furiously with the points of their Launces and Swords, doe now shew their heeles, cast away their armes, and trust to their horses. His Majesty being freed from this presse, having with twelve or fiftene in his company, taken three Corners, and slaine the Wallons that did accompany them, and returning to his squadron a triumphing Conqueror, he filled the Army with exceeding ioy, and the Army the ayre with that louing cry of God save the King.

The Suisses remained yet whole, but abandoned of all their horse, and laid open. They propound to send the French foot on the right hand, who had not yet fought

A fought to breake them. But the respect of the ancient alliance of that Nation with this Crowne, made the King to grant them life, and receive them to mercy. Laying downe their armes they passed to his Majesties side, and those French that were with them, enjoyed the like clemency. But the time his Majesty lost in pardoning the Suisses, did greatly favour their retreat that fled, and gave the Duke of Mayenne leysure to passe the river of Eure, to breake the bridge after him, and to recover Manté in safety. The Marshall of Biron stood firme without striking, yet did he more terrifie the enemy then any other: for seeing this troope of rescue whole; they supposed that this old souldier having bene practised in so many batells in his life time, would easily breake them; and make the victory absolute. Hereupon the Marshall d'Aumont, the Earle of Clermont, the Baron of Biron, and other Commanders, returned from the chase, gather together their troopes, and joyne with the King. And the King having received his forces that came out of Normandy, makes a body, leaveth the Marshall of Biron with the army to follow him, sends the Earle of Auvergne before, takes the Baron of Biron on his sight hand; and another troope on his left: and accompanied with the Prince of Cony, Duke of Montpensier, Earle S. Paul, Marshall d'Aumont, the Lord of Tremouille, and many others, pursued the point of his victory, chasing, beating and killing, untill that the broken bridge diverting them a league and a halfe out of the way, to passe at the ford of Auer, and the horses (whose legs the Reistres had cut to stop the way) hindring the pursuit; and the approaching night, ended the victory.

The disorder was great in the retreat of the vanquished, and the slaughter great in the fury of the fight: about five hundred horse were slaine or drowned, and about foure hundred prisoners. The Count Egmont, the young Earle of Bruniwicke, Chastaignery, and a great number of other Noblemen slaine, Bois-Dauphin, McJausin, Cicengne (who carried the white corner to the duke of Mayenne) Fontaine, Marle, Lonchamp, Lodoman, Falandre, Hengestun: the Marshalls of the field; Treuxay, Castellere, Desjumeux, and many other French, Germanes, Spaniards, Italians; and Flemings were prisoners, whereof the most part being graciously released, did afterwards abuse the Kings bounty by a revolt, who neuer could practice that vncivill maxime of State, a dead man neuer makes warre. There were twenty Corners taken, the white Corner, the great standard of the Generall of the Spaniards and Flemings, the corners of the Colonel of the Reistres, three score ensignes of foot of diuers nation, and the 24 of Suisses which yeelded. All the footmen which yeelded not, or were not drowned, were cut in peeces. All their artillery, all their baggage carried away. Such as fled into the woods found lesse mercy in the peasants, then in the men of warre. The Duke of Mayenne saved himselfe in Manté, and gave the Townsmen this shout for their comfort, that the Bearnois was slaine, or little better. The Duke of Nemours, Balsompre, the Vicount of Tauconnes, Rosne, and some others took the way of Chartres. To conclude, his Majesty pursues them almost to the gates of Manté, finding the waies (notwithstanding his lers) full of runners away which remained at his discretion. And if those of Manté persisting in their first resolution to keepe their gates shut, had not yeelded to the Dukes earnest request, both he and all his followers hadaine into the victors hands. Thus God poured out his wrath upon this army: thus a handfull of men defeated many Legions: thus the French spoiled Peroueu in France. On the Kings side were slaine Clermont of Entragues, Capitaine of his Majesties Guards, Tich Schenberg Colonel of the Reistres, fighting then vnder the white Corner, Lonslainay of Normandy, being three score and twelve yeares old (an honourable graue for that braue old man) Crenay Corner to the Duke of Montpensier, Requiers, and at the most twenty Gentlemen more. The Marquis of Nefle being hurt, died within eight daies after. The Earle of Choisy, the Earle of Luden, de G., Montlouet, d'Auvergne, Rosny, and some others were lightly hurt.

In this battell they obserue three chiefe things. The first, the Kings firme resolution to give battell, with an assured confidence, that the sincerity of his intent, and the equity of his cause should be fauoured with the assistance of heauen. The second, that at the very instant of the fight it seemed that the earth did bring forth armed men for his service: for on the eue and the day of battell, there came about sixe hundred horses vnto him vnexpected. The third, that of two thousand French Gentlemen, only 1200 did fight: twelve hundred put to rout an army of foure thousand horse, fresh, well mounted, and well armed, med, and twelve thousand foot. Without doubt the eternall God of armes doth neuer forget the right of Princes, against their rebellious subiects : and a braue resolution, with a wife command giues a happy end to battells.

The next day by the Sunne rising the Vidame of Chartres went to field by the Kings commandement, to get some intelligence of the enemy. In the fight of Mantes he caused David of Villeneufue a Gentleman of Quercy neere vnto Cahors, to aduance, whom he knew to be full of courage & zeale to his Maiesties service, hauing seene him many times in good places, and lately very aduise to pursue the victory without care of bootie, like vnto many others. Gold doth many times cause him to be hated that loues it, and spoiles doe little aduance the spoilers; But goodly actions; leaue a fauour of immortal praise in generous minds. Villeneufue resolves not to returne without some certaine newes. All the Country was amazed, No man appeared. Hee approacheth neere vnto the towne, to talke with the first hee should meete. Some labouring in the Vines, seeing him armed and wearing a white scarfe, they run and giue the alarm at Mantes: The Inhabitants run in heapes to the port with all sorts of armes. Hee heares a great tumulte in the towne, and thereupon takes an occasion to found their wills. Hee prickes on his horse to the towne pike, and cries out that he came from the King to know their intentions: That hee hath his armes open to receiue them with clemency that fauour the Iustice of his cause; and his sword ready to force them that thinke to pul from him the Inheritance which Nature and Law had giuen him.

God blessed his designe, and disposed the hearts of this people to follow the better way. About two hundred of the chiefe Inhabitants, come to him to the port. Hee shewes them the Iustice of his Maiesties armes, exhorteth them to renounce all foraigne leagues, and not grow obstinate, through the persuasions or promises of such as pretend to ransome the Crowne, against all right and reason, and to consider that this warre was merely for state, and that religion was only a maske: witnesse the Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelats, which say masse dayly in the army, with all liberty. That they should deliuer their resolutions freely, the which being reported to the King they should see the effects, which a people meritis of a most mercifull and conquering Prince.

Being thus perswaded, and seeing the King armed with right & force, all leagely lift vp their hands, and protest to liue and die in the fidelity, which good and loyall subiects owe vnto their lawfull Lord; and that by their true obedience, they would wipe out rebellion whereunto they had suffered themselves to be caried, in the common deluge which had drowned the other people of the Realme. The Duke of Maine being aduertised by a strange Captaine of the garison, of the oath which he had seene giuen by the Inhabitants, from the which he could not diuert them neither by threats nor violence; in stead of assuring himselfe of the towne, as hee might well haue done, hauing many souldiers with him, both horse and foot, considering that to settle his safetie vpon the vacerainty of a popular friendship is to build vpon a quick sand: hee retires by the opposite Port without any trumpet, leauing the souldiers in so bad termes with the Inhabitants, as scarce putting wings to their feet, they followed the fortune of their Commander. Thus by the industry of this Gentleman (worthy doubtlesse to be registred in our History) the towne of Mantes importing much for the bridge which it hath vpon the riuer of Seine, came without charge or losse of men vnder the Kings obedience; who the next day made his entry there with all signes of ioy. Vernon another bridge vpon the same riuer did in like manner plant the banner of France. And the heavens seemed to poure more blessings vpon our Henry, and to make his way easie to an absolute Royalty: for the Earle of Rendan (chiefe of the league in Auvergne) was the same day of the battell of Yury, shamefully chased from the siege of Iffoire, slaine in battell, his troopes cut in peeces and his Artillery taken, by the Lords of Curton, Rosignat and Chafferon.

As they had abused the Mantois with a vaine assurance of his death, whom they durst not looke vpon nor encounter, so with the like practices they must delude the Parisiens. The Duke of Mayenne, his sister of Montpensier, and the other heads of the league, deceived of their hopes, published by printed bookes, and at the first assault at Dreux, the Bearnois had lost about 500 men, that their wounds had made a greater number valiant for their armes: that the Marshall of Biron was wounded vnto death. That in another encounter

A counter neere vnto Poissy the Vnion had gotten a great victory. That in the battell of Yury, the combat had bene long, and the losse almost equal. That if the Bearnois be not dead, he is little better. But such as (glad to haue saued themselves) came to Paris, married all in verifying the contrary, making the people to hang downe their heads, and to wish for peace by a still and mournfull muttering. The firebrands of hell in their pulpits made the losse far lesse then it was, giuing them an assured hope of speedy and new succours from Spaine; for the restoring of their Estate and destruction of the Mabeulnes, so they then called such as did fight vnder the Kings Ensignes.

And the Duke of Mayenne after hee had made a certaine practice vpon the Towne of Senlis (for the which twelue as well Captaines as souldiers, and many others being engaged in the same conspiracy, past through the hanging mans hands, the third day of Iuly went into Flanders, to the Duke of Parma: that is to say, he went to ruine his honor and reputation, for being a traitor at home amongst his owne Country-men, hee went to make himself a seruant and slave to an ambitious proud man, who hath often in scorn made him attend at his Chamber doore, and lacquay after him, before hee could receiue an answer of any matter of small importance; to the great griefe and disdaine of the French Gentlemen, that did accompany him, who seemed to imbrace themselves to those proud humors. Doubtlesse it was necessary the Duke should try the infidelity of strangers, the better to know the courtisie of the French, and submit his armes and person to the King his Soueraigne and lawfull Lord: the means whereby hereafter hee shall abolish the memory of things past.

Aduersity makes the willfull more obstinate. The Court of Parliament at Rouen, for execution of the former decree, puts to death the seventh of Aprill, some prisoners the Kings seruants: and three daies after they declare all those persons guilty of high Treason both to God and man, that followed the King of Navarre (so spake the decree) and would not yeld to King Charles the tenth of that name, ioyne with the Vnion, and carry armes vnder the Duke of Mayenne. Whilst these threaten by their decree, and the duke goes to beg reliefe, the King being at Manté laboured to reduce the Parisiens to reason by mildnesse. But these trumpets of sedition, imputing this delay to want of courage, perswaded the people, that shortly their sworn enemies should haue worke enough, and that at length he should be ruined, that a little patience would giue them a great victory: that they must not yeld to any Article whatsoever: making impudent allusions to the name of his family, who is now seated in the throne of this Monarchy.

These insolent exclamations brought the King about Paris. Paris is accustomed to see from hand to mouth: the benefit of the Halles, the place Maubert, and other market places, is the cause that most households doe not know what provision meanes. And the chiefe of the League had so filled this former belief in the Citizens mindes, as of a hundred, fourtye and nineteen had added to provide for things necessary to endure the toyle of a siege. So as the taking of Manté Poissy, Pontcharreton, Corbell, Melun, Montreuil vpon Seine, and Lagny vpon Marne, brought Paris in few months to extreme necessity: Cornpaigne, Credit, and Excrement hope the riuer of Oise.

But the ordinarie cries of the Preachers: the practices of the chiefe, and the Ladies of the league, and the erroneous decision of the faculty of Sorbonne, giuen the seventh of May in the third General Congregation, held at that end in the great Hall of the sayd Colledge, prohibiting all Catholikes according to the Law of God, fidelity, to receive for King in Heretike or fauour of Heretikes, relation or excommunication, although hee doe afterwards obtaine by an ordinance and generall resolution of his crimes and censures, if there remaine any doubt of dissembling, treachery, or subversion of the Catholike Religion. Condemning all them for Heretikes, forsakers of Religion, and pernicious to the Church, that should suffer any such to come to the Crowne. All these made the multitude more obstinate against the extremities, in which the rigour of a long and painful siege may befall. But when this decision, they had by strong arguments to bridle mens tongues & actions that fauoured the Flour de Luce in their hearts. The French Nobles let Paris to observe the speed and clemency of such as they expected: that is to say, of such as would restore peace, and haue not lost the remembrance of the true Principles of France. And if any one should say, it were good, as was of a while since, that it were a politike and a royalist, that should say, and would, and should, to the Church.

Church. They spoile, imprison, yet put to death, such as doe not applaud this horrible A tyranny.

The Duke of Nemours, in the Duke his brothers absence, commanded at Paris, and for his chiefe Counsellors, he had the Popes Legate, the Ambassador of Spaine, the Archbishop of Lion, the Bishops of Paris, Remes, Placentia, Senlis and others. Panigrale, bishop of Ast, Bellarmine and Tyrens Jesuits, who with diuers processions, fasting, vows and supplications, bewitched the people in their greatest famine: many zealous doctors, curats, priests and monks tooke armes, and the Friars with their Breuitaries in open musters were admired by some, and laugh at by others. The Cheualers D'Aumale, with some others, laboured by sallies to annoy the Kings troopes, who content to repulse them, hoped B their bellies would shortly make their tongues to sing a new note. The Duke of Mayenne on the other side courted the Parmesan: and the King of Spaine proceeded so slowly in his succors, as the best iudgments did perceiue, he rather sought to entertaine, then to quench their thirst.

The Parisiens in the meane time had leifure to sharpen, but not ~~to satisfy~~ their appetite. The corne and other prouision of the publike, was wasted the first moneth. Such as had any prouision in their houses, kept it very secret, and others that trusted too confidently to the words of the chiefe Commanders and Preachers, perished of hunger, or at the least indured much, struing against the cruelty of famine. All passages by water were cut off, the taking of Saint Denis depriued them of the plaine of France, and but C for the palpours (which a little fauour or money obtained easily of the Capitaines and Guards) the Citizens had in few weekes bene brought to the Kings discretion, who yeelded good for euill, suffered them to cary victuals for the Duke of Nemours, the Ladies and others who practised his ruine, except Nitri Gobers, who by his ordinary sallies had often conference with the King to produce in the end great effects for his Maiesties seruice, and by his returne to the Royall party euaporate the bad fauour of foure thousand Crownes which had caried him to the mutines faction in the greatest necessity of the Kings affaires.

Their misery grew extreme in the third moneth of the siege. There was hundred thousand people dead of hunger, griefe and poverty, in the streets and hospitals, without reliefe, and without pity. The suburbs ruined, beaten downe and waste. The City needy and solitary. The rents of the Towne-houie (being the chiefe linings of many families) were extinguished: their lands about the City wasted and desolate, the Vniuersity forsaken, or serving to lodge peasants, and the Schooles for stables for their cattell: the Palace not frequented, but by some idle persons, the grass growing where as before they could hardly go for presse. The shops either without workemen, or without trafficke. No corne, no wine, no wood, no hay vpon the riuer. Nothing passed but was subiect to the garisons of S. Denis, the fort of Gournay, Cheureuze & Coybell: the Halls were empty, no Merchants in market-places, no means to make money, nor to get meat. To conclude, see this Queene of Cities, this little world, this Paris without Peere, waste, desolate, and at the last gaspe, and (to augment the disorder) many reliques were catched, the Jewels and the crownes of ancient Kings molten, and for a peece of bread, many Wines and Virgins doe willingly abandon their bodies, and their honours to the soldiers.

But all these miseries and horrors can be in picture hard hissed Phantasies. The firste scene, the forty, and the chiefe of the faction, bewitched the people, as it were with a sleeping potion which benums the members, so cut them off by peccie-meale when they be asleep, that hauing sucked the blood, the vital heat, and the hearts out of their bodies, they haue done the filth out off their purses: they might confirme their insolence any, without controule: They force the Parliament being subiect to the houses of Spaine and Lorraine) to publish a doctrine the fitnesse of Ioue, Forbidding vpon paine of death all men to speake of any conspiracy with Henry of Bourbon. And the other the firste scene, you see the effusion of their blood. And the Preachers still fill them with hope of a speedy deliuerance.

But the badly hath more access, the people are not fed with paper, or with the Duke of Mayennes promises, but with his trumpets. They haue already oxen, dogs, cats, horses, asses, moyles, herbe, reeds, and any thing that might quench the rage of famine, such as became diuision. They went continually to the Court, assembled in the Palace, to re-quire

Aquire a peace. They prouide for this mutinie by a silly reliefe of eight or ten daies. At the end whereof a great number appeare armed in the same place, and demand a peace, or bread. Gous, a Captaine in the towne, steps forth to feede these famished people with words, but no bread, and for his reward he was wounded in the shoulder with a Sword, whereof he died within few daies after. The Cheualier D'Aumale flies thither, and followed by a troope of men at his deuotion, thrusts the Palace gates, imprisonns them that were armed, and hangs two, out of the whole multitude, to suppress the like fits of this despairing people. These popular mutinies had confounded the chiefe Leaguers, if they had not preuented it. To this end they assemble with the chiefe of the Citie, and notwithstanding the decision of the Sorbonne, and the Decree of the Court, they resolute to send the Archbishop of Lions, and the Bishop of Paris to the Kings Maiestie, to seeke some meanes of pacification.

to the King.

Before they part, they will haue leave from the Legate, lest they incur some Ecclesiasticall censure. The Legate consults with Panigrale, Bellarmino, and Tyrens, whether the Parisiens did fall into excommunication, being forced by famine to yeeld vnto an hereticke Prince. If the Deputies going to such a Prince, to conuert him, or to better the Estate of the Catholike Church, were comprehended in the excommunication of the Bull of Pope Sixtus the fifth: the Doctors answer no. Thus the Deputies come to the King, to S. Antoine in the Field. The King heares their speech, tending to a generall peace for the Realme, or a patticular for Paris, if the Duke of Mayenne will not seeke a generall. But what can they hope to obtaine of a King of France and of Nauarre, treating with him but with the simple quality of King of Nauarre?

Your Councell (said his Maiestie) contradicts it selfe, demanding peace of him whom they will acknowledge but for King of Nauarre. I will and desire peace, to caze my people, but not according to your proposition. I loue the Citie of Paris as my eldest daughter, and will doe her more good then she requires, so as she be thankfull vnto me, and not to the D. of Mayenne, nor to the King of Spaine. The brute of the Spanish succours for Paris, do not amaze me. I know the practices of Spaine, and with the helpe of heaven will conuert them into smoake. Paris and the Realme of France are not fit for King Philip's mouth. I will giue the Parisiens eight daies to consider of their yeelding, and of the Articles of peace for the whole Realme. Vpon their refusall, I know well how to vse a Conquerors right against the chiefe motiues and fauourers of rebellion: the constancy of them of Sancer, the despaire and victorie of the Gantois, whereby you magnifie them of Paris, is impertinent: for those of Sancer were prest to these extremities by the violences of such as would take from them their goods and liberties, their religion and liues. Contrariwise I will giue the Parisiens life, which Mendoza the Ambassador of Spaine takes from them by famine. As for religion, informe your selues of these Princes and Noblemen Catholikes, if I doe force their consciences in the exercise of their religion or otherwise. The comparison with them of Gant is not good. The Parisiens haue sufficiently shewed their courage, in suffering their Suburbs to be taken. I haue five thousand Gentlemen with me, who will not be intreated after the Gantois manner. I haue likewise God, and the equity of my cause. Make a faithfull report of my words to them that haue sent you.

With this answer, and other speeches testifying the Kings good meaning, and the small feare he had of the League, these Deputies goe to the Duke of Mayenne: and he sends them backe to the King, and giues great hope to incline to a peace. But, Be not amazed at this treaty (said he to the Parisiens, by a Secretary of his going after the Deputies) I will rather die then make a peace. And being aduertised, that Paris would shortly be forced through want to yeeld vnto the King. The taking thereof (answered he) shall be preiudiciall vnto him: this conquest shall disperse his army, and then we shall preuaile easily. But his Maiesty would neither see nor suffer the ruine of his capital city: and his meaning was not to seize vpon Paris in such sort as his enemies supposed. It grieved him to see so many ill aduised people. And if the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma, comming to succour them, would hazard a battell, he hoped by their ouerthrow to bring the Parisiens vnto reason.

Thus the Duke thought to abuse the King with deuices, and vnder a color of treaty win time, in fauour of the besieged. But the King being aduertised, that the D. of Mayenne was parted from Bruxelles, and tooke the way to Paris, followed by Saligni, Captaine

S. Paul, and other troops, his Maiefty aduanceth with a troope of horſe, and marcheth A ſeuentene leagues to encounter them: and miſſing them but one houre, he forceth them to ſlie into Laon. The Duke fortifies himſelfe there with his forces, and approaching vnto Meaux, he giues a generall hope of chaſſe. The King goes againe towards him: but he finds the Duke fortified betwixt two riuers, attending the duke of Parmas comming: who being come, renews this firſt hope, and with this deſigne he goes to lodge at Clay and Refines, fixe leagues from Paris. The King raiſeth the ſiege, comes to meet him, appoints the Rendezvous for his army: the next day, the thirtieth of Auguſt, on the plaine of Bondy in the way to his enemies, hee chaſſeth their quarter-maſters from Chelles, who began to make out their lodging, and forceth a troope of eight hundred horſe to retire B into the body of their army. The firſt of September, the Kings army is in battell about the village of Chelles, about fix thouſand horſe, in the which were fixe Princes, two Marſhals of France, many Noblemen, more Commanders, more great Captaines then are in all the reſt of the world, foure thouſand French Gentlemen (whom the bare ſhew of a combat doth draw more cheerfully to the place of battell, then to a gallant wedding) and eightene thouſand foot, French & ſtrangers. The Duke of Parma ſtanding vpon a hill to view them, Be theſe (ſaid he to the Duke of Mayenne) the ten thouſand men, which you aſſured me would be ſo eaſily overcome? there appeares about ſixe and twenty thouſand in the beſt order that I haue ſcene. This Duke made more account to ſaue one of his men, then to kill ten of his enemies. So reſolving not to hazard any thing, they change their ſwords C and lances, into ſhouels and pick-axes, and intrenching themſelves in the Fenne, auoyded the danger, and preſerued his army: neither could skirmiſhes nor alarums make him abandon his trenches.

On the eight day of the moneth, the miſt was great, and the winde being contrary, carried away the noiſe of the enemies cannon. The Dukes laying hold of this occaſion, make a bridge of boats, beſiege Lagay vpon Marne, a weak town, lying behind their backs, and halfe a mile from their campe: they batter it, and take it by force, but not without an honorable and vertuous reſiſtance of three hundred men that kept it, but holding it not guardable they razed it. To draw them out of their fort, his Maieſty makes ſhew of a great enterpriſe againſt Paris: he makes his deſigne knowne, that hee will attempt it by D ſcalado: and the tenth day at night goes from the campe with a good troope. But they keepe themſelves within their Fennes, yet could they not long luſt in this ſtraight, where they endured all wants: and hunger in the end would driue the Wolfe out of the wood. The King offered them battell in vaine: he attended the tryall of the Dukes forces in vaine. Hee therefore mans thoſe places he held about Paris, ſends backe ſome of his troops into Touraine, Normandy, Champagne and Bourgongne, and retaines a ſufficient army to annoy his enemies.

This proceeding drawes the Dukes to field, to free Paris. Parma calls himſelfe a Redeemer: and to make his profit of this advantage, he beſiegeth and taketh Corbeil by force, and kills all that he finds in armes. Rigaude (a braue and valiant Captaine) commanded E there, and hauing no time to reſiſt fo great a power, he found there an honourable Sepulcher. For dying at the breach, he performed the duty of a faithfull and vigilant ſeruant to the King. But the Parmeſan loſt the Marquis of Renty, with a great number of men, blemiſhed his reputation, and weakened his army: for whileſt that he waſts time, the King makes new deſignes, which ſhall bring the league into greater difficulties.

Even then the Agents of Philip would haue filled his good City of Paris (for ſo the Spaniard called it) with numbers of Spaniards and Wallons. But on the one ſide the plague was great, and victuals very ſcarce: and on the other ſide, the forces of Maritie Earle of Naſſau preuailed in the Low-Countries: the Queene of England ſending great ſuccours thither. And the ſixtene Tribunes of Paris ſeeing themſelves at ſome more F liberty, thanked the Duke of Parma, giuing him to vnderſtand, that his aboad at Bruxelles, would bee more pleaſing and more ſafe for him. His army decayed viſibly: hee ſees himſelfe in the middeſt of an inconfiant multitude, and to diſmember his forces to leaue any with the Pariſiens, were to loſe them, to draw the King vpon him, and to bee in danger of an ouerthrow. So in the end of Nouember hee gathers together his troopes, and makes his retreat, being purſued, tired, and beaten with daily loſſe, euen to the frontiers of Artois, by the King, the Dukes of Neuers and Longueuille, by the Baron of Bi-

A ron, Guiry, Parabel, and others. To teach ſtrangers, that France cannot be taken, nor ruined, but by it ſelfe.

He had no ſooner turned his backe, but Corbeil, and other ſmall places held by them, returned to the Kings obedience: the gariſons placed there by them, repayed the French blood lately ſhed at the taking thereof: and Paris fell againe into new confuſions and like neceſſity. The Duke of Mayenne was greatly troubled to aſſiſt the Parmeſan in his retreat. During the which the Marſhall of Biron tooke Clermont in Beauvoisin for his Maieſty, fixe or fixe other townes, and twenty forts or caſtles poſſeſſed by the Enemy. The Duke of Parma being out of the Realme, the King made his entry into S. Quentin, being receiued B by an honorable entertainment, and exceeding joy of the inhabitants: and the tenth of December, he was aduerſified, that Humières, Beſſiere his brother-in-law, and Parabel, had forced Corby, ſcaled the wals, fought with the gariſon, ſlaine all men of defence, and conquered the towne for his Maieſty.

for the King.

We haue conducted a mighty enemy out of the Realme: let vs now obſerue ſome particular exploits, for which wee would not interrupt the continuance of our Hiſtory. The Leaguers forces conſiſted of men, who fought their priuate profit in the confuſion of the Eſtate, and by conſequence, wiſhed for nothing but increaſe of diſorders: ſo all their deſignes tended onely to ſpoile and deſolation, to the preiudice of the Kings ſubiects, but to no aduancement of their party. In Dauphine thoſe of Vienne fought in the moneth of C March to ſhew ſome effects in fauour of the croſſes of Lorraine. Thoſe which had the Flower de Luce printed in their hearts, aſſure the towne for the King. The Colonel Alphonſo and Des Diguieres goe to ſuccour them: and from thence goe and take Pont of Beauvoisin, and S. Laurence du Pont, poſſeſſed by the League.

In the meane time, the Marquis of S. Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours, hath an enterpriſe vpon Vienne. Theſe two Commanders ſpye thither with ſpeed, and repulſe the Enemy. Alphonſo deſires to ſee how he carries himſelfe in his retreat: he ſals into an ambuſh laid by the Baron of Senecey, is taken priſoner, and payes afterwards forty thouſand crownes for his ranſome. Des Diguieres tooke the townes and caſtles of Briançon and Daxilles, and entred vpon the territories of the Duke of Sauoy. Then in Nouember he beſieged and forced Grenoble a Parliament towne, to ſet vp the armes of France, & to change their affections which inclined to the factions of ſtrangers. So we may ſay that Dauphine was the firſt Prouince of the Realme wholly ſubdued to the King from the League: which was chiefly performed by the valour and diligence of the Lord of Des Diguieres. In Normandy the Duke of Montpenſier tooke Honſieur, and forced the Leaguers to leaue the field. Thus the League decreaſed in diuers Countries: and to giue them a mate, the King did ſollicit a leauy of Reſtires in Germany, by the Vicont of Turenne. On the other ſide, Gregory Sfondrate lately inſtalled in the Pontificall Chaire, and a partiſan of Spaine, renewed the hopes of the League, promiſing a ſuccour of ſixtene hundred horſe, and eight thouſand foot, vnder the command of Francis Sfondrate his Nephew. During theſe E preparations, the Cheuallier D'Aumale attempts vpon Saint Denis, ſcales the wall by night, enters the towne without loſſe, and held himſelfe for maſter thereof, when as the Lord of Vicq, a valiant, wiſe, and reſolute Gentleman, comes into the ſtreet, chargeth the Knight, layes him dead vpon the place, kills moſt of his followers, and puts the reſt to flight. This Knight was one of the chiefe of the League, violent, hardy and valiant, but of a ſtrange diſpoſition, inſupportable and diſſolute.

Gregory the 14,
a partiſan of Spaine.

The King tired the Pariſiens with continuall alarums, and new enterpriſes, but rather to terrifie then to ruine them, and to giue them occaſion to open their eyes, and to conſider of their eſtate. They grow ſo amazed, as they wall vp S. Honories gate, vpon an aduerſtment that the Kings troops would make ſome great attempt the 20 of Ianuary. The F Pariſiens feare ſerues the Agents of Spaine for a pretext to draw in ſome regiments of Spaniards and Neapolitanes, attending ſome great ſuccours from the D. of Parma. The hope of theſe new ſuccours from Spaine and Italy, ſerued the chiefe of that faction as a bridle to reſtrain the Pariſiens. But the more to encourage and content the whole body, Gregory the 14, aſſiſted by many Cardinals, doth againe excommunicate the King and his adherents: he ſends a Monitory to the Cardinall of Placentia his Legate at Paris, by Marcellin Landriano his Nuncio: and for the effect of his purpoſes and promiſes, he begins to arme, to nouriſh (in ſtead of quenching as a common father) the combuſtions of this Realme.

On the other side, the Chastilian having private intelligence with the D. of Mercœur A the Spaniards land in Britany, and fortifie Blauet a port of the Sea: and thereby in a manner dismember the whole Province, united to the Crowne vnder Charles the eight. The King sent La Noue to make head against them: and retiring to Senlis, he took the way to Brié, accompanied by the D. of Neuers (who hereafter shall be of the Kings party, vpon the assurance the Cardinall of Bourbon gaue him, that he might without scruple of conscience carry armes for his King, although of a contrary religion) he makes a shew to bessege Prouins, Sens, or Troyes; and then with a sudden change hee giues out, that his meaning was to go to Tours, to redresse some disorders: but he commands the Marshall of Biron (who returned from the conquest of Caudebec, Fescamp, and diuers other places for his Maiesty) to make a shew to passe through Beaufe, to ioyne with him, and that suddenly he should turne and inuest Chartres, before any greater forces should enter.

sieged and taken.

Chartres was enuiroined the tenth of February, besieged, battered, and assailed, but valiantly defended almost two months and a halfe. La Bourdaisiere commanded there, who having endured some assaults, it was propounded in the Kings Councell to raise the siege: but the Earle of Cheterny (lately restored to the office of Chancellor by his Maiesty) did vehemently impugne it: having an especiall interest in the reduction of this towne, by reason of some lands he possessed thereabout, he aduise the King to giue a generall assault: insists vpon the dishonour and preiudice it would bring to the Kings affaires, and the commodities he should receive by the taking thereof, being one of the keyes of Paris, which might greatly settle his estate, and annoy his rebells. The Lord of Chastillon (comming from raising of the siege of Aubigni, which La Chastre, chief of the league in Berry, had besieged) promitteth the King, that if he will make him his Lieutenant on this side the riuer, he will deliuer it into his power within eight daies. His Maiesty giues him this command. He makes a bridge of wood, the point whereof reached vnto the breach, that they might come couered to bandy strokes with the enemy. This new engine amazeth them, and draws them to composition: the which they obtained on good-Friday, vpon condition to yield within eight daies, if they were not relieved. The Duke of Mayenne would not lose the certaine, to run after the vncertaine. He held Chateau-Thierry to straightly begitt, as the Vicount Pinard was forced to capitulate with him before the King could come to his succour. So the King lost Chateau-Thierry, and in exchange tooke Chartres, a goodly and a strong place. There came forth about 600 men with their armes, horse, and baggage, and the 19 of Aprill the King made a triumphant entry in armes, appointed a garison, restored Sourdais to his gouernment, reduced Aulneau and Dourdan to his obedience, and then went to refresh himselfe at Senlis.

Chateau-Thierry taken by the League.

Let vs now see some other sinister accidents, which in time shal help to ruine the league. A thousand horse, and eightene hundred Harguebuziers, Prouencals, Sauoyards and Spaniards, seeke to subdue that Province for the Duke of Sauoy. La Vallette inuities Les Diguieres to doe the King herein a notable seruice: he goes, and both ioyntly charge these troops of strangers and bastard French, they kill foure hundred masters, and 1500 Harguebuziers, take many prisoners, and carry away fiftene Ensignes, win many horses and much baggage, and lose but one Gentleman, and some twenty souldiers. This done, Les Diguieres returns into Dauphiné. Being gone, the league recouers new forces in Prouence by the fauour and credit of the Countesse of Saulx: but she had neither force nor vigor able to countenance the factions of Spaine and Sauoy. The Duke of Sauoy, lately returned from Spaine, grows iecalous of some intelligences preiudiciall to his Estate, and sets guards, both ouer her and the Lord of Crequy her sonne. She is cunning, counterfeites her selfe sicke, conceales her discontent, and in the end, finds meanes to escape with her sonne disguised to Marseilles.

In Poitou.

In Poitou the Gouernor of Loches, having taken the Castle of la Guierche, the Vicount of the said place presteth his friends, intreats the D. of Mercœur, assembles all he can to recover his house. The Baron of Roche-pose ioynd with some other Commanders of the country for his Maiesties seruice, comes and chargeth the Vicount, kills a booke three hundred gentlemen, his best footmen, and aboute seven hundred naturall Spaniards that were come out of Britany, to succour the Vicount. The Vicount after he had maintained a little fight, flies to a riuer by, where thinking to passe in the ferry-boate, the presse grew presently so great, as boate and passengers sunke. La Guierche with

A with many other Gentlemen slaine or drowned, did almost equall the number of the Nobility which died at Couras.

The Popes
Bull dissuaded.

Then the Princes, and Noblemen, Catholiks, following the King, did sollicite his Maiesty to turne to the Catholike religion, and had by the Duke of Luxembourg sought to appease the bitterness of the Court of Rome, against the estate of this realme. The dukes returne with small hope: the petitions made vnto the King, to provide for his dutifull subjects of both religions: to prevent the new attempts of Gregory the fourteenth and his adherents, to the preiudice of this Crowne, were the cause of two Edicts made at Mante in the beginning of Iuly: the one confirmed the Edicts of pacification made by the deceased King, vpon the troubles of the Realme, and dissuaded all that passed in Iuly, 1585 and 1588, in fauor of the League. The other shewed the Kings intent to maintaine the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion in France, with the ancient rights and priuiledges of the French Church. The Court of Parliament at Paris, resident at Tours and Châlons in Champagne, having verified these Edicts, did presently dissuade all the Bulls of Cardinall Casians Legation, and other Bulls come from Rome the first of March, proceedings, excommunications and fulminations, made by Marcellin Landriano, terming himselfe the Popes Nuntio, as abusive, scandalous, seditious, full of impostures, made against the holy decrees, Canonically constitutions, approved Councels, and against the rights and liberties of the French Church. They decree, that if any had bene excommunicate by vertue of the said proceedings, they should be absolved: the said Bulls and all proceedings by vertue thereof burnt in the market-place by the hang-man. Landriano the pretended Nuntio (come priuily into the Realm without the Kings leave or liking) should be apprehended and put into the Kings prison, and so to proceed extraordinarily against him. And in case he could not be taken, he should be summoned at three short daies, according to the accustomed manner, and 10000 franks given in reward to him that should deliuer him to the Magistrate. Prohibitions being made to all men to receive, retaine, conceale or lodge the said pretended Nuntio, vpon paine of death. And to all Clergie men, nor to receive, publish or cause to be published any sentences, or proceedings comming from him, vpon paine to be punished as Traytors. The declared the Cardinals (being at Rome), the Archbishops, Bishops and other Clergy men, which had signed, and ratified the said Bull of Excommunication, and approved the most barbarous, abominable & detestable Parricide trayterously committed on the person of the deceased King, most Christian and most Catholike, deprived of such spirittual livings as they held within the Realme, causing the Kings Proctor generall to seize thereon, and to put them into his Maiesties hands: forbidding all persons either to carry or send gold to Rome, and to provide for the disposition of Benefices, vntill the King should otherwise decree.

That of Tours added this clause to their Decree: they declared Gregory, calling himselfe Pope the fourteenth of that name, an enemy to peace, to the vnion of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romane Church, to the King and to his Estate, adhering to the conspiracy of Spaine, and a fauourer of rebels, culpable of the most cruel, most inhumane, and most detestable Parricide, committed on the person of Henry the third of famous memory, most Christian and most Catholike. The Parliament of the League, did afterwards condemne and cause those decrees to be burnt at Paris, which were made against the Bulls and Ministers of the Romish sea. So one pulled downe what an other built vp. During this contrariety of Parliaments, there falls out a crosser to diuide the intentions of the Spaniard, and Lorraine without the Realme, and of the Dukes of Mayenne and Nemours at Paris. Euery one by diuers practices affected this Crowne, and euery one tried all his wits to set it vpon his owne head. But these men had diuided it amongst them, giuing the rest to understand, that they fed themselves with vaine hopes. To cast more wood and oile into the flames of their diuision, and to ruine one by another, matters were so handled, as the fifteenth of August, the young Duke of Guise escaped out of prison from Tours, and not farre from the riuer, found a troupe of horse appointed by the Lord of La Chastre, to conduct him. This escape caused many bonfires, and greatly reuiued their hearts, who held this Prince fit to make a King of the Vnion. But the clerke-fighted thought with reason, that his arrival at Paris would rather ruine then aduance their party, and the deuices and practices of other pretendants, must needs loose kinde an extreme and common iecalousie amongst them.

by the King.

Whilest these consult with their most trusty friends and seruants, what effects might A grow by this new accident, the King in the same moneth besieged Noyon in Picardy, defeated the succours sent by the League, four times, killed their most resolute men at armes, tooke many prisoners, put the rest to flight, and at the duke of Mayennes nose (who to auydey this checke, which the League was like to receiue, attempted vpon Maistre, fought to force his Maisties Suiffes lodged at Houde, and approached neere to Noyon, but would not fight) heaping chame vpon his enemies, he forced the besieged to yeeld to his obedience: and moreover, went and dared him to fight before Han. Whilest on the other side the Prince of Coutry reduced Sellies in Berri to the Kings obedience, at the winning whereof hee won more honor, being strongly situated in a marish, then Maher he did in the keeping of it: for he suffered it to be recouered within two months by him that had lost it.

Saucy defeated.

Let vs returne in Dauphiné, to behold the most memorable, and most fatall defeat for the enemies of this Crowne, the most vertuous expedition of armes, which for these many yeares hath most broken their designs vpon Prouence & Dauphine, and most weakened the League in thoe Prouinces which the Sauoisien affected: Dan Amado, bastard brother to the Duke of Sauoy, Dan Olimas chiefe of the Spaniards, (whom the duke had lately obtained of King Philip his father in law,) the Marquis of Treuic and others, conducted twelue or thirtene thousand men, by the plaine of Pontcharra, neere to the Castle of Bayard, in the valley of Grasiuodan. Doubtlesse the place should not ruine the memory of that incomparable Knight, who by the valour of his armes, had in former times wonderfully tyed the Realm: to commend his merits: the Lord Les Dignieres meets them, chargeth and defeats them, leauing two thousand five hundred slain vpon the place, carries away many prisoners, and most of the Commanders, takes eightene Ensignes with Red Crosses, and makes booty of all their baggage, which amounts to aboue two hundred thousand Crownes, in chaines, jewels, plate, money, both gold and siluer, horse and armes. Two thousand Romanes and Milanais, which had faued themselves with Conte Gales of Bel-joyeuse their Commander in the Castle of Aualon, were the next day at the victors discretion: fixe or seuen hundred were put in peeces, the rest were sent to a place of safety, with white wands in their hands: and then sent home into Italy, with an oath neuer to cary armes against France.

The King seeing, that neither by the taking of Noyon, nor by any other bait, he could draw his enemies to fight, doth presse them yet more neerly. To this end he commands, that Paris should be restrained on all sides, both by water and land, and enioy no commodities, but by the mercy of the neighbour garisons (the which hee entertained, vpon the tributes and customes imposed vpon victuals, which they suffered to passe to Paris: and by this means emptied the inhabitants purses, stript them, and drew out of the City necessary commodities for his troopes,) then with one part of his army, hee marcheth into Normandy, surpriseth Louiers, and then resoluech to besiege Rouan, the inhabitants whereof seeming no lesse obdurate then the Parisiens, whereupon hee made a voyage to Diepe, to provide for all things necessary for this siege; from thence he sent an Ambassadour to intreat the Queene of England to assist him at this siege with foure thousand men for three moneths, and to haue the Earle of Essex, to command them, the taking of which Towne imported very much hee said for the Trade of the English Merchants. The Queene did willingly grant these succours, and the Earle came at the appointed time with foure thousand foot, and a hundred and fifty horse as gallant troopes as could be seene: the King in the meane time was in Picardy attending his Germane army which came vnto him vnder the command of the Prince of Anhalt. The English lay idle and halfe of the time was spent that was limited for their stay: at the last the King sent the Marshall of Biron to ioyne with them with part of his army, who besieging Gournay with their ioynt forces they tooke it by composition, and then vpon the Kings arriuall they went to invest Rouan, where at their first sitting downe the garison made a gallant fall vpon the English quarter, but they repulst them and beaue them into their towne as valiantly, but the English lost in this skirmish Master Walter Denoreux the Earle of Essex brother, a gallant yong Gentleman and of great hope. This siege grew long and the inhabitants criet out for succours being reduced to a very desperate estate. So the King of Spaine sends to the Duke of Parma, commands him to leaue the gouernment of the Low.

A Low-Countries to Cont Mansfield, to go and free Rouan, and to imbrace such occasions as should be offered. Whereupon hee parts from Bruxelles with 4000 foot, and 3000 horse: and fortified with the succors of Italy, and 3000 Suiffes, hee marcheth, by small iourneys, for he wisely conceived that his master sent him into France for the same considerations, that he would haue given him the conduct of his army by sea into England, and vnder this shew of armes hee practised another designe: to cause the estates of the League to giue the Crowne of France to the Infanta of Spaine, whom the father promised to marry with one of the heads of the party, whom the estates should name.

This passed greatly to the preiudice of the D. of Mayenne, for he was married: and the eldest son of Lorraine, with the Dukes of Guise and Nemours were to marry. He is therefore now resolutely determined to crosse the 16 Tribunes of Paris, who with their Champions carried away the peoples voyces, and aboue all others, did feed the Spaniards hopes in this Realme, to whom (inticed by the gold of Pern, and his prodigall promises) they had already sold the Capitall City. The 16 growne hatefull through their tyrannous authority, feare to be soone suppressed: they refuse to prevent it, and rather to vnhorse the Duke, the better to aduance their affaires according to king Philips intentions: One thing seemed to aduance their designe: they held prisoner one named Brigard a Proctor of the Towne-house, accused to haue had intelligence with the King, and for letters written to his Maisty. Brigard escapes out of prison: they suspect the President Brissot, and the Division between the Duke of Mayenne and the sixteenth Tribunes at Paris.

C Councillors Larcher and Tardife, to haue fauored his escape. In this fury the 15 of November, they seize vpon these three venerable persons, hale them to the Chaffeler, caufe them to be strangled in the close prison, and the next day, hang vp their bodies at the Greue, with infamous writings on their breasts. This execrable fact might haue extended farther, and made the like spectacle of any one that should in any thing haue controlled the actions of these homicides. The Duke of Mayenne (who treated with Parma) posts to appease this tumult. Hee sends for Espritel, Francis of Ardilly a Gentleman of Beaulieu who commanded in the Louure in the absence of Riuande his kinsman, asking him if there were an executioner provided. This had beene sufficient to amaze the most constant, if he were not assured not to haue failed against the commandement D which the Duke had giuen him at his departure, not to obey any but the Lord of Belin. He offers his hand to Ardilly, and commands him to caufe those which hee should send vnto him to be presently hanged. Crucé, Louchart, Hameline, Auboux, Emonnet, Rufile Cleric, and many others of the sixteene which could not be found in the heat, escaped the gibbet. Crucé had beene first hanged if the Bishop of Triest had not purchast his pardon from the Duke of Mayenne. Louchart had escaped this mischief if hee would haue accepted the honor which the Duke offered him to make him Commissary of the viduals in the army. I will not (said he proudly) goe out of Paris.

You haue men about you, to whom you serue as a buckler; if your presence were not, we would make them change their language. Hameline seeing Louchart strangled, made a long prayer in French. Emonnet a violent man, strugled much with the Hangman that bound him, thinking they would onely terrifie him: but being led towards his companions hee desired to be confessed, protesting before all the assistants, being about forty, that he was not culpable of the President *Brissot*s death: yet that God had worthily punished him for that hee had in a night wickedly slaine a Secretary belonging to the Chaudier d'Annale, whom hee had seene receiue two hundred Crownes in gold which hee had. Auboux excused himselfe that hee was not of *Louchart*s practise although hee had solicited him, that hee tooke his death in good part, for many other great offences which hee had committed, but he named them not. Thus these foure rascals were hanged in the lower Hall of the Louure, the which they call Saint Louys Hall, and by him, who for that he had made no refusal to put them secretly to death and without any ordinary forme of proceeding, whom the beauty of their Scarlet robes made reuerent and to be respected, shall be hanged within few yeares after with other confederates of that cursed attempt, when as after these furies the capitall City of this Realme shall acknowledge her lawfull Lord, and the Court of Parliament recouer her former dignity, to reuie these miserable wretches opprest at this day by the damnable commands of these Tribunes. The Duke of Mayenne by this execution shortened their number, weakened their authority, and maintained his owne as well as hee could, and to pacifie the people, guilty of this mutinie, he deceit of the

he published the tenth of December a proclamation of things past in this disorder. The King in the mean time made his necessary provisions for the siege of Rouan; and appointed his horse-holders at Caen, Pont Larche, Ponteau de Mer, and other places. On the other side, the hope of speedy succors from the Stranger, the presence of Henry of Lorraine, eldest son to the Duke of Mayenne, and the arrival of the Seigneur of Villars, with 800 horse, and 2000 Musketers, made the Citizens to persist in their rebellion; and the Parliament, to forbid all men by a decree, in any sort to favour the part of Henry of Bourbon, upon pain of death: ordaining that the oath of the union made the 20 of January, in the year 1589 should be monthly renewed in the general Assembly made to that effect, in the Abbey of Saint Owen, with commendament by the said Court to the Inhabitants, to obey the Lord of Villars, Lieutenant to the said Henry, in all he should command for the preservation of the towne. Moreover, Baughemere then first President, prosecuted that all the Inhabitants should swear before La Londe Mayor of Rouan, to receive all such as by word or deed should favour the King of Navarre, to be exemplarily punished. P. Harbaing got feebly within Rouan, he presently displaced his superior: scilicet his authority, expells all such as he suspected, fortified S. Katherine's mount, and did all acts of hostility against the King, annoying his army what he could; the which besides the obduracy of the besieged, waste encounter with the extreme rigor of the winter, sickness, & want of victuals. But they surmounted all these difficulties cheerfully; and the besieged were ready to yield, when as news comes that the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma had taken Neuchastell, (abandoned by the Kings garisons) and were lodged at Franqueville, halfe a daies journey from Rouan. The Duke of Guise, la Chastre and Firry his Nephew led the forward. The Dukes of Mayenne, of Parma and Sfondrate Nephew to Gregory the fourth, the battell. The Duke of Aumale, the Earle of Chaligny, brother to the Queene Dowager, Boisdamphain, Bagagny, and Saint Paul the reeward: Boisempierre and la Motte; Lorraine, led the Swisses and the artillery. Whilst that the King made a necessary voyage to Diepe, to frustrate some intelligences of his enemies, the Marshall of Biron draws forth seven peeces of artillery to Bais, a village about Darnetall, plants them in three places, and puts himself in battell, to receive the Duke of Parma, who should come to lodge in the valley on that side, and by this countenance, made them think that he had a desire to fight.

The King arises, continues in battell almost thirty houres, and prouokes his enemy by continuall skirmishes. But he was encountered by a cunning temporizer, who passing with his troopes wide of Darnetall, made the king to devise a new stratagem to draw him on more, and to engage him; as it hapned soone after. The King dismisseth his Nobility, but with charge to be ready at the first command; & by continuall skirmishes kept Rouan from any reliefe, from the 20 of March to the 21 of April. In the end, the Dukes of Mayenne, Guise, and Parma, seize vpon Caudebec, from whence the garison was dislodged, and the same day they come to Rouan, but stay not many houres; neither had they means to victual it. His Majesty seeing that Rouan was not supplied with victuals, passed at Pont Larche, causeth his army to aduance toward Fontaine-le-Bourg, and sends for all his garisons of Louiers, Mante, Meulan, Vernon, and other places neerer; so as fortified with about 3000 horse, and 6000 foot in lesse then fixe daies, he turns head towards the village of Iueter, where the Duke of Mayenne & Guise were lodged, charged their forward, and defeats it quite, chaseth the Dukes about two leagues from Parma's quarter, leaving their baggage & plate in the possession of La Guishe. The first of May he takes from them another lodging, slaues about 600 Leaguers dead vpon the place, and loseth but few soldiers, and eightene or twenty hurt. All these checks should draw the Dukes to fight, but Parma seeks only to free himselfe from the king, and the rest had no desire to make trial of their valors. They held themselves very close intrenched and fortified within their campe, issuing forth no more then they had lately done neer vnto Lagny. The King presseth them and takes from them all passages both for victuals and retreat. They likewise intrench a great wood, and to stop the Kings approach, lodge there 2000 Spaniards and Wallons. In sight of their whole army his Majesty forthwith this entrenchment, and had it not beene for a small number who by great speed recovered the army, had defeated the whole troop. For ten dayes space the King tryed them with continuall skirmishes, during the which he views the situation of their Camp; and the 10 of May he made choise of such forces as he

A held necessary, and by five of clock in the morning, chargeth a quarter which the Leaguers held to be most safe; and without resistance kills about two thousand five hundred men vpon the place, castes away about two thousand horse; and wins all the baggage. To conclude, this war brought forth nothing so memorable as that which was done at Caudebec; at Iueter, and at Aumale. But for a proofe of the perpetuall assistance and fauour of Heaven to our King, amidst this thundering of Artillery, and so many showers of shot, his Majesty was hurt with a hurculeuse in the reynes; but yet so miraculously, as the force of the bullet was spent in the emptinesse of the ayre, and lay betwixt his armour and his backe, giving the King this lesion by a diuine aduertisement, My Lord, Alas had you not beene so bravely, it is necessary for your subjects. The Duke of Parma escaped all these encounters without a musket shot in the arme; the wound did not compell him to his graue.

In the end, blowes, hunger and extreme thirst, forced these Dukes to take their way to Paris in confusion, from whence Parma (carrying no tokens of victory) passed through Brise, recoctred Artois; and so went to refresh himselfe at Bruxelles; then in the end of the yeare he died in Arras, as he returned from the Spaw. His repuration began to decay. He had preailed little in France, and Conte Maurice did daily take something from him in the Low-countries. He had beene aduertised by a great souldier, and a man of iudgement, that hauing taken the towne of Antwerp (against the opinion of all the world) in the yeare 1585, he should shake hands with war. Doubtlesse this Prince should haue ended his labors by this great seruice done to King Philip his Master, as the most glorious triumph which Spaine had long time seene.

Thus the Duke of Parmas troops by land were weakened, and those he had imbarked were fought withall, some taken, and the rest sunke by the Hollanders. So Sfondrate came to consulte his troops in France. Thus France escaped at this time the proud threats of her ancient enemies. Rouan pressed with as great necessity as before, bought come out of Villars store-houses, at his owne price; whereby he got an infinite treasure. The King weighing well the toile his nobility had endured; dismissed some, and retyned the most resolute, and to hinder the Parmelan from attempting any thing, he sent the Marshall of Biron to follow him at the heeles. Who loath to remaine idle, besieged, battereth, and takes Elspemay. But Elspemay must be the fatal place to end his labors, and by his death brake off some other designs which his Majesty had; who to stop the entry of another army of Strangers (which King Philip, at the entreaty of the chiefe of the League, nothing sory for the Duke of Parmas disgrace, whose side they could not beare) determined to send, vnder the conduct of the young duke of Parma, assisted by the Duke of Ferrara, vntill the coming of the Archduke Ernest, brother to the Emperor Rodolphe, gaue order for the most vrgent affaires of his Realme: he diuided his forces into the most convenient places, to set vpon the league, where they had greatest strength, and laboured to effect some intelligences he had within Paris. But the period of his happinesse was not yet come. During these practices the Duke of Mayenne surprised Ponteau de Mer; and to get more bags of double Pistoles, he treats againe with the Agents of Spaine, touching the assembly of their estates, to make the Crowne elective, against the fundamentall law of the realme. But he had his designs apart, and the greatest part of the parliament wasted with this hidious confusion; vnder the which their scarlet robes could not appeare so beautifull, as vnder a stately Royalty: and the chiefe of the third Estate inclining to peace, abhorred these tedious furies of the league; the D. of Nemours for his part laid the foundation of a petty Monarchy at Lions, but he built it vpon the sand. He was now installed in the towne which Mangiron had sold him treacherously; considering the shew he had made of faithfull seruice to the King, and the towne and Castles of Vallene in Dauphiné, the which he had received to the prejudice of the truce, which was then betwixt them of Lions and Dauphiné: Being assured of these good places, hee went to field, but with more brute then fruit: for he did not fortifie his party, but by the taking of Saint Marcellin, and Eschelles, places of weak resistance; and doubtlesse Richieu won more honour in the defence, then the Duke did in the conquest of the last. The Colonel La Plancha, and Les Digniers, vpon assurance of the truce were far off, the one in Provence, the other in Languedoc, where both opposed themselves against the forces of the league. This breach recalled them soone into Dauphiné; where with their ioynt forces they recover that which the Duke had taken, not daring to oppose himselfe. In the end Les Digniers having thrust the Duke of Nemours out of Dauphine, (who by fauour of the forces of Sauoy, thought to settle himself there) enters into Piedmont in the month of September, fortifies Briqueras, batters and takes the towne and Castle of Cauours, chargeth the Dukes men at Vigon, forceth and defeats them. The Duke of Sauoy posses to Turin, and seekes to take the fort begun at Briqueras by Scalado. Hee is repulsed with dishonour and losse. They charge him in his retreat, but some feare of an ambush made them retire. And Les Digniers (having left the Lord of Piët to command in Piedmont) returns to Grenoble, whither the affaires of the Prouince did call him.

the Spaniards.

On the other side, seeing the armes of Spaine had preuailed so little on the Land, they must try if some enterprize by Sea would repaire their former losses. The Gouernour of Fontaraby had long practised vpon Bayonne with a Physitian named Blancpignon, who had intelligence with a Spaniard that had liued long in the towne, and vnder borrowed rearmes of art, did by letter negotiate the surprisall of Bayonne, and the rooting out of all the Kings officers and seruants. Their treason was so well advanced, as a fleet of Ships with an army at land was ready for the execution, when as by Gods permission La Hille Gouernour of Bayonne surpris'd the Lacquay coming from Fontaraby with letters of credit to the Traytors, who being taken and beheaded afterwards, discouered soone the whole practice: but the Spaniard chose rather to dye then to write those letters hee was required, to give direction to the attempters, and to lay a plot for his companions.

Amblise.

In October the D. of Bouillon followed with foure hundred horse, two hundred harguebuffiers, before the towne of Beaumont defeated Amblise great Marshall of Lorraine, Lieutenant Generall to the Duke, accompanied with eight hundred horse, and two thousand; he slew the Commander, and about seuen hundred others,ooke their artillery, their ensignes, and their Cornets, sent home foure hundred Lansquenets with white wands, and left not one man of marke. A small fish called Remora staies a great ship: so a paullry hens roult ruins the league in Languedoc and Quercy. The Duke of Ioyeuse (brother to him who died at Contras (having spoyled the Countrey about Montauban with fix hundred masters, and foure thousand foot, French and Lansquenets, in the end became Master of Monbequin, Mombartier, Monbeton, andooke Barre by composition; but in reuenge of so souldiers he had lost before it, (contrary to his faith) he puts most of them that yielded to the sword. A treachery which caused his brothers death, and for the which the vengeance of God shall soone confound this man. The fort of Saint Maurice came in like sort into his power, & then he besieged Villelmur. The Lord of the place called Reniers, commanded about two hundred and fifty souldiers, whom the Lord of Themines Seneschall of Quercy (a wife and valiant Gentleman) relieved suddenly with six and forty men, as well Cuiraisses, as Harguebuffiers, led by the Seigneur of Pedoue: and then (being ioynd with the Duke of Elpernon) he caused Ioyeuse to raise the siege, recovered Mauzac, and some other small places thereabouts.

gritted and debated.

But whilst his troops sleepe at their ease, after the order and manner of the French, with too great confidence and contempt of the enemy, the Duke of Ioyeuse, sets vpon them with all speed in the night, kills foure hundred, hurts a great number of them, and but for the wildome and aduice of Themines had slaine all the rest, and gotten two Cannons of Montauban. This done the D. of Elpernon retires into Prouence. His brother La Pallette died in February, & the Estate of Prouence required the Dukes presence, being Gouernour. Ioyeuse laies hold of this occasion, and the tenth of September returns and camps before Villelmur. Reniers commits the place to the Baron of Mauzac, to Chambert, and La Chaize, wife and valiant Commanders in war: and goes himselfe to gather together some succours at Montauban. The Seigneur of Desme is happily there with some forces, and without any stay puts himselfe into Villelmur. Ioyeuse made his battery of eight Cannons and two Culuerins, when as Themines accompanied with sixscore Masters, and 200 Harguebuffiers, marcheth courageously to succour them, causeth his horsemen to light, and sends their horses safely backe to Montauban, and so with great dexterity, thrusts himselfe into Villelmur. And in good time, for the next day, the 20 of September, Ioyeuse gaue a furious assault, but it was valiantly defended with great losse to the enemy. At the same instant Themines gives an alarm with foure Trumpets which he had brought with him, chargeth Ioyeuse fiercely, and defeats a Regiment newly come from

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency Gouernour of Languedoc supplies the besieged with some troops led by Leques and Chambault, who aduertised of new forces, comes to Ioyeuse, attends some daies for Misillac Gouernour of Auvergne, to ioyne with him. Ioyeuse meanes to prevent them, and before they ioyne with the Auernac, to set vpon them. He chargeth them at Bellegard, and finds the beginning successful and pleasing, but the end foule and mournfull: for hee left the Field, and returned with great losse.

Notwithstanding he meanes to amaze the besieged, and by the counsell of Onoux and B. Themines, polittike Capitaines, he makes many fires in his Campe, as a signe of victory and ioy: but Themines, Leques and Chambault did but laugh at this policy. Misillac arrives at Montauban with a hundred Masters, and a good number of Harguebuffiers. Ioyeuse hauing his troops then disperfed, some before Villelmur, others in Field against the Kings seruants, all the Commanders resolute to fight with him. Misillac leads the forward, Chambault the battell, Leques the reuerward: & the 19 of October they resolutely set vpon the Dukes first trench, by the regiments of Clunzel, and Montoison, guarded by two hundred souldiers, and pretently succoured by foure hundred others, they force them and chase them to their second trench, after an houre and a halles fight: vnder their Commander. The rest of the Kings army comes violently vpon them. Themines issueth out of C. Villelmur and chargeth them behind. He leaves the place and retires farther off to Candoumes, where his Campe and artillery remained. His men seeing themselves pursued, takes this retreat for a flight: they grow amazed, all disband, all fly in disorder, feare makes them to lose their iudgement, and the most part casting themselves into the river of Tar, (the bridge of boats which Ioyeuse had made being vncapable of so great a presse) desired rather to try the fortune of the water, then of the victors sword. They cut the bridge, which was in a manner the death of all them which had trusted in this violent Element. Ioyeuse disappointed of the vse of the bridge, leaps among the rest into the river of Tar, being full of them that fled, and the Tar swallowing vp his body, as the rest, leaves his foule to seek the place of his destiny. The Victors passe the loard, and charge them D that did swim in the water, pursue them that flye, cut all in peeces they encounter, and of so great a number bring but forty three prisoners.

The death of about three thousand men ruined the league in Languedoc and Quercy. Three Cannons, two Culuerins, two and twenty ensignes, and all the baggage, were the spoiles of this to memorable day. And to make it the more memorable, the Victors loit but ten men, wherof foure being not well knowne, did by mistaking run like fortune with the vanquished. Thus Villelmur hauing endured about two thousand Cannon shot, was fully deliuered, with the losse of seenteene souldiers onely. The Dukes body was drawne out of the water and buried in Villelmur, and the Kings army, consisting of five hundred Masters, and two thousand and five hundred foot, besides those which remained in the place besieged, retired (hauing purchased great honour) to their garisons. Thus the leagues affaires began to languish: the impatency and lightnesse of people (who promise vnto themselves much, and suffer little) did quench their great heat which was lately seene in good towne, and the whole party runs headlong to their ruine. They did no more take for payment the assurance which was giuen them to prouide shortly for this common disorder, and by an assembly of the Estates, proceed to the election of a King, who should raise the pillars of their Estate, and restore the good order and harmony that should be betwixt them. The zeale of the new Pope, Clement the eight, moued them very little. The forces and pistolets of Spaine grow barefall vnto them. The actions of the Duke of Mayenne are detested; they abhor the tyrannies which other petty Kings F would practice in their Prouinces, and did well foresee, that the ambition of great men would soone thrust the people into the gulfe of utter ruine, finally euery one begins to lift vp his head, and to desire peace. They speake of ioin in the open Parliament of the league. The chiefe of the City ioyne with them that are desirous of quiet, and in the end procure an assembly of the City of Paris, in the middle of November. They speake very plainly to end these troubles, and to send to treat with the King to that end and purpose: besides (by the death of the Cardinal of Bourbon lately deceased) the pressing & aduancing of this vnto before the nephew, which they pretended, was no more of force.

The D. of Mayenne seeing himselfe ready to be disappointed, goes to the town-houſe, A increaſes the aſſembly to refer the deciſion of that point to the Eſtates, and to forbear to deale therein. Otherwiſe (ſaid he) I ſhall haue reaſon to thinke that the authors ther-of are ill affected to our partie, & will deale with them as with the enemies of our religion.
Norwithſtanding all his threats, it was decreed, that attending a Conuocation of the Eſtates, they ſhould ſend vnto the King to obtaine a free traffike betwixt them and the Townes of this Realme. The Duke not able to impugn this concluſion, ſeemes to allow thereof. This was to recover ſome life after a long numbeſſe and fainting, and to returne to the way of obedience: But the Legate of Rome (a penſioner of Spaine, and the chiefe of the League) hoping to draw the affaires to another courſe, calling from all parts the Deputies of townes confederate, to aſſiſt at the Eſtates at Paris, they ſought all meanes to mortifie theſe motiues of charity to their country, which remained in the moſt modeſt. And the better to aduance their deſignes, they publiſh a certaine writing in forme of a Bull, commanding, and giuing authority to the Cardinall of Placentia to aſſiſt and to con-firme the future election of a new King. This doth ſufficiently diſcouer that which hitherto they haue concealed and kept ſecret, couering (with the pretext of religion) their wicked and damnable conſpiracy, which opened the gates to the ouerthrow and ruine of all order and humane ſociety, inſtituted by God, eſpecially of this moſt famous and flouriſhing Monarchy, whereof the fundamentall law conſiſts chiefly in the order of the law-full ſucceſſion of our Kings.

A ſentence a-gainſt Clement
the eighth his Bull.

The Court of Parliament (being removed from Paris to Châlons, by a decree of the 18 of Nouember, (confirming the requeſt of the Kings Proctor generally) allowed of his appeale from the grant of the ſaid Bull, and authority contained therein, the publication and execution thereof, & whatſoever was therein contained, they decreed that Philip of the title of S. Omphrius, Cardinall of Placentia, ſhould be cited to plead againſt the ſaid appeal.
They exhorted all men not to ſuffer themſelues to be infected with the paylon & witchcraft of ſuch rebels and ſeditious perſons: but to continue in their duties like good and naturall French men, and to retain full the obedience and loue they owe vnto their King and country, not adhering to the practices of ſuch as (vnder the colour of Religion) would inuade and trouble the Eſtate, and bring in the barbarous Spaniards, and other villains.

The Popes Bull
diſannulled.

They did expreſſly inhibit and forbid the keeping of the ſaid Bull, to publiſh it, to ayde or fauour the ſaid rebels, or to tranſport themſelues into any townes or places that might be aſſigned for the ſaid pretended election: vpon paine for the Nobles to be degraded of their Nobility, and they and their poſterity to be declared infamous and baſe; and for the Clergie to loſe the poſſeſſion of their benefices, and to be puniſhed as all other offenders, guilty of treaſon, troublers of the publike peace, traytors to their Country, without hope to obtaine pardon, remiſſion, or abolition. And all townes not to receiue the ſaid rebels and ſeditious to make the ſaid aſſembly, to lodge, entertaine, or harbor them.
Moreover, they decreed, that the place where that reſolution had bene taken, together with the towne of the ſaid aſſembly ſhould be quite razed, without hope to be reedified, for a perpetuall memory of their trechery and treaſon: Commanding all perſons to ſet vpon ſuch as ſhould tranſport themſelues to the ſaid towne, to aſſiſt at this aſſembly:
And to the Proctor generally to informe againſt the authors and procurers of ſuch monopolies and conſpiracies made againſt the Eſtate.

This decree was but laughed at by the heads of the League, and did nothing daunt their private hopes. Every one makes his faction apart. Every one deſired to ſit in his maſters Chaire: and not one would be a ſeruant or companion. The D. of Guiſe, Mayenne, Nemours, and Sauoy, the Marquis of Pent, fought by ſundry practices to get the voyces of the pretended Eſtates. The inſtructions found in the coſers of the Baron of Teneſſey, after his defeat by Vaugrenan, who commanded for the King in S. John de Lanne in Bour-gongne, did ſufficiently diſcouer the high projects which certaine bad Counſellors made this young Prince to conceiue. But about all, the D. of Mayenne, ſuppoſing that after the death of the Duke of Parma (whom he feared as very oppoſite to this authority) this occurrence would giue him meanes to recover his credit, began to play the King within Paris, hoping the Eſtates would prefer him before the younger: or at the leaſt, the title of Lieutenant general to the King of Spaine, could not eſcape him in the conqueſt of peace, he cauſed on Chriſtmas Eue, going vp to the Palace (the City being in armes) the foreſaid decree againſt the Popes Bull to be openly burnt, then by a publike declaration he inuited all the Catholikes of the Realme to vniſe themſelues, and to forſake the obedience which they ſhewed to a Prince, whoſe profeſſion and perſeuerance made him inalmoſt of all the ſcum of the people, of the moſt mutinous and ſeditious: corrupted by mony, and all pretending ſome private profit in change and inuouation. A Parliament compounded of men, which either enjoyed the benefice, the office, or the houſe of their neighbour, or that had ſtolne his goods, or detained his reuenues; or (to conclude) that feared by a peace to be toucht for ſome committed crimes, bankrouers, infamous and wicked. Eſtates, where there appears not one Prince of the blood, no Chanceller, no Maſhall of France, no Prefidents of Soueraigne Courts, none of the Kings Proctors generall in his Parliament: few men of reputation, knowne to haue loued the peoples good, and their owne honours. No men of marke and account, without whom they could not aſſemble, nor hold any iuſt and lawfull Eſtates. Finally, a Parliament where they ſee none but paſſionate ſtrangers, gaping after France, greedy of the blood and wealth thereof; ambitious and reuenging women: corrupt Priests, licentious and full of vaine hopes. No Noblemen of worth, but three or foure, who already had reſolved to abandon that faction. All the reſt were beggarly, louing war and trouble, during the which they ate the poore mans bread, not able to maintain their trains in time of peace, As Italian Legat, and vaſſall to a ſtrange Prince; (who in this quality neither can nor intention was onely, to haue a King choſen that might pacifie the troubles of the realm;

ſoueraigne author and guardian of Eſtates cauſed the preſeruation of this Monarchy to grow. They commended this Ambaſſage, and receiued it with honour. But the pretenti-on of this Infanta were reiecte at the firſt, as a propoſition contrary to the fundamen-tall lawes of the realm. His Agents, ſeeing themſelues fruſtrate of this firſt demand, they frame a ſecond, vpon the election of the Archduke Erneſt, firſt brother to the Emperour, to whom the King of Spaine promiſed to giue his daughter to wife, when as the F aſſembly had declared her Queene of France. But what ſhould become of ſo many competitors growne vp in France? So this propoſition finding no man willing to entertaine it, remained fruitleſſe.

Now ſome thinking to giue the laſt mate to the Kings good fortune, vrge a third expedient: That if they giue this Crowne to the noble Infanta, and to him of the Princes of France, comprehending the houſe of Lorraine, when the King of Spaine ſhould choſe, they would cauſe this election to be ſeconded with an army of eight thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, and within ſew moneths to be fortified with the like numbers, which

which soone should reduce France wholly and peaceably to these new Kings: that they A would giue a hundred thousand Crownes monthly, so long as the war should last, to entertaine ten thousand foot, and three thousand horse within the Realme. Was not this to feed mens minds with fancies, dreames, and imaginations? But no man giues his voice to this last proposition. Doubtlesse there was no proportion to recompence the succours sent by Philip to the revolted townes, with the Crowne of France.

sition was to make matters irreconcilable, and to bring an immortal war into France, and therefore with a feruent zeale and great affection, they opposed themselves against the reception thereof: hoping the eternall providence, who had so often raised France from B most grievous falls of war, and from greater infirmities, would now preuent these latter dangers, otherwise then by the subuersion of the lawes which were made to support it. The declaration which his Maiesty opposed to that of the Duke of Mayenne, did much preuaile to fortifie those good minds in their commendable resolution, and prepared their hearts generally to conceiue a great hope of a speedy peace. For the King discovering the practices of his rebellious subjects, namely of their heads, and the Dukes treachery, presuming to asseemble the Estates of the realme, which may not be called but by royall authority; and for matter of religion, he protesteth, that besides the Conuoca-tion of a Councell, if there be found any better or more speedy meanes to come to the instruction which they pretend to giue him, to diuert him from the exercise of his religion, C to that of the Catholike and Romish, he will willingly embrace it with all his heart, giuing leaue to the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and other Noblemen that did assist him, to send their Deputies to the Pope to deal in this instruction, and to be pleased therewith; and blaming the Leaguers who had hindred the effects, he layed a good foundation of the obedience which his subjects prepared for him. Declaring moreover, this pretended assembly at Paris, to be attempted against the lawes, against the good and quiet of the Realme: and all that should be treated or concluded therein, abusive and of no force. Terming the Duke and his adherents in that case, guilty of high treason; shewing that he could maintain his authority against all usurpers. But offering pardon to all townes, Commonalties, and persons seduced by the chiefs of the league, and exhorting them D to remember themselves, hee made his subjects begin to tast that great and admirable clemency, whereby he hath won the hearts, and brought the affections of the French to a perfect and most voluntary obedience.

To this declaration of his Maiesty, the Princes and Noblemen, Catholikes, that were about him, added another, which they sent to these pretended Estates, and required that some should be deputed on either part, to resolve of the fittest expedients to pacifie these troubles, for the preleruation of the Catholike religion and the Estate. The Duke of Mayenne and his party accept of this conference, so as it may be done by Catholikes onely, and it began the twenty ninth of Aprill at Surene near Paris. Whilst the good Cardinal of Bourbon liued, he was an instrument for the League: now hee is dead, Religion is their onely pretext. And the more the King giues them hope of his conuersion to the Romish Church, the more violent they are to draw the people from this beleefe.

The Legate seemes to crosse it, and by a publike exhortation full of iniuries against his Maiesty, hee labours to perswade the French, that the King long since dismembred from the body of the Church, was most iustly pronounced incapable of the Crowne. Then opposing himselfe against the decrees of the Parliaments of Tours and Chalons, made against the monities of Landriano, he extolls his Masters praises, condemnes the Parliament which had condemned his Bulls, magnifies the Estates of the League, who reiect an obstinate heretike and relaps, with a resolution neuer to yeeld vnto him; for (saide he) such is the Popes will and pleasure. But why aretaps and obstinate, considering the due submission which our Henry makes to yeeld to better instruction? The Pope himselfe will hearken soone vnto him, and all the Consistory will bleesse his resolution.

Both the Duke and Legate preuaile little in their deuices. Those which held the first place in this assembly, and had no other care but to preferre this Monarchy, found this expedient: that to frustrate the former propositions, they should say to the Duke of Feria and

A and other ministers of Spaine, that it would be now out of Season, and dangerous to make this election: and that the assembly refused the conclusion thereof, vntill they might see an army ready, by meanes whereof their resolutions might be supported and put in execution. Courage! This calme promisseth that wee shall soone anchor in a safe harbour. And that which advanceth the ship of our estate with a more prosperous gale, That great and magnificent Senate of France remaining at Paris, resumes their credit, and the beauty of their scarle Robs: they exhort the D. of Mayenne to employ his authority of Lieutenant, that vnder colour of Religion, the Crowne fall not into strangers hands, against the lawes of the realme, and to provide speedily for the peoples quiet, and B by a decree of the 28 of Iuly, they declare all treaties made, or to be made to that end, void, and of no validity, as being made to the hurt and prejudice of the Salique Law, and other fundamentall lawes of State.

Paris.

This decree did wonderfully incense the Duke of Mayenne and the agents of Spaine, especially against the President Le Maistre who deliuered the speeches: who encountering all their chollers, left them to bye vpon the bridle. But see now the fatal blow which runs that third party, by the which Catholikes were ready to thrust the realme into new combustions, and cuts off all difficulties as well in them which made a scruple to fight vnder the ensignes of a King of any other religion then their owne, as in others which had so long time shadowed their mutinies and rebellions with this goodly pretext. The King, C after the taking of Dreux, satisfied in his conscience, by the instruction of the Archbishop of Bourges, of René Benoist Curate of S. Eustache in Paris, and of some other Doctors, desires to be admitted into the bosome of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and the twenty nine of Iuly made a publike and solemne profession at S. Denis to the said Archbishop, assisted by Charles Cardinal of Bourbon, Archbishop of Rouan, and Nephew to the deceased, nine Bishops, with many other Prelats and religious men: he professed to liue and die in the Catholike religion, swearing to defend it against all men: he made profession of his faith, and performed all ceremonies requisite in solemne an act: and then hee received absolution and blessing with an admirable ioy and acclamation of the people.

The Kings con-
uersion.

D Presently after this solemne act, his Maiesty sent the D. of Neuers, the Marquis of Pisani, and Henry of Gondy Bishop of Paris to the Pope, to yeeld obedience by them to the holy Sea, and to testifie, that he desired no less to imitate the example of Kings his Predecessors, and to deserue the title and ranke of the first Son of the Church by his actions, then they had beene carefull to get it and preferre it, and to beseech him to allow of his conuersion, and to countenance it with his owne blessing. This is that great action of State which the chiefs of the league most feared: for what could they now object against the King, to contradict his right, & to tearm him incapable of his inheritance? See now by what subtilty they seeke to crosse his Maiesties affaires, and to support strangers. They complain first of his sudden change, and say they may not trust him: that his Ho-
E lineesse must begin and end this worke. That the King should make all submissions to the Sea of Rome, and attend if the Consistory would declare him capable to gouerne the Realme of France. That hauing command from the Conclauet they would aduice to do what should be reason. Vntill the which were effected they would not treat any more with the Kings Deputies, and till that this change of religion which the King had made, were approved by the Pope, whereof afterwards they would take aduice, for adurance of the preferment of the onely Catholike Religion in this Realme.

The D. of Mayenne hauing (to his great prejudice) so often tryed the proud insolencies of the Spaniards, and since knowne that their practices tended only to feed a perpetuall fire of diuision among the French, by meanes of the election of a new King, whom they promised to marie to the Infanta, had often protested, that when he should see the Kings return into the bosom of the church, for the which his religion had excluded him, he would presently yeeld him obedience as his most humble seruant. The Kings conuersion doth now free him of this imaginary scruple. The King himselfe offering him offices and honorable aduancements, seekes to draw him out of those snares from the which hee would willingly bee freed. But hee is so farre engaged as hee can hardly retire himselfe: and some hope that the decisions of Rome, the resolutions of the Estates, the conclusions of the Colledge of Sorbonne, and the practices of

Mayenne feels to cross his Nephew.

Spaine, would yett worke some good effects in his fauour, doth withhold him from accepting of his Maieities offers.

But on the other side, he cannot digest the aduancement of the D. of Guise, whose marriage with the Infanta the partisans of Spaine did solicit, as being heire to his fathers pretensions. And to ouerthrow it, he seems in generall rearmes to approve for great an honour done vnto his Nephew: but requiring for his owne particular so high and difficult things, he giues them easily to vnderstand, that he will not subiect his will to the appetites of Pope Clement, nor of Philip King of Spaine, neither yett to the decision of the Estates, which that he crosseth the propounded election at the D. of Guise. The conference at Surene giues the subiect meanes to raise the liberty of the fields, and the sweetness of peace, concluding the last of Iuly a generall suspension of armes on either side for three moneths, a meanes which shall soone reduce whole Prouinces withdrawn from their ancient obedience. In the meane time, the more the Agents of Spaine see their practises disappointed, the more vehement they are that the Court of Rome should giue no audience to the Kings submission.

They oppose themselves by the meanes of the Ambassador of Spain at Rome, against the negotiation of the Kings Ambassadors with the Pope. They speake of his Maieities conuersion, as of a counterfeit thing to decieve the Church, and after his confirmation to ruine the Catholike religion. To conclude, to doe their best to quench these coals of charity, which were kindled in the peoples hearts, and cause the Pope to reject this faithfull and willing obedience, wherby the King will shew himselfe a successor of the piety of Clauis, Charlemagne, and Saint Lewis, as well as heire of their Scepter.

Peter barriere.

But see one of the most violent attempts of the league, which had almost dissolved this harmony, which was prepared by a generall reconciliation of the French among themselves, and of them to their lawfull and Soueraigne Lord. The 26 of August Peter barriere borne at Orleans was taken prisoner at Melun, where his Maieisty was then, by the discovery of a Iacobin a Florentine, to whom he had confessed himself in Lions; (the Priest revealing this crime, incurs no Ecclesiasticall censure) he confessed, that seduced and perswaded by a Capuchin of Lions, and afterwards confessed by Andry Curate of S. Andreu des Aris at Paris, by his Vicar, and by father Parade a Iesuite, he was come thither expressly to murder the King. And in truth, the wretch was found seized of a sharpe knife with two edges: and for this cause he was pinched with hot pincers, his right hand burnt off, holding the said knife: his armes, legs, and thighs broken, and his body burnt to ashes, and cast into the riuer.

The like treason practised by the Duke of Mercuer, whereof the chiefe were the Marquis of Afferac, of the house of Rieux, the Seigneurs of Crapadant and Bois-marin, had entrapp Henry of Bourbon D. of Montpensier (who made war in Britany for the King) and the Parliament of Rhemes, if the discovery in time had not brought these three heads to a publike scaffold, and many others to the gallows.

Reuoluit Lions
of Nemours.

Whilst the Agents of Spaine labor for this election, and their partisans dotting, will doe as the Frogs, who weary of their quiet King, made choise of the Stork, which in the end deuoured them all: the D. of Nemours made his faction apart, and seeing that by the nomination of these goodly Estates hee should be excluded from his pretensions: knowing moreover that his brother on the mothers side, did crosse all his designs, and bare him no good affection, he resolved to canton himselfe in his government, and by many and sundry forts both on the water and land, to plant his fortunes there. Already the Citadels and Forts he held at Toiflay, Vienne, Montbrison, Chassignon in Dombes, Belluilla, Tify, Charlieu, and else where, threatened all Lionois with seruitude, if the Lord of S. Julian would haue sold him Quirien for ready money: whom in the end (thrill on by the perswasions and presence of their Archbishop, sent by the Duke of Mayenne, with this Commission among others) they force into his house, and the eighteenth day of September put him with a guard, into a straight prison in the Castle of Pierre-ancise, from whence in the end disguised, (playing the part of a groomme of the Chamber which carried forth the excrements of his Master) he passed through the guards, turning away his face more for feare of being knowne, then for the ill smell: and escaping from them the three and twentieth of March following, being dispossessed of all his meanes, and expelled from his places, he went and died in Asee, a house of his owne, in the Countie

A of Geneva in Sauoy, not without suspicion of being poysoned at a Feast that was made him.

This generall surceasing of armes prolonged vnto the end of the yeare, and religiously obserued on either side brought a great quiet to France, and gaue the King leisure to assemble some of the chiefe of the Realme at Manté, to consult vpon sundry affaires, and particularly to heare the complaints of such as stood in doubt of the Kings change in religion, and were grieved at diuers contrauentions of his Maieities Edicts, whereby they suffered many wrongs in all Prouinces: for the partisans of Spaine, for their last refuge, continually exclaimed of the incompatibility of two Religions in France, and many expressed this opinion: That the King ought not to be admitted, but he should promise expressly to banish all such as made profession of any other Religion then that which hee did embrace, or at the least to abolish all publike exercise. But the King employed all his care to vnite his people in accord: and this new change did nothing alter the affection which hee beare indifferently to all, as a common father of his subiects.

Mante.

Thus armes were laid aside, whilst the Lord of Des Digueues hauing beaten the Saouoyard in diuers encounters in Prouence, in Dauphine, vpon the frontiers, and in Saouoy vpon his owne land, conquered many places in Piedmont, & lately succoured Caours, which the Duke had besieged two months, gaue great hope to force this neighbour enemy soone to yeeld what he had lately usurped of this Crown, if he had bene supplied with men, munition and money, and if some priuate seeds of new combutions had not drawn him away, to quench those fires which threatened to consume Prouence.

By what meanes and degrees, the Townes subiect vnto the League, returned to the obedience of this Crowne: and the Spaniard chased out of this Realme.

But courage oh my Country-men! After a long and sharpe winter, wee begin to feelee a pleasant Spring. As the Sunne rising on his horizon encreased in heate and brightnesse, so the people are ready to embrace the French liberty: their naturall affection to their lawfull Prince reuiues: now we shall see them which made the wound, giue the remedy: the French strue now to submit themselves vnto their King, and the king to receiue his subiects with an admirable clemency and fatherly affection. The Lord of Vitry giues the first checke vnto the Spaniard, The sundry conferences hee had had with his Maieisty before Paris and elsewhere, doe now worke a great effect: for deliuering the towne of Meaux to the King as a New-yeares gift, he gaue a plausible beginning to this yeare, and made the way for the Lord of La Chastre, his Vncle, at Shroftide to bring vnto his Maieisty two goodly Duchesses at once, of Orleans, and of Berry. And to summon Monsieur De Villars to follow these commendables example, he writes vnto him, I haue giuen a New-yeares gift vnto the King, Monsieur de la Chastre hath feasted him at Shrouside: shew you your selfe vnto him on horse backe at mid lent: which letter shall soone take effect. Some townes practised by the heads of the league, demand a continuance of the truce, but it was onely to prolong the miseries of France. The King therefore doth publish a declaration, shewing the wicked and damnable practises of the Leaguers, who vnder the continuance of a truce, would confirme their tyranny. Hee prescribes to all in generall one moneth of respite to acknowledge their lawfull King, and to performe all necessary submissions, to be restored to their charges, benefices, goods, and liberties. He condemnes the Rebels, and reuokes his pardon, the time being expired. The brute of this declaration, and the Kings preparatiues to punish the obdurate, terrified the heads, and the most part of the townes and commonalties, yet he was content to hold the staffe, but not to strike: and the prouidence of God conducted the worke of this restauration, by other then violent meanes. The Duke of Mayenne sought all meanes to auoid this blow, but he found no force able to preuent it. So this vnion cemented together, with so many shifts, oaths and coniurations, is dismembered on all sides: the most obdurate apprehend their totall ruine, if they persist in their rebellion.

The

There was one thing very necessary to seale the generall approbation of the Kings lawfull authority. He was not yet anointed, nor crowned, and the want hereof (as if the Coronation were the essentiall forme of a Royalty) ferred yet as a make to many to with-hold their obedience. It is good in some things to please the peoples humour, and doubtelesse the end will shew, that this solemne action did serue as a bright Lanterne to guide them to the Port of obedience, which had refused to yield.

And for that the rebellion of Rheims had shut the gates against him, Chartres was the Rendezvous of this solemne Ceremony, and the Abbey of Marmoussier furnished the Oyle, which they keepe religiously in the holy Voyall, with the like vie and vertue, as in former times. Raoul was anointed at Soissons, Lewis the fourth at Lions, Hugues at Compeigne, and Lewis the young likewise at Chartres. Thus was our Henry anointed in Chartres by Nicholas Thou Bishop of the same place, the 27 of February, in the presence of the Prince Conny, the Earle of Soissons, and the D. of Montpensier, Princes of the blood, of the Dukes of Longueville, Luxembourg, Retz, of Vantadour, and of the Earle of S. Paul. Of the Bishops of Angers, Orleans, Nantes, Maillezais, and Beauvais, The Marshall of Matignon supplied the Office of Constable; the D. of Longueville, of Lord Steward; and the Earle of S. Paul his brother, of Lord Chamberlaine. The next day his Maiesty receiued the Order of the Holy ghost by the hands of the Bishop of Chartres. Let vs now see the fruits of this solemnity. The townes and commonalities of the League begin to tremble, and the most part determine to send their Deputies to his Maiesty being resolved to receiue his commandments.

Mistortune is good for something. The Marquis of S. Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours (being yet a prisoner) afflicted the Inhabitants of Lions with all acts of hostility. The King of Spaine on the other side confirmed his intelligences more strictly with them of his faction: and gave them assurance by the D. of Terra-nova, Governour of Milan, of a leauy of twelue hundred Suffies, the which with other forces he would thrust into the towne, vnder pretext to succour it against the violencies of the Marquis, but hauing drawne them in amongst the Inhabitants, he should through the fauour of the partisans of Spaine, make himself Master of the town. Lions was now ready to fall vnder the rule and tyranny of a stranger: but God thus vp means beyond mans reason. Some good men alwaies well affected to France in their hearts, with the consent of foure Sherifes, resolute to seeke the meanes to draw the towne to his Maiesties obedience.

They acquaint Colonell Alphonso with their enterprize, who giues them assurance of his fauour and succour in so good an occasion, the seuenth of Ianuary hee comes to the suburbs of Guilloitiere with goodly troops. And the same day betwixt three and foure of the clock in the morning, Jaquet one of the Sherifes, assisted by the Seigneurs of Liergues and de Sene (followed by a good number of armed men) force a guard placed at the foot of the bridge vpon Saone, and constrain them to leaue the place. The towne is in armes, they make barricados in their streets. Such as were of this enterprize, repaire to the quarters that were assigned them: every man desireth the liberty of France. They seize vpon the Arcenall, and vpon the most factious Officers and Captains of the town. All the people wear white scarfes & fethers. That happy cry of, God save the King, sounds in the ayre. They make Bone-fires in all places, they burne the arms and livery of Spaine, Sauoy and Nemours, and the picture of the league in forme of a witch, and set vp the Kings in all places. Hereupon Alphonso entred the towne, accompanied with d'Andelet, Chenrieres, Saint Forisuel, Botheon, la Liegue, Banne de Mures, with many other Gentlemen of the Country: and for the finishing of so good a worke, he deposed the suspected Capitaines of the towne, receiued the oath of fealty to the King of such as he did substitute in their places: and afterwards the counsell of the towne did resolute and sweare neuer to admit any Italians, or Sauoyiens to publike charges: Nations which had most nourished the fire of vnciuill rebellion within their city. The like broile in a manner recovered the obedience of the towne and Parliament of Aix in Prouence to his Maiesty. The D. of Epsernon built a Cittadel there to keepe them in awe, with whose humors they

A they could not well agree. Mortouer, he was not in good termes with the King, and seemed to pretend some inuocation to the prejudice of the Kings affaires. The Nobility of the Country grew also in hatred against him, and from their secret discontentes grew to open armes to expell him the country, whereupon they made a protestation for their taking armes against him.

Hereupon they had called vnto them Les Diquieres, and the King commands him to goe with speed, and to oppose his forces against the Dukes in Prouence. He wanted men, money, and necessary prouisions, to entertaine that which he had exploited in Piedmont: he therefore furnishesth the places he held, as the time would suffer him, and goes to croise Epsernon, razed the fort he built against the towne of Aix, and reduced the Inhabitants to their ancient obedience.

The miraculous reduction of Paris to his Maiesties obedience.

Amiddest for many happy Catastrophe's for the restoring of this Monarchie, some notable Inhabitants of Paris, which loued the Flower-de-luce in their foules, made the way to free it from the rule of Strangers: but many difficulties crossed the meanes they gaue vnto the King, who employed all his designes to recouer the ancient throne of his Predecessors by the mildest meanes he could. Paris was neuer without some Prince of the house of Lorraine: and about foure thousand French, Spaniards, Italians, Lansquenets, and Wallons, kept the City in subiection. Seeing then that of many enterprises, not one could succeed happily, neither might they attempt it by open force, without a horrible effusion of blood, and bringing the City in danger of extreme defolation, a surprize was therefore necessary.

It was now almost ready to be effected, by the meanes especially of the Lord of Belin Governour of Paris, of Martin Langlois, Seigneur of Beauprepaire, one of the Sherifes of Paris for that year, and some others, of whom they had assurance for the execution of their proiect, as well of the City, as of the Souldiers practised long before. But the Duke of Mayenne being aduertised that the said Belin had intelligence with the King, puts him from his gouernment, and doth substitute in his place the Earle of Brisac: and to fortifie the garison with strangers, he causeth fourteen hundred natural Spaniards to approach. By this displacing of the Lord of Belin, all their first designes are made frustrate: but the Earles humor was found apt to vnite them. Hee sought the means to bring to light the effects which he had resolved to purge the ill opinion of times past. As Langlois attended some fauourable opportunity to discouer himselfe to the said Earle, his Maiesty sends him word that he is agreed with him, that he should not feare to open himselfe vnto him touching the meanes he had plotted with Belin. He confers with the Earle, lets him vnderstand such as be of the intelligence, and they resolute together, That to bring the King in without effusion of blood, (as he desired) the Eue before the execution they should carry some stuffe to the new gate, that vnder colour to wall it vp, they should draw away the gabions that stopp the gate: that in the night they should cut away the earth which stopp that of Saint Denis, so to seize on the one and the other. That the Sheriffe Neras with his children should take S. Honoriers gate, whereof hee had the keyes, and draw in a good number of men of war to fauour the enterprize; and that by Saint Denis gate should enter another troope of armed men, as well to seize on the Gate, as on the Rampar of either side, to make a barre betwixt the Spaniards and the Wallons, and keepe them from ioyning. They keepe two guards nere Saint Denis Gate, one at Saint Ensfacc Croisse, and the other at the Temple. At the same instant the garisons of Melun and Corbeil should enter by Boate at the Bulwarke by the Celestins, and should be receiued by John Groslier, and by the Lieutenant general of the artilery remaining in the Arcenall. And to auoide a popular tumult, a brute should be fyred abroad of a peace betwixt the King and the Duke of Mayenne, whom (vnder colour of the peoples ialousies of the Spaniards, which he had caused to approach vnto Beauuois) they had found meanes to send out of Paris, with promise to cause them to retire. That ouer-night they should glue tickets to the chief whom they knew desirous of a peace, (as for the multitude of factions, and the partisans of Spaine, they durst not speake openly vnto them to bring in the King, and some that were desirous of peace, could not rest assured of his clemency and bounty by the which they should be aduertised of the accord, and intreated to arme with their friends, for the bringing in of the Deputies of either part, which should come in the morning to make the publication, and resist the Spaniards that would oppose themselves. So it was decreed, and so executed.

This order being resolved on, it was imparted to those with whom the enterprize had bene long before concluded, by the meanes of the Lord of Vicques then Gouverneur of S. Denis, to whom the greatest honour is due, both for that all the associates did rely vpon him, and daily were aduertised and encouraged by him, and also for that he did carry himselfe so wisely in S. Denis, as he was more gouernour of Paris, then of S. Denis. The 19 of March, the Secretaries of the Lords of Brissac and S. Luke, carie it to Senlis to the King, with a plot of the City, setting downe the places of the strangers guards, and of the Partisans. They are searched going out of the towne, but they remember not to looke into their gloves, where their instructions were written by the hand of the said Langlois the Sheriffe. The King gives them aduice for the execution, the night before the two and twentieth day of the month, about foure of the clocke he finds all things ready, and the new gate, and S. Denis gate at his deuotion. He enters with his troops led by the Lords of Humieres, Belin, Vicques, and Fauas, at the same Gate by the which the deceased King parted mournfully out of Paris. At the same instant the Lord of Vitry comes with a troupe of men at armes to S. Denis gate, beats backe the strangers, who made resistance vpon the rampart, enters the towne, lets guards at the gate, and on the rampars, then passing through S. Denis Street, he encounters his Maiesty, whose troops were come to S. Michaels bridge, and before the Palace.

Thus according to the oath which his Maiesty had taken of the Captaines of every company, Not to doe or suffer any inoleny or outrage to any Citizen, but to such as should obstinately make resistance, all his troops enter without disorder, without murder, without spoile, and by their perfect obedience testifie how great his authority is that commands ouer them. The King being seized of the Louure, the Palace, both Chastelets, and other chiefe places of the City, and assured of the D. of Feria and his strangers, he went armed with his Caske on his head, with an incredible concourse and ioy of the people, to our Ladies Church, and there gave solenne thanks to the Soueraigne Protector of this monarchy: who hauing as it were led him by the hand, by such extraordinary and miraculous meanes, into the capitall city of the Realme, gaue him hope that he should soone chase the stranger out of his inheritance, and peaceably enjoy the throne of his predecessors. In the meane time the Earle of Brissac, John Lhuillier Master of the accounts, and Prouost of the Merchants, with the Sheriffe Langlois, accompanied with the Heraldes, went through the City, proclaiming the Kings generall pardon: causing them to take white scarfes, and gaue tickets printed at S. Denis, containing an abolition of all offences past. So as in lesse then two houres all the City was quiet, every man went to his ordinary exercise, the Shops were opened, as if there had bene no alteration, and the townes-men grew familiar with the men of war. There was nothing but signes of wonderfull ioy and loue: the bitterneffe of the proud and insolent command of the Spaniards, made the Parisiens to taste the sweetnesse of the fatherly rule of their Kings, and these deterf him as an enemy, who lately feared and respected him as a Master.

A happy and famous day, wherein the people (lately so contrary and full of cruelty) reduced to that misery as they durst not sigh in their misery, exceeding glad to see a meane to enjoy their ancient liberty, know not with what acclamations to receive their peacefull and gracious King, who by his wonderfull clemency washing away the blemishes wherewith Paris had bene vnworthily polluted, made the inhabitants, of slaues, Citizens; restores them their wives, children, goods, honours, Magistrates, and liberties, and gives peace to them who lately held it a crime to demand bread onely, and capitall to demand bread and peace together. His Maiesty suffered the Duke of Feria, Don Diego with other Commanders and men of war, to depart with their baggage, their marches out, and their armes downe. The Basille made some shew of resistance: but as all was prepared to force it, and that their vittuals (which were purposely kept backe) began to faile them, de Bourg hauing the command thereof, yielded it three daies after: and

He confirmed all the companies of the City, and did annulle the delarations which had bene published in the month of March 1589: hee restored the Lord d'O to his government, from the which the generall revolt had expelled him: he appointed him to goe to the towne-house, to take an oath of the Officers in the presence of Master François Miron, one of the Kings priuie Councell, Master of Requests, and President of the great Council, Ouer-see of the discipline of the Kings armies, and appointed to assist him. And the Earle of Chateaux Chancelor of France, assisted with the Siegneurs of Ris, Pontecarre, Miron, and other Councellors of the Priuie Council, & Masters of Requests of the Kings house, to the number of twelue, went to the palace, and caused the letters of re-establishment of the Court of Parliament to bee read, and at the instance of Loisell, appointed in the absence of the Kings Officers, they took the oath of all the Presidents, Councellors, and Officers of the said Court, before the returne of the Parliament, removed to Tours in the yeare 1589. And so in like sort to other companies, the Chamber of Accounts, Court of Aydes, and chamber of the money, to whom Councellors were sent to doe the like as to the Parliament, and to continue their places and dignities, with the other Officers resident at Tours, whom this happy reduction brought within few weekes after to their ancient seat of Iustice. Paris being freed from the command of strangers, and reduced vnder the obedience of their naturall & lawfull King, it was needfull to repara that which the liberty of war had changed, touching the lawes and grounds of the Estate, and the rights and honors of the Crowne. To this end, the court of Parliament lately established, reuokes, and did annuls by a decree of the 30 of March, all other decrees, orders or oaths giuen or made since the 29 of December, 1588, to the preiudice of the Kings authority, and the lawes of the realme, decreeing that as things forced by violence, they should remaine suppressed for euer. And especially they did annulle all that had bene done against the honor of the deceased King, as well during his life, as after his decease: forbidding all persons to speake of his memory, but with honor and respect: commanding to informe of the detestable particide committed on his person, and to proceed extraordinarily against such as should be found culpable.

They reuoked the authority giuen to the Duke of Mayenne vnder the title of Lieutenant generall of the Estate and Crown of France, forbidding all men to acknowledge him with that quality, to yeeld him any obedience, fauor, comfort or aide, vpon paine of high Treason. They likewise enioyned the Duke of Mayenne, vpon the like paines, and other Princes of the house of Lorraine, to acknowledge King Henry the fourth of that name, King of France and Nauarre, for their King; and to yeeld him the obedience of faithfull seruants and subiects. And to all other Princes, Prelats, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Townes, Commonalties, and priuate men, to forsake that pretended faction of the League, whereof the Duke of Mayenne had made himselfe the head, and to yeeld vnto the Kings obedience, feruice and fealty, vpon paine to the said Princes, Prelats, Noblemen, and Gentlemen, to be degraded of their Nobility and Gentry, and they and their posterity declared base, with confiscation of bodies and goods: and the razing of their Townes, Castles, and places, that should infringe the Kings Ordinances & commandements. They reuoked and did annulle all that had bene done or decreed by the pretended Deputies of the Assembly held at Paris, vnder the names of the generall Estates of the Realme, as void, done by priuate persons, chosen or suborned for the most part by the factious of this Realme, and partisans to the Spaniard, hauing no lawfull power: forbidding the said pretended Deputies to take vpon them this quality, and to assemble any more in the said City, or elsewhere, vpon paine to be punished as troublers of the publike quiet, and guilty of high Treason. They enioyned such of the pretended Deputies as were yet resident at Paris, to retire home to their houses, to liue there vnder the Kings obedience, and to take the oath of fealty before the Iudges of those places. Moreover, they decreed, that all processions and solemnities instituted during the troubles, should cease, and in stead thereof, the two and twentieth day of March should bee for euer celebrated, and the same day a generall procession should be made after the accustomed manner, where the said Court should assist in their scarlet robes, as a remembrance, to giue God thanks for the happy reduction of this said City to the Kings obedience.

As the Vniuersity by their trecherous decision had before countenanced and supported the Parisiens insolencies and mutinies, so now by their humble and due submission, of their owne proper motion, they seek to repair the crime they had committed. Lamés d'Ambais's Doctor in Physicke, chiefe Rector, chosen since the reduction of Paris, the Deane and the Doctors of Sorbonne, the Deanes and Doctors of other faculties, all the members and officers of the Vniuersity, come to the King to yeeld him a testimonie of their loue, and finding him in the Chappell of Bourbon, prostrate before his Maiestie, they acknowledge him their true and only naturall Prince, swear to bee obedient and faithfull seruants to him for euer, and beseech him (as to his other people which submit themselves like good and loyall subiects) to extend his fauor vnto them. The Kings owne disposition did moue him, but the place did inuite him to this pardon. He protefts before God, to be as ready to remit the offences of others, as he desired Gods diuine Maiesty to be mercifull vnto his. So he receiued them, and sent them home graciously, granting them this Edict following.

HENRY by the Grace of God, King of France, and of Nauarre, to whom these presents shall come greeting: As it hath alwaies beene our desire and intent, (since it pleased God to call vs to this Crowne) to settle a good and assured peace in this our Realme, to the end that the disorders, violences and miseries of warre ceasing, God might be serued according to his holy Commandements, and the authority of the lawes and of our iustice restored, vnder the protection whereof, the three Estates of our Realme may happily enjoy with peace that which doth iustly belong vnto them. To attaine vnto the which, we haue (as euery man knoweth) employed all our meanes, with the hazard of our life, preferring death before the blame and infamy which would iustly fall vpon vs, if wee should suffer the vniuſt vſurpation and diſſipation which some pretend to make of this Crowne. And not to omit any thing which is in the power of a good Prince, for the settling of peace and vniſon among our ſubiects, ſo neceſſary and ſo much deſired of all good Frenchmen, we haue with much patience ſupported & giuen vnto the publike, the offences and raſh attempts of many, who without this reſpect, haue deſerued ſeuere and exemplary puniſhments. Wee haue for this conſideration after diuers victories, pardoned them which haue attempted againſt our life. And for the great compaſſion which wee haue had of the Capitall City of our Realme, to auoyde the ſacke, and ſpare the blood of many good Citizens which did not participate in the wicked deſignes of ſuch as did nourish rebellion, we haue choſen rather to bee fruſtrate of the obedience which was due vnto vs, then to ſee innocent men which dwell there, with the women and little infants, and ſo many goodly buildings, expoſed to the violent rage and fury of ſire and ſword. Hauing moreover, for this conſideration granted in Iuly laſt a generall truce for three moneths, during the which the Deputies of that party which doth not obey vs, did aſſure vs that they would ſend ſpeedily vnto the Pope, to haue his aduice vpon the reſolution which they were to take, in the concluſion of a good and durable peace and reconciliation with vs, who am their King and naturall Prince. Wherein they alſo promiſed to employ themſelves with all loyalty and affection, to ſettle a peace in this Realme, the which made vs more eaſie to yeeld vnto the ſaid truce, although we knew well how much we were preiudiced thereby, & what great aduantage we might haue had by armes: hauing (during the parlee of peace) taken Dreux in view of the chiefe of their party, being aſſiſted by their Protectors of Spaine. At which time we wanted no meanes to preſſe the City of Paris in ſuch fort, as neceſſity ſhould in the end haue aduſed them to ſhake off the yoke of ſuch as had ſo long tyrannized, and inſolently abuſed their miſerable patience. But we yeelded of our authority, to the end the Pope might bee ſatisfied, and truly informed of all our actions, to whom our intent was to haue recourſe to diſcouer our wounds, and to implore his aide, fauor, counſell and aſſiſtance: and to that end wee made choiſe of our deare and welbeloued Couſin the Duke of Neuers, a Prince full of all vertues, wiſdomes, piety, and of great merit: who preferring the ſeruiſe of God, and the good of this Eſtate, before the diſcommodities of his health, and the tediousneſſe of the way, had courageouſly vader-

A vnder taken a voyage to his Holineſſe. And as for the Deputies of the ſaid party, whom they promiſed confidently to ſend with all expedition; Wee doe not find that during the truce, they made any accompt to diſpatch them. And notwithstanding that ſince the concluſion of the ſaid truce, we haue not diſcouered in all their actions, but deſignes preiudiciall to the publike good of the Realme, with whoſe ſpoiles they pretended to cloath and to enrich themſelves with the blood and meanes of good and loyall Frenchmen: there being fallen into our hands a certaine oath made by the chiefe of the ſaid party, in a manner at the ſame time when as they ſigned the truce, and promiſed to treat faithfully touching a good peace, and to reconcile themſelves vnto vs, and to that end to ſend to Rome to haue the Popes aduice: The ſaid oath containing, that they would neuer treat any peace with vs, wherein they ſuffered themſelves to be ſo tranſported by the paſſions of the King of Spaines Miniſters, as they made no reſeruation of the Popes authority, vnto whom they ſaid they would ſend: wherewith being iuſtly incended, notwithstanding at their great inſtance, and to iuſtifie our actions vnto the Pope, we granted them a prolongation of the truce for two moneths. But conceiuing how little they deſire to ſee an end of the miſeries of this Realme, with the authority they haue vniuſtly vſurped ouer part of it: Iudging alſo by their cunning delayes, that they ſeek nothing but to prolong the miſeries of France, and to aſſure their vniuſt vſurpation: Wee haue therefore with the aduice of our Councell, reſuſed a prolongation of the truce for 3 moneths more, which they required of vs, with ſuch importunity, as wee haue iuſt cauſe to beleue, that this purſuite was not to purchaſe a peace, but rather that during the ſaid time, the King of Spaines forces, being come vnto the frontier of our Country of Picardy, they ſhould haue better meanes to reuiue the warre, to the ruine of our good and loyall ſubiects: the which God by his grace would not ſuffer, cauſing vs to ſee plainly (by the letters which were intercepted) their wicked deſignes to continue the miſeries of this our Realme. His diuine bounty hauing taken the defence of our iuſt cauſe into his protection, moued an infinite number of our good ſubiects to acknowledge their naturall duty, in the reduction of the Townes of Meaux, Lion, Orleans, Bourges, Pontoiſe, and others to our obedience. But the memory ſhall neuer bee loſt of the happy reduction of our good City of Paris, the chiefe of our Realme, which happened the 22 of March, with ſuch mildneſſe, and order, as not any one Citizen can iuſtly complaine of wrong. The peoples ioy and acclamations, which haue ſeene their King ſo much deſired, was not leſſe, then if they had had the ſame ſecurity which is giuen them by theſe preſents, of our grace, fauor, protection, and forgetting of things paſt, with aſſurance that the merits of ſuch as ſhewed themſelves faithfull to our ſeruiſe ſhall neuer be forgotten. The which conſidering, and the ſpeciall bounty wherewith it hath pleaſed God to fauour vs in this occaſion, wee hold our ſelves bound more then any man liuing, to make our actions pleaſing to his diuine prouidence. For this cauſe, acknowledging that there is nothing makes vs more like vnto God, then clemency, forgetting freely all offences paſt: we declare by theſe preſents, that we receiue into grace, the Citizens of our good City of Paris, and of our ſpeciall fauor and royall authority, doe aboliſh all things hapned in the ſaid City, during, and by reaſon of the preſent troubles, the which we will ſhall remaine extinct, and held as if they had neuer hapned.

And to this end, with the aduice of the Princes and Noblemen of his Councell, he ordained, That within the City and Suburbs of Paris, or within ten leagues round about, the Romiſh religion ſhould be only exerciſed. That no Clergie men ſhould be moleſted in the exerciſe of his function; That they ſhould freely enjoy the reuenues of their Benefices, and be reſtored vnto that which belonged vnto their Churches. Moreover, hee reſtored the City of Paris to al her ancient rights, liberties and immunities, to enjoy them as they formerly had done. All matters were remitted which concerned the inhabitants, and had beene committed during the troubles, if within eight daies after publication of this Edict, they came and rooke the oath of Allegiance. All iudgements and ſentences giuen againſt the Earle of Briſſac were reuoked. The Inhabitants which ſhould performe their due ſubmiſſions and take the oath, were reſtored to the poſſeſſion of their goods, offices, dignities, and reuenues: and all grants made to the preiudice thereof reuoked. There were many other Articles tending to the good of the Parisiens, and the ſetting of a quiet eſtate within the City.

Diuers reductions in diuers places.

Paris gaue example to all the rest of the Realme. And the first fruits of this happy rebellion began to ripen in the hearts of other Townes and Commonalties. So the months of April and May were spent to receive the submissions of diuers Prouinces, and drawing to the Kings obedience, many Captaines, Gentlemen, Noblemen and other chiefe pillars of the league: so as every bird hauing his feather, the Crow in the fable remained in the end naked: The Lord of Villars submits himselfe to his Soueraigne Lord, and yielding him the townes of Rouan, New-hauen, Harfieu, Montiuillier, Pontoile de Mer, and Verneuil: he obtains in exchange the Office of Admirall of France, and hereafter resolves a most obstinate warre against the Spaniard. But a sad accident shall soone frustrate the designes he made with his Maiefty. Abbeville hath bene alwaies called the Citradell of Picardy, lying at the mouth of the sea. Maupin the Mayor, and some Inhabitants, had resolved to giue a great checke vnto the League: but the feare of the Duke of Aumales faction restrained them, and the seditious impressions of Preachers, (who throughout the Realme, haue bene the greatest motiues of these last mutinies) made this their good will fruitlesse. The King being aduertised thereof, did hazard Franc, one of the Secretaries of his chamber, who was borne at Abbeville, to found and discouer the end of their intentions.

He parts in April, and vnder colour to visit his friends, he behaues himselfe so discretely in his negotiation, that in lesse then eight daies they resolved in open assembly to send their Deputies to yield themselves at his Maiesties feet, who in token of so good a seruice, ennobled Franc and his posterity, and augmented the priuiledges of the Towne. In the same moneth, the Inhabitants of Troyes expelled the Prince of Lanulle, and recalled the Lord of Inteuille, their ancient gouernour to the King. The Townes and Prouinces contend, who shall haue the honor to return first to their due obedience, from the which these popular furies had with drawne them. Sens, Poitiers, Agen, Villeneuue, Marmande, and other Townes of Gasconie, and in a manner all that had followed the dance of Orleans and Paris, do now frame themselves to their tune. And all this is done in few weekes. The most factious of the party, did still feed the fire of rebellion in some townes of Picardy: Amiens and Beauuois wauered: the Spaniard possessed Laon and La Fere, places of importance in that Prouince: and the Count Charles of Mansfield had euen now besieged and taken Capelle, a small towne, but strong, in the Duchie of Tierache. The King being aduertised thereof, went home to their trenches, to draw them forth to fight: but making no shew to come forth, to get that by force, which he could not obtaine by reason, he besiegeth Laon, defeats the succors at sundry times that come to the besieged, kills about fiftene hundred of their men in sundry encounters, and taking the towne by composition in the end of August, hee ends (by this act) the furies of ciuill warres without hope of reuiving, and then returns triumphing to Paris. Chasteau-Thierry, before the siege; and after the siege of Laon, Amiens, Beauuois, and all the townes in Picardy (except Soissons and La Fere, which the Duke of Mayenne and the Spaniard held) did shake off the strangers yoke, and tooke the oath of fealty to the King. Cambray did likewise acknowledge him, and gaue his Maiefty such aduantage, as his enemies remained without meanes to maintaine the war, and without hope to obtaine their peace. The duke of Mayenne in the meane time entertained all his friends and intelligences at Bruxelles: but the supplies of men and money which he drew from thence, were not able to stay the course of the kings prosperities. He therefore retired himselfe into Bourgongne, to assure such places as were yet at his deuotion.

Contrariwise, his nearest kinsmen retiring themselves, left him almost alone to treat with the Spaniard. The Duke of Nemours made his accord at the Castle of Pierre-ascite, but being escaped the 26 of Iuly, as we haue said, death deprived him of the vse of his liberty, as we shall see hereafter. The Duke of Guise did first testifie, that hee desired nothing more then the Kings seruice, and drawing in the moneth of November to his Maiesties seruice his brethern with himselfe, many Noblemen, the City of Reims, and many other places, it did greatly shake this monstrous building, which was now ready to fall to ruine.

The Sect of Iesuits had as chiefe pillars of the League, mightily supported it vnto this day, and by all meanes laboured to aduance the Spaniard in France: they had spread throughout the whole Realme, the furious effects of the fire which they had kindled, and

A continued in priuate confessions (as lately in their Sermons) to disgrace the memory of the deceased King, and the Maiefty of the King now reigning: and to encrease it, the principall of their Colledge, and some others, had lately approued, countenanced, and perswaded that execrable attempt of Peter Barriere. The Vniuersity of Paris grounding the renuing of their ancient Proceesse against the Iesuits, vpon these considerations and motiues, demand the rooting out of them. Some great men, & of the chiefe men of Iustice, sue for them: the Cardinall of Bourbon supports them: The Duke of Nemours makes their cause his owne. The respect of their learning, care, and diligence to instruct and teach youth, did moue them: and a very urgent cause must draw the Court of Parliamēt (whose authority notwithstanding they did contemne and reiect) to pronounce and declare this great decree, the which an accursed and detestable attempt, by one of their owne disciples, did in the end extort. They procured that the cause might be pleaded secretly for that (said their Aduocat) to defend my Clients, I shall bee forced to speake some things offensive to many which haue lately turned to the Kings seruice. But these pleadings are to be read in Armoies against them, and Verboris for them, both graue and learned Aduocates.

By the reduction of so many Prouinces, Townes, Commonalties, and priuate Noblemen, the League (shall be now confined into some corners of Bourgongne, Picardy, and Britany, where the Spaniards (to haue alwaies footing within the Realme) entertained the hopes of the Duke of Mayenne and Mercœur. The first began to fall from them: but the other (grounded vpon some vaine pretensions of the Duchie, where he gouerned by reason of his wife) hoped to preuaile, if not of fall, yet at the least of a good part. The Queene Dowager his sister, laboured to make his peace: but he delayed the time, knowing that in his greatest extremities he should finde grace with the King. The Spaniard being brought into Blauet by his meanes (a fort which the situation of the Country had made almost impregnable, as if they had built a fort neere vnto Croisic, to shut vp the entry of the port at Brest, they had also made another right against it on the other banke) hoped, that being chased out of the other Prouinces, he should yet hold this as a pawne for the money he had disbursed. His Maiefty sent the Marshall d'Aumont, and General Norris, a braue Commander of the English, to encounter him, who fortified with a Fleet, vnder the command of Captaine Forbisher, they became Masters of Quimpercorentin and Morlay, and then they forced the new fort at Croisic, and slue (but with the losse of men, and of the said Forbisher) foure hundred fouldiers, to whom the guard was committed: which seruice was chiefly performed by the English, to their immortal praise.

France grew quiet, yet must they employ the fouldiers, and cary the warre into the Spaniards Country. It seemed this would free the Realme, but seldome doth it bring forth the effects that are expected. Yet for a trial, the King agrees with the Estates of Holland and their confederates, to invade the Duchy of Luxembourg with their common forces. The Duke of Bouillon, now Marshall of France, and the Count Nassau, seeke to enter in October, but they find the passages stoppt, and the Count Charles Mansfield before them, who by the defeat of the Hollanders troopes, made this attempt fruitlesse. On the other side, the King seekes to keepe the frontiers of Picardy safe from the Spanish forces, and threatened Arthois and Hainault, that if they fauoured the forces of Spaine, which molested Cambray and the Countries thereabout, he would make violent warre against them. The Estates of those Prouinces make no answer to these threats, framing their excuse that they could draw no direct answer from the Archduke Ernest, Lieutenant generall for the King of Spaine in the Low-Countries, who soone after perswaded the subjects of the said Countries to arme, and to invade France. The better to know Picardy, and to iudge of what should be necessary against the attempts of this new enemy, the King makes a voyage to the frontier, and then returns to Paris, to celebrate the solemnity of the Knights of the Order of the holy Ghost, and to receiue the Ambassadors of Venice, Isidore Grandinigo, and Iohn Delphine being sent to congratulate the happy successe of his affaires, and Peter Dando to succed Iohn Mocenigo. At his arrival he receiues three good aduertisements: That the Marshall d'Aumont had taken from the Spaniard one of the places he had fortified in Britanie; That the Spaniards thinking to enter into Montreuil, hauing giuen fifty thousand Crownes to the Gouernour, had bene repulsd with the losse of fixe or fixe hundred hundred men: And that the Marshall of Bouillon had ioyned with the army of Count A Maurice in despite of Count Charles.

But oh monstrous prodigy! the only remembrance should make our haire to stare, and our hearts to tremble. The 27 of December, the King being booted in one of the Chambers of the Louvre, having about him his cousins the Prince of Cony, the Count Soffens, and the Earle of Saint Paul, and a great number of the chiefe Noblemen of his Court, bending downe to receive the Lords of Ragny, and Montigny, who kist his knee, a yong man called Iohn Chastel, of the age of eightene or nineteene yeares, the son of a woollen Draper in Paris, a Nounce of the Iesuits, encouraged by their instructions, and thrust on by a diuellish furie, creeps into the Chamber with the presse, and surprizing his Maiestie as he was slooping to take vp these Gentlemen, in stead of thrusting him into the belly with a knife, as he had determined, he stricke him on the vpper lip, and brake a tooth. This wretch was taken, and confessed it without torture. The King vnder-standing that hee was a disciple of that schoole. Must the Iesuites then (said he) be iudged by my mouth?

Thus God (meaning by this cursed and detestable attempt) to countenance the pursuit of the Vniuersity of Paris against that sect, Iohn Chastel having declared the circumstances of his wicked intent, was found guilty of treason, against God and man in the highest degree, and by false and damnable instructions, holding that it was lawful to murder Kings, and that the King now reigning was not in the Church, vntill hee were allowed by the Pope, was by a decree of the Court condemned to doe penance before the great doore of our Ladies Church, naked in his shirt vpon his knees, holding a burning torch of two pound weight, to haue his armes and legs piached at the Greue with burning pincers, and his right hand holding the knife wherewith he sought to commit this parricide to be cut off, his body to be torne in peeces by foure horses, burnt to ashes, and cast into the wind, and all his goods forfeit to the King. The said Court decreed by the same sentence, That the Priests, schollers, and all others terming themselves of that Society, (as corrupters of youth, troublers of the publike quiet, and enemies to the Kings state) should depart within three dayes after the publication of this decree, out of Paris, and other places where they had Collegges: and within sixtene out of the Realme, vpon paine after the said time to be punished as guilty of high treason, all their moueable and immoveable goods to be forfeited, to bee employed in godly vses, forbidding all the Kings subjects to send any schollers to the Collegge of the said society without the Realme, there to be instructed or taught, vnder like paines as before.

The Decree was executed the 29 of the said moneth. Peter Chastel the father, and Iohn Gueres school-master to this murderer, were banished, the first for a certaine time out of Paris, and fined at two thousand Crownes, the last for ever out of the Realme, vpon paine of death. The fathers house standing before the palace, razed, and a pillar erected contained (for a perpetuall monument) the causes of that ruine. Amongst the writings of one named Iohn Guignard of Chartres, were found certaine outrageous and scandalous libels against his Maiefty, made since the generall pardon granted by him at the reduction of Paris, for the which he was executed the 7 of January following. Experience hath often taught, that armes produce greater effects abroad in the enemies Countries then at home, and that the goodliest triumph is fought farthest off. Our vnciuill confusions were forged chiefly in Spaine, and the Iesuits had bene the chiefe workemen. One Francis Iacob, a scholler of the Iesuites of Bourges, had lately vnto to kill the King, but that he held him for dead, and that another had done the deed. And this horrible attempt of late vpon the sacred face of his Maiefty, (wherein he was miraculously preferred) doth witness, that they were the chiefe firebrands. So the King grounding the necessity of his armes vpon these considerations, after hee had rooted this Sect out of the Schooles, which they held within the Iurisdiction of the Parliament of Paris, hee published a Declaration for the making of Warre against the King of Spaine. Without doubt the reasons were very apparent and manifest, and the beginning more fauourable then the end.

The Marshall of Bouillon begins this new warre: hee enters the Duchy of Luxembourg with an army of a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, and at the first puts to rout eleven cornets of horse of Count Charles neere to Wirton, kills two hundred and fifty

Some Lor-
raines leaue
the King.

A fifty vpon the place, makes the rest to leaue armes, horse and baggage, and to saue themselves in the next forest. Philip likewise for his part proclaimes warre against our Henry.
The Duke of Lorraine on the other side, hauing taken a truce with his Maiefty, the Baron of Aufsenulle, with the Siegneurs of Tremblecourt, and Saint George (who before made warre vnder him) now take the white scarf, they enter the County of Bourgongne with a thousand horse, and fixe thousand foot, and at the first they seize vpon Vezou, Ionuille, and other places.

Behold the fire which threatens two Prouinces: but the Spaniard suffers them not to be consumed, as men presumed, that being busie to quench it, he would leaue Picardy in B quiet. He commands the archduke Ernest, that with the hazard of the Low-countries he should transport all his forces into Picardy, and moreover causeth the Constable of Ca-stille gouernor of Milan, to passe the Alpes with a great army of Spaniards and Neapolitans, who recovered the places, and forced the Lorraines to dispirite themselves.

The Arreseiens and Hannuyers, fore-seeing the desolation which the continuance of this warre would cause, solicited the Archduke to seeke some meanes to quench it: but death cuts off the course of his enterprize. The Earle of Fuentes (that is to say, Fontaines) advanced them courageously, causing the gouernour of Archois to enter into Picardy with a thousand horse, and fixe thousand foot. Behold rough seas and great storms, which violently beat vpon our great Pilot: but in despite of their attempts, hee shall

Beauue, and Dijon, did happily assist him: let vs see the successe. The Duke of Nemours escaped from prison, assembled a good troope of souldiers, horse and foot, and drawing to him 3000 Suiſſes which wintered in Saouoy for the defence of the Country: with these forces he pretended to subdue the Prouinces of Lionois, Forest, and Beauueillois, and to reuenge the disgrace he had receiued in Lions. For a beginning, he had reduced to his deuotion, Thisi a strong Castle in Lionois, Vienne in Dauphine, Feur, Montbrison, S. Germane, and S. Bonnet, towne in Forest: and by this, restraining them both above and beneath the River, he made an account either to bring Lions to some extremity of victuals, or to cause some tumult among the people, who should giue him entry into the City.
D Being ready to effect his designs, the Constable parted from Languedoc, to ioine with the King, he resolves in this encounter to doe him an acceptable seruise. He comes into Lionois, followed with a thousand horse, and foure thousand choise Harguebuziers, happily for the preferuation of the Country: for he presently stayed the course of the Duke of Nemours prosperity, who posting to oppose himself against the constable, (hauing made a voyage to the Constable of Castille, with hope to haue authority over these foraine forces, and to dispose of them for the execution of his designs) fortifies S. Colombe, a small village at the foot of the bridge of Vienne towards Lionois, lodgeth some troopes there, and the rest he puts in garison into the towne.

The Duke of Nemours
makes warre against Lionois.

And this great multitude of men shut vp in Vienne, makes their victuals grow scant:
E they likewise want other necessaries and munition for warre. The Constable cuts off all meanes from them. The Suiſſes mune for want of pay, and being called home by their Colonels, goe to ioine with the forces of Saouy, where the Marquis of Trefort commanded, being Lieutenant general for the Duke of Saouy, on this side the Alpes. To curbe Lions more straitly, the Marquis came to winter his men at Moushel, a small towne of Saouy, three leagues from Lions. The Constable prevents him, and surprising the Towne, disappoints the Marquis, lodgeth his men in the towne, and leaues the Sanouoyen subiect to the iniuries of the aire, and keeps him from attempting any thing against Lions.

The Constable aduersified of some discontent betwixt the Captaines of the strangers
F that were in Vienne, and the Siegneur of Disimieu a Gentleman of Dauphine, who commanded in the Castle of Pipper, the chiefe fort of the said towne, hee praicheth Disimieu, lets him understand of his due to the Kings seruice, his naturall Prince, his duty to his Country, and the profit hee shall bring by the reduction of this Towne, so in many people threatned with foraine oppression. Disimieu gives ear, and without any great difficulty, having passed his word to the Constable, suffers the siegneur of Mogenion to enter the Castle with 5000 of Harguebuziers. The Constable parts the force many Gentlemen, as well of the Country, as his owne followers: and marcheth towards A Vienne. The Marshall of Ornano doth likewise meet him, with 300 Harguebutiers, and two hundred masters. All these themselves about Vienne at noone day. Then Dismisses gives the Siegneur of Cheylart, and Dom Vincentis Colonel of the Italian foot (that were there in garison) to vnderstand, that being well informed of the finisser practice and charge they had to feize vpon his person, he had resolued to yeeld the towne and castle vnto the King: yet would he not put it in execution, before he had obtained a safe conduct for the and their troopes. Montoisin shewes himselfe with his troope, and makes Cheylart and Vincen- centio to accept the condition that was offered them. They goe forth, and take the way to Sauoy, guarded by a company of light horse. Dismisses brings them vnto S. Blandine, where the Constable attended him, and there takes the oath of obedience and fealty to the King. Towards night the Constable entered Vienne, and received the towne and castles of Pippet and La Bassie in his Maiesties name. So Vienne, the only Sanctuary of the duke of Nemours, the Rendezuous of strangers, and the Port of Dauphiné to neighbor Prouinces, caused the quiet of all the Country and neighbors about. Since the which, the duke alwaies droopt, being contemned, hated, and frustrate of his attempts: and finally, he ended all his griefes by a mountfull and lamentable Catastrophe.

As all things succeeded happily for the King, the Marshall of Biron hauing taken Beaune in view of this great army of the Constable of Castille, Autun and Nuys in Bourgogne, he puts himselfe into Dijon, being called by the Inhabitants, he chased away the Vicount of Taunnes troopes (who held the Inhabitants shut vp in a corner of the towne) fortified their barricadoes against the Castle, and did beleaguer it, attending his army, which made haste to returne out of the Francke Comté. His Maiesty followinge; that the Constable of Castille being free, after the recovery of Vezou, should be employed by the Duke of Mayenne, to succour the Castle of Dijon, wherein consisted the chief hope of his rising, makes haste to Troyes; gives solenne thanks for so happy a victorie, and takes his way to Dijon, arriues there the fourth day of Iune, carrying with him the execution of a designe, more miraculous then all the rest. Without doubt our posterity may put this History with the fabulous tales of the foure Tonnes of Aymond, of Rowland, Oliuer, and others, if we set not downe the truth; with the chief Circumstances: for it is not a dreame, and enchantment; but a fabulous tale, that foure score Cheualiers, but true French Gentlemen, generous, and well led; have amazed and put to flight, two thousand horse? But what durst not this braue Nobility doe, hauing in the head of them so incomparable and valiant a Capitaine, and a King so well beloued and respected of all?

The Castillian had already passed his troopes and Artillery vpon bridges of boats at Grey: when as the King hauing fortified the Inhabitants with a thousand men, commanded by the Earle of Thorigny, he viewed the Castle of Dijon, the fort of Talon a Cannon shot from the towne: and all the approaches, whereby the enemy might attempt to succor the Castle, made choice of a place of battell fit to stay him, and where to make fort for the restraining of the said Castle: hee resolues to free him of halfe his paines, and to meet him in the mid-way, with a double intent, the one to fight with him at the passage, the other, to giue the assailants time to finish the trenches against the Castle. For the execution hereof, he assigns the Rendezuous at Lux vpon Tillé, & Fontaine François to a thousand horse; and 300 Carabins, whom hee would vte in this rare stratagem; and the same day parts with the only company of the Baron of Lux, and some thirty horse, and comes to Lux, and from thence to Fontaine François, putting a troop of foot into two Castles which are in the village of Saint Seine vpon the river of Vigonne, to stop the enemies passage. It was the directest and best way to come to the fort of Dijon.

A league from Fontaine François, the Marquis of Mirebeau giues his Maiesty intelligence, that he hath encountered with two troopes of three or foure hundred horse, which made him retire in haste; that hee did thinke, to haue sciled some wing of the army behinde, but hee had no leisure to discover them plainly. Hee sake them, for all the Castilians army was assumed to Lux vpon the passage of Saint Seine, a more vantage place less generous then our Winn, would presently haue resolued to make an honorable retreat: but this did kinde his courage, and increased his desire to stand their countenance.

A tenance. He sends the Marshall of Biron with the company of the Baron of Lux, to discover if it were the army, or some other troope that went to the war, and himselfe followed the Marshall a good pace. A hundred paces beyond Fontaine François, the Marshall discovers about three score horse vpon a hill, mid-way to S. Seine, situate at the foot thereof on the one side, so as the villages cannot see one another. The Marshall resolues to chase them, to see what the enemy did behind. He sees the enemies army coming to the said village, and neere vnto a wood fast by, about 300 horse, which had beat back the Baron of Aulonville, whom his Maiesty had likewise sent before with a hundred horse, to see if the enemy marched or stayed.

B These (supported by their whole army, which followed them at the heeles) put forth one troope on the right hand, and another on the left, who make a shew to charge the Marshall, that they might obserue what forces followed him. To frustrate their expectation, hee causeth the Marquis of Mirebeau to stretch forth at large on the one hand, and the Baron of Lux on the other, and then assured that the enemies army followed, hee began to make his retreat towards the King. The enemy perseth him, taking this retreat for a kind of flight: But he retired only to charge more furiously. The Baron of Lux sees a troope, which aduanceth before their army, and enters so hotly amongst them, as his horse being slain, he remains engaged in great danger, if the Marshall had not salued him with so rough a charge as they were constrained and forced to turne their backs. Hereupon C issue forth from the woods, many troopes of horse, which in all, with them that marched before, made about twelue hundred. The Marshall (discouering them) retires more speedily, as well to aduertise his Maiesty that all their army followed, as also to tell him that he had means with his horse to fight with theirs before their foot could arriue. Before he could deliuer this vnto the King, the troopes of the Baron of Thianges, Thenifsey, Pilliers, Houdan, and a company of Carabins ioyned with him, whom he had chased, and force him to turne head, but with twenty horse only, for the great number of enemies at the first view had amazed most of them which followed the Marshall. Hee charged, and ouerthrowes the first he encounters. But two wounds, one on the head, with a sword, the other with a Lance which razed the skinn of his belly, made the victory for D a while doubtful. Without doubt his braue resolution and wife command encouraged many that were amazed, and confirmed that, which in them tended to ruine. The only feare which they had, least he had more men in the village or thereabouts, then hee had made shew of kept the enemy backe, and made them to attend the rest of the army which aduanced: in the meane time they put them into five equadrons. His Maiesty sees himselfe engaged to fight, and hath small means to make it good, for the troopes followed easily, and the houre of the Rendezuous was not yet come. The King notwithstanding aduanceth a troope of horse which newly arriued. But discouering this great cloud of enemies ready to charge them, they retire to his Maiesty.

The Lord of Taunnes arriues with his companie, encreasing his number, which are about two hundred horse, but not yet well ioyned. Hereupon the Duke of Mayenne appears vpon a hill, and sends forth three score equadrons against his Maiesty, which flanked him on the right hand, the one of three hundred horse, the other of two hundred, and the third of a hundred and fifty; and two others against the Marshall of Biron.

F The King aduanceth, with about foure score horse, and chargeth the first squadron so violently, as he giues them no leisure to thinke to fight, ouerthrowes the second, and dispereth the third, with about five and twenty horse, which remained with him (the rest pursued the victory) strikes terror into all, and leaues the vanquished no other safetie, but to die by the hand of so incomparable a Conqueror. The Marshall of Biron seconders this admirable victory with a great resolution, who followed with about fifty horse, defeated the two equadrons that came against him, one after another, within three score paces of the Duke of Mayenne, who stood firme on the hill with his troope of three hundred horse, whither the run-awaies fled, thinking there to be in safetie.

The King and the Marshall charge them jointly, force them, put them in rout, and pursue them vnto the corner of the wood. Here the King findes their battalions of foot, and great store of Muskets and other shot planted along it, with foure hundred fresh horse, sent to receive the Duke, a hundred paces from their battalions. So his Maiesty makes a stand, and the enemies freed from him, begin their retreat. The Kings horse follow them to the toppes of the hill, and there put themselves in battell. The King hauing taken breath in the place from whence he parted to go to the charge, diuides his men into two troopes, one for himselfe, the other for the Marshall. Here, about a hundred French Gentlemen take the place from sixtene hundred horse, and by this means the King was master both of the enemies bodies, and of the place of battell. His Maiesty gathers together such as were disperfed, to make the better shew. Hereupon arises the Earle of Clermont, Vitry, the Kings lights horse, those of Cesar Monsieur, the Duke of Elbeuf, the Earle of Chiucny, the Cheualier d' Oise, the Lords of Risse and Aix, which made about five hundred horse of his bands of Ordinance, all gricued that they had not followed the fortune and valor of our King, to bee partakers of the honour which he had won.

With this supply he turnes to ouertake them that fled, and pursues them two leagues, neere vnto Grey: but not able to follow this shamefull flight, he was content his glory should surmount their shame, and that his valour had vanquished their force: and vying this famous victory with piety, hee let all the world know in his person, that it is not the sword, nor the arme that strikes, nor the number of men, that preserues Kings in the midst of armes: but that high Providence, which fighting with the one hand for the iust cause of lawfull Princes, against the attempts, and violences of vsurpers and Tyrants: and holding victories in the other, decides the quarrels of Souereiganties, by the equity hee finds in Princes armes vnjustly oppressed, and makes it manifest that the admirable euent of battels consist not onely in number or force, but in the free disposition of his fauours, vnto a people whose miseries he will shorten, which the continuance of warre hath bred in a diuided Estate.

The enemy returned to lodge at S. Seigne, and dislodging the next day with feare, they repassed the water vpon their bridges, leaving both the one and the other side of the hill at the Kings deuotion, who without doubt had giuen them a great checke vpon this retreat, if his footmen had bene with him, and the horse lately arriued could haue endured the toyle in the vehement heat of the Sun. The Duke of Mayenne and the Castilian lost in this charge sixscore men slaine vpon the field, threescore prisoners, and two hundred hurt. His Maiesty, onely foure slaine, and one prisoner. But for a notable circumstance, and a signe of the especial care of God ouer his person, hee performed these exploits without any other armes then his cuirasse alone, and was well assisted (to their great commendation) by the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf, the Lord of Tremouille, and the Marquises of Treyne and Pizany, by the Lords of Inteuille, Roquelaure, Chasteauvieux, Liencourt, Montigni, Mirepoix and others. And in despite of all the furious attempts of the league, the Castle of Dijon, and in a manner all Bourgongne was soone after reduced to the Kings obedience: and now the third time, hee freed his Realme from strangers. The King in the end inuades the Country, forceth one of their lodgings in the view of the Constable of Castile neere vnto Grey, becomes master of the field, takes Alpremont and many other places: he had forced their chiefe forts, if the Suisses had not intreated him to retire his army, and to suffer that Prouince to inioy her ancient libertie.

The Princes absence did imbolden them that were light headed to discouer the rash imaginations of their braines. The Colledge of Sorbonne was not yet so well purged of factious humors, but there remained some leuaine of sedition and scandall. For Flourentine Iacob an Angustine Monke maintained in his disputation in the Colledge of Sorbonne, vnder Thomas Blancy Doctour in Diuinity and principall of the Colledge of Calu: That without doubt all Spirituall and Temporall things depend vpon the successe of Saint Peters Chaire, whereas Clement the 8 sits at this day, the great and most souereigne Bishop, Lieutenant to God on earth, for hee hath Spirituall and Temporall power ouer all. A vnto the head. And that the Church hauing the power of two swords, grants vnto Kings and Magistrates the vse of the temporall, for the defence of the good, and rooting out of the wicked. But the Court of Parliament, the true seat of Royall Iustice, ready and carefull to maintain the estate against such as would shake it, in that which concerns the affaires of the Crown, declares by a decree of the nineteenth day of Iuly these two Articles to bee false, schismaticall, contrary to the word of God, holy decrees, canonical constitutions, and lawes of the Realme, tending to rebellion and the trouble of the publike quiet: wherefore the Monke being conducted from the prison of the Confergerie vnto the Sorbons hall; the Deane, Sincic, Doctours, Lycenciats and Batchelors, being assembled by the sound of the bell, he declared (being bare-headed and vpon his knees, Blancy also assisting bare-headed, but standing) That rashly and indiscreetly he had propounded the said positions to be disputed off, and maintained by him in his Ordinary Act, for the which he was sorry, and demanded pardon of God, the King, and Iustice. The questions were torne in peeces, and defences made to all Batchelors to present the like against the Kings power and the obedience which all his subiects owe vnto him, the establishment of the royall estate, and the rights of the French Church, and to the Deane, Sincic and Doctours of the faculty, to receive them; nor to suffer them to be printed nor disputed of, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason, and vnworthy to enioy the priuiledges granted to the faculty of Diuinity, by the Kings predecessors to the King now reigning, and confirmed by him. And to eternize the memory, the Court ordained, that this decree should be written in the Registers of the said Faculty, and read every yeare at the first Assembly of the Sorbonne by the Beadle of the said Faculty: enioying the Sincic to certifie the Court of the reading thereof within three dayes after it should be done, vpon paine of disobedience. This present decree was executed by Iohn Forges one of the Kings priuy Council, and President in his Court of Parliament, Stephen Flary, Ierome Angenou, Ierome Anreux, and Prosper Basin Councillors in the said Court, and deputed Iudges to that end, in the presence of his Maiesties Poetor general, who by a graue and Maiesticall admonition did shew zeale and affection to conuince the error & rashnesse of any one that would attempt to make a breach in the royall and soueraigne authority, to weaken the temporall sword, which God onely did put into their hands for the preferuation of the good and punishment of the wicked.

Whilst the King continues his victories, the Marshall of Bouillon executes a dangerous enterprize, but of importance, vpon the Towne and Castle of Han. Han opened the way for the Spaniard from the frontier vpon Beauuais and Amiens: but this surprize cunningly performed, did wonderfully annoy them, and not one Spaniard of those which had it in guard escaped either death or prison. Sixscore naturall Spaniards, and sixe or seuen hundred Capitaines and fouldiers of diuers nations were slaine, and three or foure hundred prisoners. But all this summe of men could not recompence the death of that braue and generous Nobleman Humieres, one of the chiefe actors in the enterprize, as much lamented first by the King, then by the Nobility, and generally of all France, as his vertues and merits had made him commendable and necessary for his Maiesties service. La Croix master of the campe, Maxiges Lieutenant to Sunville, and Boyencom Captaine of Humieres guard, were companions of his valour, and graue. The Towne was taken for the King, with the death of some twenty other Gentlemen, and about a hundred fouldiers. But the Spaniard soone after reuenged this surprize vpon Castelle, but more sharply vpon the towne of Doullans, for hauing put to rout the succours which the Marshall of Bouillon sent, slaine the Admirall of Villars and many Gentlemen, they tooke the towne by assault (not for want of men or munition, but by their bad order, and the intelligence which the Commanders in the towne had with the enemy) and entred it with such fury, as they had no respect of sex or age: hauing no reason for their horrible cruelty, but the fresh remembrance of their companions. It is (cryed they) to reuenge those of Han.

¶ The Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Bouillon, and the Earle of Saint Paul, Commanders of the Kings troopes, hauing diuided the charge amongst them, to encounter the Spaniard forces, the Marshall and the Earle went to provide for the places about Bollogne, and the Duke for those vpon the riuer of Somme. Passing by Amiens, hee finds the people and chiefefto amazed, that to assure them, he was forced to lay aside the quality of his person,

Han surpris'd
for the King.Humieres slaine.Castelle and Doullans for
the Spaniards.

1595 person, and to promise to put himselfe into Corbie, foure leagues from Amiens, to defend it if the enemy approached. He enters it the third of August, views it both within and without, takes a survey of the quantity of munition, and of the number of mouths, and provides as time & necessity would permit him, for things necessary for the preservation of the place. The Spaniard had another designe: for the first day of the month he parts from about Dourlans, and taking the way betwixt Peronne and Corbie, seemes to threaten S. Quentin or Cambray. So the Duke leaves Corbie, but doubtfull whether the Spaniard went: yet aduertised by the Vicont d'Auchy gouernour of Saint Quentin, that the Enemy approached towards him, he goes to defend S. Quentin. He is no sooner arrived, but newes comes, that the Earle of Fuentes is lodged about Cambray, to besiege it with sixteen thousand men, and three score and two peeces of artillery. The Lord of Balagny, Marshall of France, by his articles of capitulation with the King, confirms this advice by his letters of the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth of the month, and requires to be suddenly released, for the pitifull Estate of Dourlans terrified the people: the towne was ill provided of men, this huge number of Cannons, and this fearfull multitude of soldiers, strooke a general error among the Citizens.

Cambray besieged.

But to reuive their spirits, who were ready to yeeld obedience to a new Lord, the duke of Neuers sends them his only sonne, the Duke of Rethelois, assisted with the valour and wisdom of the Lords of Vicques, Buiy, Trumeler, Vaudecourts, Sugny, Fleury, Chattray, and others, with about three hundred and fifty horse. The Peasants by their bells give the alarm from village to village, & a paltry bridge of wood at Anne, two leagues from Cambray, staying their troope, gaue the Earle of Fuentes meane to put his horse in battell almost directly in the way where the Duke should passe. He auoides it, and going aside encounters a guard of five and twenty Lances, making a stand on this side of a hollow-way: he chargeth them, cuts them in peeces in the sight of their horse, which could not succour them by reason of the said way, and passing on, hee falls into a troope of two hundred & fifty horse, marcheth directly to them, scatters them, goes on his way, & comes to the towne-ditch. The Inhabitants know him and receive him, with much honor and ioy to see so brave succors.

But it was too weak against such a number of assailants: the King was farre off, the Estate of Bourgundy kept him occupied: the affaires of the Province of Lionois required his presence. The Inhabitants of Cambray began to decline in affection: they were male-content with the tediousness of the siege, and the ruine of their houses by the Cannon, and of the constraint to take certaine money made of Copper, and not suffer them to employ it, carrying on the one side the Kings armes, as Protector, and on the other those of the Lord of Balagny, created Prince of Cambray by the Articles of his rendition. On the other side, the enemy made strange attempts, and gaue horrible threats against the besieged. They shut their eares against all persuasions, and make a disloyall resolution to yeeld, and hoping for better vantage and more liberty, they open the gates to the enemy. The Duke of Rethelois, Balagny, Vicques, and others flee into the Cittadell. The Duke would retire his sonne, and makes the besieged despair of any speedy succours. So the ninth of October Balagny signed the capitulation, offered by the enemy: but with so much griefe and sorrow, as the same night hee signed it, his wife being a woman of a great spirit died, not able to endure that so precious a Jewell as Cambray (whereof she was newly created Princeesse) should fall into the Spaniards cruell hands.

Cambray yeelded to the Spaniards.

Thus this ancient member of this Crowne was lost: Thus the onely triumph of a son and brother of the Kings of France was blemished. Doubtlesse had it not bene for the impatience and disloyalty within, the fault of some great men that might haue prevented this mischief, all their attempts had been in vaine: for the Earle of Fuentes was ready to build forts about the towne, rather to vanquish them by a long siege then by assault. And the King hastned his entry into Lions, to come to their speedy succor. The Duke of Neuers died soone after, grieved on the one side for great a breach made to this Estate, and satisfied on the other, that his sonne had shewed himselfe so valliant in the conduct of the succors he put into the towne.

The King seeing the Constable of Castile shut vp into Dole and Grey, being loath to hazard a battell, he went and made his entry into Lions the fourth of September, assured the

A the Province, provided for the troubles of Prouence, nourished not so much by the league, as by the discontentments and partialities of some which had no intelligence with them: he receiued Bois Dauphin in his obedience, with the townes of Chasteaugontier in Aniou, and Sable in Maine, and for recompence of his seruice, honored him with the place of a Marshall of France. Then he granted a general truce throughout the whole realme, to the Duke of Mayenne, which after so many storms and so many tempests, shall in the end bring vs to a safe port, so necessary to quiet the diuisions of this Realme.

The King being prest to make a general truce, and cessation of armes throughout his whole kingdom, vpon the assurance which the D. of Mayenne had giuen him to cause it to be observed by all them which doe yet make war, as well vnder his authority, as in the name of the Vnion: his Maiesty desirous to ease his subjects of the oppression of war, granted them certain Articles:

That there should be a truce and cessation of armes for three moneths. That all men indifferently might enioy the fruits of their reuenues, and returne into the possession of their houses and Castles. That no fortification should be made during the truce. That Labourers and husbandmen might with all liberty follow their accustomed workes, and not be molested vpon paine of death. That all men might passe freely throughout the Realme without passport. That all taxes and impositions set vpon Merchandize, should be leauied during the three moneths. That during the said truce nothing should be attempted vpon the places of either party, nor any act of hostilitie done; which if any should attempt, reparation should be made, and the delinquents punished as troublers of the publike peace. That no man might take any place, during the truce, to fortifie. Quarrells and challenges were forbidden for any difference which had hapned during the troubles. These Articles with diuers others were concluded vpon at Lions the three and twentieth of September 1595, and signed by the King, and Duke de Mayenne.

God raise vp a great meane from beyond the mountaines, to make the way easie for a general peace and re-union of people distracted from his Maiesties obedience. The Pope moued in the end to see the eldest Sonne of the Church, and the chiefe Christian Prince prostrate at his feet, shewes himselfe a true father of Iustice, to vanquish the difficulties and oppositions, whereby the Ambassador of Spaine had crost his Maiesties constant and iust pursuit, since the time of his conversion. The 18 of September he opens the freemes of his blessing vpon our Kings head: and all the Colledge of Cardinals, all the people, all the Citie of Rome, cry out with that happy acclamation, God save Henry of Bourbon, King of France and of Navarre, most great, most victorious, God save the most Christian and the most Catholike, God save the chiefe Sou of the Church.

The Pope blest the King.

Few daies after the newes of this solemne action, the King went from Lions in post by night, to goe to the succour of Cambray, but the effects were not answerable to his care. The Cambresiens had already conceived some hope of greater liberty: they hoped to get much by the change, and yeilded their necks to a new command. There is neither meane, counsell, nor reason that can stay a multitude, when as a disordered appetite of Freedom doth transport them. His Maiesty finds other worke to employ his forces: hee fought to roote this foraigne power speedily out of Picardy, which held his hands bound and insulted ouer him. La Fere is the chiefe and most important fort of the Province; he besiegeth it, and finds therein an obstinate and inuincible resolution. Perseuerance is necessary in all actions of war, but especially in the Siege of townes, and there is no place which the munition and the situation makes impregnable, but time & famine will force, subdue, and bring vnder. Whilest the King leaves the besieged nothing free but the ayre, and drues them to all extremities: the D. of Mayen on the other side (seeing his retreats in a manner all lost, and that he is in disgrace with the Spaniards) fues for his Maiesties fauour, and vpon his simple word he promisseth to come vnto him where-soeuer he pleased. The Marquis of S. Sorlin, now Duke of Nemours by the death of his elder brother, yeelds with the like facility.

La Fere besieged.

Neuer Prince did more easly remit the wrongs done him. The King grew more cold then was requisite in a siege of such importance, to attend the treaties of the one and the other. He commended the first, for the affection he had shewed to preserve the realme entire, hauing not done, nor suffered it to be diminished, but of some places, in the great declining of his estate; and declares that hee had alwayes heard that the second had no part in the troubles and diuisions of the realme, by any designe preiudicial to the Estate. This re-vniõ of the Duke of Mayenne, performed at Monceaux in Brie, caused the yielding of Soissons, Pierrelont, Chaalon vpon Soane, Seurre in Bourgogne, and some other places, to the Kings obedience, whereupon the King made an Edict, as followeth.

Henry by the grace of God, &c. As it is the duty of a good King to loue his subjects, as his Children, to intreat them as his owne, and to thinke that their felicity is his: God and men are witnesses, that since it pleased God to call vs to this Crowne, we haue had no greater desire then to free our selfe of this charge. For, hauing found this realme full of factions, war, and diuisions, more dangerous then haue been heretofore, we haue neither spared our blood to defend our authority, nor our clemency to forget wrongs which haue beene done vs: to the end we might soone free our Realme from oppressions and ciuill wars, the very spring and mother of all miseries. Wherein we confesse that we haue beene no lesse assisted by the grace & blessing of God in the one, then in the other. For, if he hath often giuen vs victories ouer our enemies, he hath also giuen vs a will and meanes to vanquish them by mildnesse, that haue made themselves worthy, so as we may say, that we haue no lesse advanced the re-vniõ of our subjects by clemency then by armes. And therein we haue beene chiefly moued by the great loue we beare vnto our subjects, and the compassion we haue of their calamity and miseries, more then with our owne particular interest or advantage. We haue also had a great regard vnto the causes which haue incited many of them to arme, being grounded vpon the care which euery man should haue of his foules health, the which we haue held so much the more worthy of commiseration and excuse, for that we doe acknowledge as a true Christian, that there is not any thing hath more power ouer vs, then this bond. Wherefore hauing often tried by our selfe, that force doth rather fortifie then change the resolution of man, in matter of Religion, and that it is a grace which is infused into vs, not by our owne iudgments, nor by any other, but by the only bounty of the euer-living God, and by the working of the holy Spirit.

As soone as we had any breathing from our great toyles, by the advantages which God hath giuen vs ouer our adueraries, we drew vnto vs Prelates and Doctors of good life, and learned in the holy Scriptures, to instruct vs in the truth of the Catholike religion, whereof God by his grace hauing made vs capable, with a firme resolution to perseuer therein vnto the death: we haue since had no greater desire then to participate in the vniõ and society of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and our reconciliation with our holy Father the Pope, and the holy Sea, as all men may see by our actions, and the continuall pursuiues which we haue made: the which haue beene so crost by the ordinarie practices of our enemies, and their power at Rome, as if our constancy and reason had not moued and fortified the vertue and singular bounty of our Holy Father (who like a common father did only regard the good of Christian religion) we had neuer attained to the happinesse of his holy blessing, nor of our reconciliation so much desired, E for the quiet of our conscience, and the better satisfaction of our subjects, moued onely with the zeale of religion. Wherein we haue great cause to praise God, and to magnifie his holinesse and equity, who by his wisdom and bounty hath confounded the infolency and falshood of our enemies: We haue no lesse cause to admire Gods diuine providence, in that it hath pleased him to make the way of our saluation, the fittest meanes to win the hearts of our subjects, and to draw them to obey vs, as hath beene seene soone after our vniõ to the Church, and euer since continued.

But this worke had not bene perfect, nor the peace absolute, if our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Duke of Mayenne, chiefe of his party, had not followed the same course, as he was resolved to doe, when as he saw our holy Father allow of our re-vniõ: The which hath made vs to like better of his actions then before, to take in good part the zeale which he had to religion, and to commend his desire to perseuer the realme, the which he would not suffer to be dismembred, when as he saw the prosperity of his affaires seemed to giue him some meanes: As also since, being weake, hee chose rather to cast himselfe into our armes, and yeeld vs the obedience, which God, Nature, and the Lawes commanded him, then to seeke other remedies which might continue the wars, to the great preiudice of our subjects: The which makes vs desire to acknowledge his good will, and to loue and

A and intreat him hereafter as our good kinsman and faithfull subiect. And to the end, that both he and all Catholikes which shall imitate him in this duty, may be the better confirmed, and others incited to the like resolution; And also, to the end that no man may hereafter seeme to doubt of the sincerity of our re-vniõ to the Catholike Church, and vnder that pretext stir vp new seeds of dissention to seduce our subjects, and draw them to their ruine: We declare and protest that our resolution is to liue and die in the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish religion, whereof we haue made profession: our intention is also to procure the aduancement thereof with all our meanes, and with the like care and affection, as the most Christian Kings our predecessors haue done, by the aduice of B our good and loyall Catholike subjects, as well of those which haue alwaies assisted vs, as of others which haue since yeelded vs obedience, maintaining notwithstanding the publique tranquillity of the realme.

After this Edict and protestation, his Maiesty granted many things touching the good of the Duke De Mayenne, and those of his party which should submit themselves. The townes of Chaalons, Seurre, and Soissons, were left vnto the Duke for six yeares, as places of surety, and no religion to be there exercised during that time but the Romish, nor any one to be aduanced to any office or publique charge, but such as made profession thereof. All Letters, Declarations, Iudgments and Decrees, made against the D. of Mayen, or any other whosoeuer, that would enioy the benefit of the said Edict, were reuoked, and C the memory thereof suppressed and extinct. All men of what quality and condition soeuer, that did acknowledge the King, and make their due submission, were restored to their goods, offices and dignities, notwithstanding all Edicts, seisesures, sales, confiscations, or declarations formerly made, the which were reuoked, and they put into possession thereof by vertue of this present Edict, vpon condition that they should sweare fidelity and obedience to the King, and presently depart from all leagues and associations. That neither the Duke, or any one which had followed his party, should be called in question for any thing which had beene done during the present troubles, if within the time limited by the Edict, they came and acknowledged their duties: vlesse it were for the murder of the deceased King: which exception should not tend to the Princes and Princes D cesses which had fallen from the obedience of the deceased King, & should now acknowledge their duty. That all men which desired to enioy the benefit of the Edict, might retorne and possesse their houses, goods, and dignities, notwithstanding all letters and decrees to the contrary. That the Duke of Mayen, and all that had followed him, should be discharged of all soms of money, leauied or taken by them for what cause soeuer, and they likewise acquitted which had furnished the same. They were likewise discharged from all acts of hostility, and from any thing attempted contrary to their duties, during the war: with many other Articles for the ease and discharge of the Duke of Mayenne, and those which had followed his party. All that would enioy the benefit of this present Edict, were bound to make declaration within six weekes after the publication thereof, to E the Courts of Parliament, or to the Iudges where they dwelt, and to take the oath of allegiance.

The execution of a decree made by the Court of Parliament, against the Duke of Aumale was furchealed with an intent to suppress the same, if the Duke of Aumale should acknowledge his Maiestie as he ought within the said terme. Moreouer, the Duke of Mayenne was discharged of three hundred and fifty thousand crownes, for the which he and some of his friends and seruants had engaged themselves, which was employed for the war, and not conuerted to his owne priuate vse. The King did also promise to discharge him of all soms of money, for the which he stood bound to the Suisses, Reistres, Lanquens, or any other strangers, and to make it his owne debt. There was other F secret articles granted which were not expressed in the Originall.

This reduction of the Duke of Mayenne serued the Marshall d'Amont as a spur to croffe the exploits of the Duke of Mercœur in Britany. He had lately seized vpon Chaiuze, a place situate betwixt Normandy, Maine, and Britany, and from thence commanded the neighbour Prouinces, stretching out his wings thirty leagues round about, without contradiction. They of Caen did first complaine of it: the Marshall d'Amont aduertised of this prize by the Earle of Montgomery, sends for Capitaine Geniill (whose merits haue giuen vs subiect to make an honourable mention of him else where.) Geniill gets gets leave of the King, and goes to view Chateau in a darke night, but he could finde no means to force it, being feared high, environed with steep rocks, a river and two-woodes, having no approach nor entrance, but by two narrow Cawfeys, whose issues must be discovered by light. He returns thither at a full Moore, and finds no other expedient, but to open the wall by the force of his Engines, by the means of a little hole which he found close to the ground. Yet this place is fortified with a double ditch, flanked by the dungeon, and hath but a very narrow cawfey to passe vnto, and to descend into the ditch by Moonelight, in view of a Sentinel set right ouer it. Circumstances able to discourage the vnder-taker, if some inward motion of a diuine assistance had not fauored his designe. He vnder-takes it, moued with the excesse and violences of this insolent Garison, consisting for the most part of Spaniards, and roguish strangers. The Earle of Montgomery, and the Seigneur of Roches his brother, led many of the Nobility thither with sufficient forces. At their first approach the Sentinel giues the alarme: the Garison is presently in armes and man the walls. The first Petard discharged within the hole: all run thither to defend the entry: foure others follow as speedily as their shor. Gentil applied a great mortar, when as beheld the wall opens, and giues them means to enter. He calls for a Saillige to scatter them that came thronging to the breach. Des Roches brings it vnto him, but he is stricken dead with a Musket shot. Gentil cast the Saillige among their feet: it burnes some, lames others, sets fire of their furniture and powder, dischargeth their peeeces, and makes a terrible spoile. Gentil casts himselfe desperately into the breach: the Earle of Montgomery seconds him, preferring the publike profit of this victory, before his priuate griefe for the death of his brother. All the troops strive to go in, and pursue their enemies vnto the entry of the Dungeon. The Engines being speedily prepared to force them, ended them to capitulate, every one to depart with a white wand: leaving the place to the discretion of the Earle Montgomery, and to Gentil a desire to make other enterprises in Britany, the which he had effected, if the Duke of Mercœur had continued in rebellion against the King.

The hazard and burthens of rebellion, ruined the Duke of Aumale onely: he would be more willfull then all the rest. He therefore grew so incensed against him, as the Court of Parliament at Paris made his preceesse, declared him guilty of treason in the highest degree, his picture to be drawne in peeeces with foure horses, all his goods forfeited to the King, adiudged his goodly house at Anet to be razed to the ground, and for more detestation of this trechery, the trees about it cut off by the waile. But he fought his safety with Albert Cardiaall of Austria at Bruxelles, lately come to succed the Archduke Ernest his brother.

Albert assures the besieged in La Fere, to free them: but hee suffered the succours that should relieue them, to be defeated. And the Earle of Fuentes having manned the towns of this new conquest, went to winter in Haynault, and gaue the King means to dismisle most part of his horse to be ready in the Spring against the Cardinals designs. In the meane time he assembled the Estates of Picardy, Bolognois, Vermandois, and Thierache in Amiens: provided for the estate of the Province, and punished some Capitaines with death, whose couetousnesse had partly bin the cause of the former losses.

Whilest that our Henry, assisted now by the Duke of Mayenne in person, brings them of La Fere to be ready to submit vnto his Maiesty, behold the beginning of this new year, sows the seedes which shall bring forth most profitable fruits for the perfect restoring of this Estate. The townes and whole Provinces desire a generall deliury, and nothing daies the effects, but that some gouernors will haue the honour to see the Cannon at their gates, before they treat of their accord: others let their places to sale. A filthy traffike, fit for the confusion of this age, but vnworthy of all good order, vnworthy the duty of good subiects, and vnworthy of the liberty and honour of the French Nobility. The King reducing them by force which will not voluntarily returne to their duties, he willingly giues eare to the mildest and shortest course. He should spend more money to get more honor, but he frames himself after the example & model of Charles the seventh, whose two reignes had many conformities. He desires rather to buy a place for money, then to besiege it with much more charge, and great losse of men. The people suffer great losse, and oft times the issue is doubtfull.

The first fruits of this new year are most happy in generall, and most honourable for the

A the chiefe authors thereof. The Duke of Ioyeuze holds the first ranke. It is hee which shall take againe his possession of a Capuchin, whereunto he was vowed after the death of his wife: and by the decease of the last Duke of Ioyeuze his brother (drowned neare to Villemur) had left it to succede in the name, gouernment and estate of the deceased. Without attending of any force, he yeelds freely to his Maiesties seruice, and the King opening his armes and heart, makes him partaker of his especial fauours, honouring him with the title of Marshall of France, and one of his Lieutenants generall in Languedoc, in the townes, places, and countries he brings to his obedience: giuing him this testimony, that the onely zeale and profession of his religion had made him take armes, without any other pretension whatsoever. By his example the Officers of the Court of Parliament remaining at Tholouza for the exercise of Iustice, the Capitoulx, and all the rest of the Citizens, together with all other people of the Province of Languedoc, which held the contrary party, vnder the authority of the said Duke, make known vnto the King the desire they haue to yeeld obedience and duty vnto his Maiesty, and their resolution to perseuer therein.

The D. of Guise did second this happy beginning of the year, and did sweeten the sharpnesse of those losses which the Spaniards had caused so largely to suffer. He was still vigilant to embrace all occasions that might settle his affaires in his gouernment of Provence, wherewith the King had newly honoured him, having already with the helpe of the Lord of Les Diguières, reduced Cisteron and Riez to the obedience of this crown, and Martegues, with the tower of Boue, seated at the mouth of the Sea: the towne and citadell of Grasse, with the helpe of the Earle of Carces, and the Lord of Croze: he finds a fit opportunity, to make knowne vnto his Maiesty, that hee had quite forsaken the alliance and correspondency which he had with the Spaniard.

Lewis of Aix, and Charles of Casau commanded in Marseilles with great authority, violent men, and of the Spanish faction. They bargained with Philip to sell them this towne of importance, the port of all the Province, and the key of one of the chiefe entrie of this realme, where the Emperor Charles had often knockt, yet could neuer get it open, and for the execution of their design, had already caused some Spanish gallies to approach vnder the command of Prince Charles Doria of Genoua. All such as were fled out of Marseilles, propounded some enterprises vpon the towne to the D. of Guise, but all were weake and of small possibility, yet had he purchased some reproch to fall in his seruice to the King if he had not attempted some one. Peter of Libertà commanded at Arras: Réale, a man of courage, and full of affection to the Kings seruice. He acquaints the D. of Guise with his resolution, either to kill or to shut out these two Tribunes, who every morning at the opening of the gates went with their guards to walke without the towne, that laying an ambush neare vnto the Gate, it would be easie to seize on, to take out of the Port, and to consequently of the Towne. The Duke thinks well of this enterprise: he takes the name of the gate and of the person, for a preface of good fortune: The gate is called Royall, and the liberty which the Predecessors of the vnder-taker had sold, that purchased to the Towne of Calui in Corsica, from whence they came, had defended with a goodly surname of Libertà. But the Dukes neare about at Aix, held these petty tyrants in perpetual distrust. To free them of this insolence, he retires from Marseilles, to employ his forces in some place which might breed no distrust in them. Hee doth therefore besiege and take the townes of Hieres, St. Tropez, and Draguignan, blocks up the citadells, vnder-takes the siege of La Garde, a small Towne, but with a strong Castle, which the Duke of Espernon held, being a corporal to the Duke of Guise in the gouernment of Provence: batters the place, makes a breach, and giues two assaults, and when as they held him far engaged at this siege, he rises, sends his Cannon, comes to Foulon the fifteenth of February, giues the head canons to all his troop, at ten of the clocke at night, at Saint Julian, two leagues from Marseilles, he approaches, and sends his Sentinels of horse before to aduertise him of the signall that Libertà should giue, which was to shut the wicket after the Tribunes: or one of them to descend towards it was a faire day, when as these Coustards being aduertised that they had discharged fifteen hundred, two hundred pices from the gate: Libertà of Aix goes forth, and so doth order them he causeth twenty muskets of his guard to aduertise Libertà of Aix, and so doth the wicket and shuts Libertà out, and Casau within: Libertà of Aix doth see the Duke's Sentinels, seeing seeing the signe given, sends eight horsemen to charge these musketiers, and advanceth A with the rest towards the gate by another way: the footmen present themselves to the charge, as was resolved, but in stead of good reception, the Cannon and small shot plaies on them from the towne. Casau meaning to go forth with his guards to follow his companion, Peter of Liberta thrusts him suddenly through the body: his musketiers charge Liberta, his brothers assist him, the Captaines Hernien, Laurence, Imperiall, and some few others, to whom he had imparted the enterprise, disperse these guards, and set upon the gate, crying; Liberty by the King: and by the authority of this name assured many which were uncertain what party to follow. Then with Liberta they set themselves to guard the Port. Lewis of Aix seeing himselfe shut out, and these unknown men coming to charge him, found means to get over the walls, and to enter the towne by a boate which hee found happily, and being accompanied by Fabio of Casau, the Sonne of Charles that was slaine, and five hundred of his friends and partisans, hee comes to force the gate on the town side: but being repulsed, he goes to the Corps-de-garde, that was before the town-house. Here, by some rumour that he hears, he takes an impression of the peoples ill affection towards him. To free himselfe, he makes shew to goe to the other guards, and so goes to Sea with Fabio to get Saint Victors port, and to assure himselfe of the rest. Some of his friends march after him, some disperse themselves in the towne, and some begin to cry; God save the King, and Liberty. Irrained sore, and the Duke of Guise amazed at this long protraction in the towne, thinking the intelligence had bene double, thought to retire his men engaged in fight, against the musketiers of Lewis of Aix, when as Imperiall and Laurence come to assure him that Casau was slaine. Then began his troops to march into the towne, and for his better assurance, the President Bernard in the open street assembles what honest men he could, and ioynes with the Dukes men, promiseth them that were armed before the Town-house, life, liberty, and freedom: then going to another guard neere to the haven, and to S. Johns Church, where at the first broile about a thousand men were together in armes, by means of the like promise hee easily drew all this multitude, to found forth that happy cry; God save the King, and Liberty.

These two troops being assured, they visit three or foure other guards, whose attempts were to be feared, some they change doubting such as commanded, leaving such as they knew desired to be freed from the command of strangers. So as in lesse then an houre and an halfe, they were all dispersed that lately favoured this new tyranny. Thus the Flower-de-luce, which an ynwollesome winde from Spaine had till now blasted at Marceilles, recovered its ancient beauty, and the white scarfes, which feare had kept in their coffers, or made them to reiect, were now put on.

Charles Doria grows amazed: he dreames of nothing but of his retreat: but so surpris'd as he forgot part of his company. The haven seemed too little to carie forth their least Cock-boate, feare and amazement had so daunted them. The Captaine of Saint Johns Tower, and that of the Moores head might have staid them, or at the least, hindered their escape: but they were stricken with the like terror, expecting the last act of Abiss Tragedy.

The Seignieur of Baufet, Captaine of the Castle d'Is, sought to annoy the stranger with his Cannon, but being far off he did them small hurt. Lewis of Aix had thrust himselfe into S. Victors Abbey, and Fabio of Casau into our Lady of La Garde, but so amazed, as they could not think of their own safeties. Twelve hundred Spaniards being along the haven, retired to enter into their Gallies: but this generall terror had so daunted them, as they save themselves, without any remembrance of their men. The D. of Guise charged them by the Baron of Sel, Lieutenant of his company of men at armes, and La Thiere Captain of his guards, who slew a great number upon the place, and got above a thousand muskets, hargnbuzes, and pikes, and the onely Ensigne which they had, which feare made them forget to their great shame and confusion. The Duke entering into Marceilles without any troupe, made knowne unto the people the freeness of his affection, and the assurance he had of them: he confirmed all things for the Kings service, disappointed the designs of the factious which remained in the towne, and by his presence did so amaze all the garisons thereof, with the Towers and Forts, as they submitted themselves to his discretion, and obeyed the King.

So doubtlesse this young Duke wonne much honor in this action, namely, that the soldiers

A diers entered without effusion of blood, and without spoile, restrained by the respect of his presence, they were contented to have the houses of Aix & Casau for their booty. On the other side, those of La Fere (having nothing free but the ayre, which cannot bee kept from prisoners) suffered (with the hope of succours) the extreamest discommodities which might afflict a place strictly besieged. The Cardinal of Austria (newly come from Spaine into Flanders) promised to delivier the Men supposed this Prince having made no profession of a military life, would find small credit among martial men, who rather follow actions then words, and the example then discipline. But he will teach vs, that the surest strokes come from the head: and if the old Duke of Guise could by a gallant stratagem recover a Towne from the English, most important for the Estate of this Crowne; he in like sort by the like exploit will make himselfe the terror of all Picardy. He departs from Bruxels, and gives it out that he will succour La Fere. For his first fruits, hee finds means to give them some reliefe of men and munition in March. Then in April he caufeth his army (being very strong) to turne head towards Calais, besiegeth, batters, and takes both Towne & Castle by assault, against all the resistance of the besieged, and puts many French Gentlemen to the Sword, being sent to supply the Castle. The Seneschall of Montlimart, commanding the French, and Aluarez Oserio the Spaniards in La Fere, having for the space of five moneths endured all the toyls of war, and seen the River within the Towne to rise two or three foot by the labor of men, had the 22 of the said month, by a good composition somewhat recompensed this so notable a losse, if the Cardinal had planted here the limits of his victories. But continuing the prosperitie of his armes, whilest the Kings are weary, and demand rest, after so great a toyle: he goes in the beginning of May, and camps before Arrdes, a very strong Towne, and notwithstanding their great defence, became Master thereof, the 23 of the month, and resolves to people these townes of his new conquests, with strange Colonies, and prepares to add unto them that of Hulst in Flanders. In the meane time the two armies spend the rest of the Sommer in light roads one into anothers country.

In the beginning of September the Marshall of Biron enters Arthois, takes the Castle of Imbercourt, encounters with five cornets of horse, of the Marquis of Varamon, followed by five or six hundred horse of combat, chargeth them, he kills all that seek to withstand the violence of his armes, puts the rest in rout, takes the Marquis prisoner, and afterwards had forty thousand crownes for his ransom: filled the whole country with feare: then invading the County of Saint Paul, hee took and spoiled the Towne, and some other places.

The Cardinall busied at the siege of Hulst, hearing that the Marquis was taken, he sent the Duke of Arfcot to command in his place. As he enters into Arras the French affaile it on the other side, spoile the country about it, and (laden with booty) the Marshall retires safely into the frontiers of Picardy. Being discharged hee returns to Bapaume, spoiles Hebuterne, Beuuller, Courcelles and other places, defeats such as would make resistance, and caries away more spoile then at the first. And seeing the Duke of Arfcot encamped neere to Arras, under the favor of the Cannon, intrenched carefully and loath to hazard any thing, knowing that he was to deale with one of the happiest and most valiant warriors of Europe, they fire all, and revenge as opportunity would suffer them; the Spaniards outrage in places lately taken: they make a road towards Bethune and Therouenne, bring away many prisoners, furnish their places with cattell at the enemies cost, and without any resistance goe and campe in the plaine of Azincourt. The Duke supplied with eight hundred foot, to assist the Regiment of Colonell Burbank, parts from Arras the 8th of October, and goes and encamps at Saint Paul. The Marshall leaveth him there, returns into Arthois, runs unto Douay, spoiles all: then returning into Picardy, he gave the Duke of Arfcot means to recover the Castle of Humbercourt: who content with this conquest, dismissed his army, and disposed of his companies into garrisons: Then by the means of the Duke of Bouillon, this alliance was confirmed and sworn betwix the King, the Queene of England, and the united Provinces of the Low Countries. For matters past, there is no remedy, and the Politicians hold that there is no law more vnpassible, then that which tendeth to reform what is past. The King therefore to settle his affaires, and to provide for the future, resolve, not to suffer the new Colonies of Doullens, Capelle, Chatelet, Cambray, Calais and Arrdes, and with the new yeare to renew a deadly war against the Spaniard, which might not bee attempted A without a mighty army, nor the army leaued without treasure, the which he could not recouer without the help of his subiects: he assembled, in manner of a Parliament, the greatest and most discreet of the three orders of his Realme, at Rouen the fourth of Nouember, where the Inhabitants of their owne voluntary free will, spent foure hundred thousand Crownes to make his Maiesty an honourable reception, where hee received the Garter (a marke of the Order of England) by the hands of the Earle of Shrewsbury.

An assembly at Rouen in form of a Parliament.

His Maiesty desired to deferue these two glorious titles of Deliuerer and Restorer of his Estate. At his coming to the Crowne hee found France, not only in a manner ruined, but almost all lost for the French: but by the grace of the Almighty, by the prayers, by the good counsell of his loyall Subiects, (who make no profession of armes) by the sword of his Princes, and of his braue and generous Nobility, by his paines and labour, he had preferred it from losse. Let vs see it now from ruine (said our King, speaking to the Assembly) participate, my deere subiects, with me in this second glory, as you haue done in the first. I haue not called you as my Predecessors did, to make you approve my will. I haue caused you to assemble to haue your counsells, to beleue them and to follow them: finally, to put my selfe into your hands. A desire which seldom commands Kings that haue white hairs, and are Conquerors. But the loue I beare vnto my Subiects, and the exceeding desire I haue to adde these two goodly titles to that of King, makes me to finde all easie and honourable. The sharpnesse of winter had laid armes aside, and the excesse of raine caused many inundations, whereof amongst others followed that of the Millers bridge at Paris, which sinking on Saint Thomas night, was the losse of three hundred persons, slaine in the ruins of the building, and drowned in the riuer. Whilst they examine the resolutions taken in this honourable assembly, and that the King prepares for a mighty army to chase the Spaniards out of Picardy, behold the capital City of this Prouince, strong of feat and well fortified, where his Maiesty pretended to make his Arsenall and store-houise for the war, against the Stranger in Arthois, and other Prouinces of the Low-Countries, was surprised in the day time, the people being at a Sermon, without force, and without defence, by the practice of some factions, and the carelessse basenesse of the inhabitants, who standing vpon their ancient priuiledges, had resolved to receiue the Swisses into garison. Hernand Teillo Gouvernour of Doullans for the Spaniard, advertised that the Citizens of Amiens (a proud people, and little practised in armes) would not receiue the garison that the King offered them for the preservation of their Towne, halstens the effect of those intelligences he had there, and on monday the 10 of March he attires forty or fifty soldiers like peasants, laden with many burthens, and armed vnderneath with daggers, and short peeces, and marcheth with about seuen hundred horse, and 5000 foot: he takes his ambushes neare vnto the Towne, and the next day sends his disguised Soldiers to the gate of Montreuil, following a cart, which being vnder the Portcullis, one of the pretended peasants cuts the horic trace, and by the great disorder of the horic, hinders the liberty of the gate. The others presently discouer their armes, seize vpon the Corps-de-guard, and give a signe to the ambush. The ambush comes horse and foot, and enter into the towne, and goe directly to the market-place: the troops enter, take the fort, and seize vpon the Arsenall and munition which the King had lately sent thither, and compound with the townsmen for the redeeming of their goods. But at length they had both cloth and siluer, and those of Amiens shall gettist much of the Spaniards command; but the sharpnesse thereof will make them desire the middle of the French. The great bell of Beffroy did ring at the first tumult, as it was their manner, but few were moved thereat. Some heard the Sermon, others slept at their sale, as some were contented to shut their shops and to retire themselves into their houses. The Earle of S. Paul was then in the Towne, but seeing the small care and endeavour of the Inhabitants to resist this forraigne invasion, he gets himselfe out of Amiens with all speed, and comes to Corbey. This affront had in shew made the realm without all hope of recovery, and without meanes to assaile, for the best of all the Kings designs seemed disappointed in their beginning. They thought Amiens could not be recovered but by surprise, and that the hope to take it would breed with the enterprize; and now the Spaniard began to think that Amiens should be the bounds of the country of Arthois, as in former times vnder Philip D. of Bourgongne.

A Bourgongne. But when as the affaires require a present remedy, our Henry wants neither courage nor counsell. They were hopes built in the ayre. His Maiesty doth speedily besiege it, gives order that no greater forces may come to raise vp these mountaines of pride, which build the honour of their nation vpon the flame of such a losse: he batters it with fise and forty Cannons, makes the Marshall of Biron Lieutenant in his army, besiegeth it on the strongest part, restraines their sallies, keeps them within their trenches, and approacheth in such sort, as by the midst of Iuly, they might hurt one another with stones: then lodging vpon the ditch, and cutting off the besieged daily in their sallies, or other stratagems, he made Hernand to hast the Cardinall to his succour.

B. Some place of importance taken from the Spaniard, might in this seruise as a reprisall. Capitaine Gentil of Geusaudan, tried all his wits and inuention for this designe, for the effecting whereof hee went by night to view the Towne and Cattle of Perpignan in the Country of Roussillon, and found no difficulty but to leaue men without alarm in the country. Languedoc might furnish sufficient being the frontier, but the Spaniard entertained many secret spies. Gentil therefore thinks it best to take them in more remote places, 200 horse were to be leauied in Poitou, who vnder a colour to ioyne with the Duke of Guise, take their way by Guienne to Beziers, and should giue no ialousie in regard of their small number. And 2000 foot, leauied in Viarez and Geusaudan by the Seigneurs of Fosseuse and Chambauld should crosse base Rouergue, vnder colour of espousing themselves by the Kings commandment into Bayonne, (whither by the common brute the Spaniard was bringing an army) and by the rocky and hidden waies should defend on the side of Beziers, loone after the taking of Perpignan: feigning to take the way to Thoulouze to recouer Bourdeaux, and from thence Bayonne. This resolution being taken, Gentil imparts it to the Seigneur of Plessis Moray at Saumur, and to the Constable at Paris, they allow of it, and hee, assuring himselfe to take the Cattle at the first without Petard, during the long nights, he might from the Cattle (being furnished with about thirty peeces of Ordnance) thundring into the enemies trenches, bring his troops into the Towne; and the brute of this vnexpected newes would haue armed 20000 men in Languedoc in 3 daies to invade all the country of Roussillon. The King himselfe held it D feasible, and caused dispatches to be made to Gentil, as well for himselfe as for Fosseuse, and Chambauld. But at the instant pursuit of the Bishop and Inhabitants of Mende, his Maiesty hauing commanded that the Citadell should be dismantled, and Fosseuse Governour of the place, pretending recompence for some charges, before hee would suffer the Cannon to be transported. The King commanded the Duke of Vanadour to besiege him within Mende, in the month of August, and to force him to that which hee would not willingly yeeld vnto.

They of Perpignan thinke this siege attempted to surprize them, and stand vpon their guards: notwithstanding his Maiesty giueth order for another leaue in Languedoc by the Lords of Spondillan, Conas, Montbasen, Legues, and other chiefe men of that Clymat; but whose actions being neare the frontier, could not be hidden from the enemy. Thus Gentil seeing his designe anticipated from the longest nights to the shortest in the year, and that those of Languedoc were employed therein, he thought it could hardly be successful. The Marshall of Ornans had the conduct of this enterprize. Ten or twelue thousand men follow him confusedly as to a certaine victory. But the most part are thrust on with the glistering of the doubloons of Spaine, and with a desire of spoile. And can we wonder if heauen doth not blesse those enterprizes, where the consideration of private gaine doth march before that of the publicke good? Hee was not come out of Dauphine where he was Gouvernour, before all the neighbour Prouinces were posselt of it: and aduertisements were come out of Spaine to them that were threatened. Vpon their F approaches to the towne, the Marshalls guide wandered in the night. The Petards were brought neare vnto the town gate, but the rolling bridges to ioyne vnto the draw-bridge could not be made ready before day. The towne was barricaded euen vnto the gates, and the Cannon planted. All the whole country did shine with the fires that were made: this enterprize being vnderaken with too much brute, and some of the chiefe commanders, following vp al the best spoiles of an imaginary conquest, learned, that it is a rashnesse to diuide the Beares skin before the bea be taken: moreover, reason would not but the author of a goodly enterprize should haue the principall conduct, to the end that he should either reape the honour of his exploit, or the blame of his error. Gentil A is knowne to be capable for such effects, and if many during our inciuill wars had performed thelike stratagems both in quality and quantity to him, France had not so long groaned vnder the burthen of her miseries. All France did in the meane time run to the siege of Amiens: all Europe attended the issue, and did iudge that the end thereof would be the beginning of our slavery, or of our liberty. But whilst the plague afflicts the besieged, that many and sundrie exploits of war diminish their numbers, and many remain vnprofitable, by reason of their wounds: let vs wander a little into some other Prouinces both within and without the Realme, whereas their war hath any thing common with ours. The want and dearth of victuals afflicted Britany in the moneth of May, and forced the Marshall of Brisfack in Iuly, to diuide and separate some troops which he had gathered together, to preferue some Parishes about Rennes, which the enemies threatened to spoile. The Lord of Saint Laurence, Lieutenant for the D. of Mercœur in his army, desirous to visit the said Duke, lately come to Chasteaubriant, and to giue him newes of some braue stratagem, takes six companies of men at armes with his owne, the regiment of Tremereue, brother to S. Lawrence, fortie Harguebuziers out of euery company of the garisons of Dinan, and some other troops both of horse and foot, making 600 or 700 men, and comes to lodge at Maure, seuē leagues from Rennes. The Lords of Tremblay, la Troche, Teny, la Courbe, Beaumont, and Pomeray, being lodged at Mellac vpon Villaine, three leagues from Maure with some forces, march by the Marshalls commandment to fight with S. Lawrence: they finde hee was dislodged, follow and ouertake him within three hundred paces, charge the troops led by Tremereue, appointed to make retreat, kill about 60, and force the rest to fly to their maine strength. They presse them in such sort, as they must either suffer themselves to be slain without resistance, or else fight: they turne head, take a place of aduantage in a field well ditched about, and there make some resistance. But seeing Tremereue, brother to S. Lawrence already taken prisoner, La Pomeray Capitaine of Dinan, and Vicins Vile, slaine vpon the place, with about 150 souldiers, and some members of Companies, all giue way, all fly, all are put to rout, and the most part falling into the peasants hands, finde lesse mercy with them, then they had done rigor with the victors. This was the twentieth of Iuly. On the other side, as the Spaniard had set one foot into Picardy, so did hee long labour to cast the other into Campagne, and had many designs vpon the Townes lying vpon the river of Menze, Medieres, Sedan, Mouzon, Villefranche, Rocroy, and Maubert. Fontaine: but the care and loyalty of the Gouenours, hauing alwaies made frustrate the hope of his enterprises, hee now conuerts his open force into secret intelligences and dishonest practices.

Villefranche is a very small towne, or rather a corps-de-gard made of foure square bastions, built by King Francis the first, to serue as a bar against the incursions of the Bourguignons (so they call all the King of Spaines subiects lying vpon this frontier, and euen those of the Duchy of Luxembourg) and falling into strangers hands, it opened them the gate to enter into Champagne, and gaue them an assured retreat to fauour their inroads. To this intent Gaucher, late one of those souldiers which they call of Fortune, being come within ten yeares to some credit by armes, practiseth with some souldiers of the garison, to sell and deliuer him the place. These souldiers giue eare to this trafficke, certaine Gaucher, but with as crosse a hope as his name was vntoward and ominous, for they impart the matter to Tremeler Gouernor of Villefranche, commanding one company of men at armes, and three of foot. Tremeler by this trafficke, pretends a great effect for the Kings seruice, commands the souldiers to deale more plainly with this Captain, imparts it to the Earle of Grandpré, to Rumelin, and to Estuieux Gouernor of Meuzon, Maubert, and Sedan; and draws from them assistance of men, and means to frame a double intelligence. These Merchants treat with Gaucher, agree vpon the time & houre to deliuer their ware, they receiue some money in hand, and take his word for the rest.

The fourth of August at night was appointed for the execution, and for a signe a Cannon should be discharged. But Rumelin had the night before brought in a supply of men, needfull for the preservation of the place, and with the rest hee lay in ambush halfe a league from the Towne, as Gaucher should passe. Gaucher approacheth, hee causeth all his troops to light, a quarter of a league from Villefranche, puts a part of them very secretly into the ditch, and followes with the rest to second the first attempt: but at all

A aduentures he causeth his horse to be led after him. The first enter by fauour of the souldiers: the signe is giuen, and being giuen, those which thought to surpris, find themselves surpris'd: all are put to the sword, consumed by wild-fire, or drowned in the ditch. Rumelin comes out of his ambush at the same time, chargeth Gaucher behinde, kills three hundred men vpon the place, and suffers few of his enemies to escape, through fauour of the night: finally, of five or six hundred men which he brought, scarce fifty escaped death or imprisonment, and had it not bene for the horse which Gaucher held ready to fauour his flight, he had not escaped the victors hands.

B Let vs passe into Sauoy, and see the progresse of the Kings forces, the taking of places, and victories obtained. This warre shall helpe much for the recovery of Amiens, for they diuert the forces of Sauoy from molesting of the King in sundry places at once: for the managing whereof, the Lord Les Diguieres parted from Court in the end of March, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant Generall, gathers together about 600 horse, and 5000 foot, in the moneths of April, May, and Iune: enters into Maurienne, a Country depending on the Duchy of Sauoy, the high way to Piedmont and Italy, surpasseth with much labour and toile the difficulties of the wayes, rocks, and steepe hills: in the end hee recouers the top of the mountaine, finds there a Corps-de-gard of 500 men well fortified, and with his tyred army chargeth them with such fury, as the enemy not able to withstand their force, is constrained to quit the place. Presently the army comes to Saint Iohn of Maurienne, the chiefe towne of the Country, and seizeth on all the valley.

C These conquests as suddenly executed, as wisely attempted, thrust on the Conqueror to goe and fight with certaine Spaniards which were sent into Flanders to oppose against the prosperous successe of Cont Maurice; but the bridges being broken, and the waters very great, stayed his passage. Hereupon hee comes, that Dow Sancho Earle of Salines, Generall of the Duke of Sauoyes light horse, is about Bragorant with a part of the Dukes army. Les Diguieres marcheth thither, chargeth the Earle, makes him to quit the Castle of Saint Michel, and some other villages where he had fortified himselfe, chafeth him by Mont-Senys into Piedmont, and so hotly, as hee most part to make themselves more light cast away their armes. Being thus peaceably possessed of all Maurienne, he fortifies S. Iohn D and the Castle of Saint Michel, and seizeth on all the forts that might serue for the safety of the Country.

To stay the Conquerors course, the Duke of Sauoy passed the mountaines, by the valley of Ault with three thousand Italians, and a good number of horse, and came by Chambery into Tarentaise, where his army remained vnder the command of the Earle of Martinengues, consisting of eight hundred horse, and six thousand foot: he came and encamped beyond the river of Isère (yet vnder the fauour of the Cantons of Montmaison) at the Castle of Saint Helena. Les Diguieres continues his conquests, hee approacheth within musket-shot of the Duke, besiegeth and takes the tower of Aiguebelle, the castles of Rochette, of Villars-Sallet a house of the Earles of Montmaison, de L'huile and Chamouisset, and besiegeth the fort of Chamouisset, being defended by Philippe, bastard brother to the Duke of Sauoy, places very commodious and profitable for victuals and forage, and which stoppeth the passage from Sauoy into Maurienne.

E Here newes come to Les Diguieres, that the Duke hath a fort on the other side of Isère, to assure the passage for his army, and meanes to lodge at Chamouisset, a place of great aduantage, which might greatly annoy the Kings army and the passage betwixt Dauphine and it. This fort was of a triangular forme, made defensib, and raised the height of a pike in one night; it was guarded by 600 choise souldiers out of the whole army of Sauoy, & fortified with many gentlemen of the Chukes Court. Les Diguieres viewes it, and propounds it in Councell, & according to their aduise that were about him, saures F it with some volley of Cannon, opens it at one point, sends 2000 harguebuziers, commanded by the Lord of Crequy his sonne in law, who seconded by a troop of horse, entred suddenly into the fort, and in despite of their obstinate resistance, and the force of foure peeces which played incessantly from the other side of the river along the flanks of the said fort, they carried it in sight of the Duke, and kill by the sword and water about foure hundred men, and many of the Dukes Gentlemen, who was in person in his army beyond the river of Isère, and forced the fort. The Baron of Chamouisset borne in the Gornie was slaine there, the Colonell was taken prisoner, and the Castle of Chamouisset yielded yielded the next day by composition. The towne of Charbonniere, a place strong of situation, which couers Aiguebelle, and might be made fit to annoy Montmelian, seeing their Capitaine and many others slaine with the Cannon, came likewise into the victors power.

The Castle of Aignille remayned yet, a strong place both by nature and art, vpon the side of a mountaine, inaccessible of one side, hauing on the other a double ditch, with a thick rampar betwixt both, yet was it taken after two hundred Cannon shot. This place assured all Maurienne, and that which lies beyond Isere to his Maiesties obedience from Mont Senys vnto Montmelian. The supplies the Duke expected, caused the Lances of Sauoy to remaine in quiet. Being now fortified with two thousand five hundred Suisse, and as many Spaniards and Neapolitans, he comes with all this army to lodge about Montmelian, and resolues to set vpon the Kings army. To free him of some part of this trouble, Des Dignieres turns towards him with his forces, and comes to incamp at Mollettes, halfe a league from Montmelian, the river of Isere being betwixt them. The Duke passeth the river vpon a bridge of boates made neere vnto that of Montmelian, and lodgeth at the Castle of Saint Helena, right against Molette, places some-what high, and within Cannon shot one of an other, separated by a great meadow and a fenne; at the first they salute one another by skirmishes, and if the Sauoisiens had done what they might, they had greatly annoyed our men, who were not lodged nor scarce armed. The night approaching ended the combat, with the losse of a hundred good men, and gaue means to the Kings C troops to take breath, and prepare to be reuenged with vsurie. The next day the Duke shews 15000 foot, and 1500 horse, in bataille, in this great meadow, but with such advantage, as no man might charge them. Des Dignieres intrencheth himselfe at the foot of the meadow: euery master of the Camp, euery Capitaine takes his quarter, and by the care of the Lord of Crequi commanding the foot, the Kings campe was in short time out of present danger, which seemed to threaten their ruine. In the meane time they faile not on either side to trie their swords, and pistolls, two to two, three to three, troop to troop, and nothing but a simple ditch, yet deepe and full of water, keeps the two armies from a bloodie fight.

Thus for some dayes these warriors inflamed their resolutions, when as the Duke of Sauoy propounded to his Councell a great designe, for the execution whereof the fourteenth of August by eight of the clocke in the morning, he secretly drawes three thousand men into a great wood, neere to the trenches of the Kings army, lodgeth his Suisse with a battailon of foot on another side, sets his horse in a vallie, and encouraging them by his presence, causeth about two of the clocke a Cannon to be discharged, for a signe of a cruell and bloodie bataille, but fuller of passion then of iudgement. The losse fell vpon himselfe: the Kings troops, both horse and foot, were with a firme resolution prepared to withstand their force. They come to skirmish: the noyse of the Cannon, drownes all other sounds, the fire of the shot inflames the ayre and seemed for fust houres together to dazzle the light of the Sunne: the meadow is couered with dead carcases, the enemies blood dies the brookes, and inflames our men to fight. The Seigneur of Crequi receiues a musket shot in the right arme: but the Lion is chased and stormies at the light of his owne blood. So retrying himselfe apart vnder a tree to be drest, he returns speedily to his companions, and burning with a generous heat of reuenge, shewes that he is a right heire; both in blood and vertue to that braue Lord of Pontdorny, who hath so often heretofore died his sword and arme in the blood of the stranger being enemie to this Crowne. About twelve hundred men slaine or hurt made the day famous, and made the Sauoisien lose all desire to trie any more the firme resolution of our men, grounded vpon the right of a most iust offensive warre.

If all this great armie, neither by the thunder of their Cannons, nor the furie of their foot, neither by the force of their men at armes, could any thing shake the constancie of our men, doth Colonnell Ambrose thinke to preuaile more with five hundred naturall Spaniards assailing a Corps-de-gard, placed on the side of a fenne: but he doth increase their shame, in stead of reuenging their publike losse. The Seigneurs of Baume and Poët receiue him with such resolution, as they kill a hundred and fiftie vpon the place, and take many prisoners: the rest they force to cast away their armes, to be the more light to fle. The Duke spent the night to burie his men; and to carrie away the wounded: then he dislodged

A dislodged the sixteenth, and went to lodge at a village called Barraux beyond Isere, at the entry of the valley of Grisiuand towards Grenoble, and there begins a fort, busying himselfe in the building thereof vnto the end of Nouember. This change of lodging inuited our men to do the like. Des Dignieres comes to lodge at Castle Bayard, and his armie at Pont-Charra, halfe a league from the enemie, the river being betwixt them: hee keeps his men in continuall skirmish, to the enemies losse, and by this placing of his campe, makes the enemie doubt that he would attempt the passage to Echilles. To crosse him the Duke sends many troopes to enter by the valley of Pragens into the countrie of Briancon, and to shut vp the passage in case hee were besieged. The check hee receiued counterailed the first. The water, the sword, and the steepe mountaines, deuoured a greater number of his men, then the skirmishes of S. Helene and Molettes.

B Behold a third, which shewes that God doth fauour the iust cause of armes, and makes their effects happie against the iniustice of vsurpers. The eight of September, the Lord Des Dignieres (who lets not slip any occasion) is aduertised that Sanchez Earle of Salines, (to draw him to succour his owne Prouince, and to leaue Sauoy) goes to spoyle about Grenoble with five hundred masters diuided into two bands of horse.

To adde this victory to the former, he sends two houres before day, the Seigneurs of Baume, Authon, and Saint Iure with two hundred horse, and a hundred Carbins to lie in ambush in an Island in the midst of the river of Isere. At the break of day, the Earle C passeth in sight of them: they suffer him to aduance about halfe a league, then they issue forth of their ambush, and wade through the other part of the river to their sadle skirts, they ouertake the Earle at La Frette, charge him furiously, kill Dom Iohn de Sequano first Capitaine of the horse, Dom Roario, Dom Prabis, with many other Commanders and men at armes, to the number of two hundred; and by the taking of Dom Evangeliste, who led the second troope of the Earle of Gatinari, of Dom Iohn Tac, brother in law to the Earle, and threecore others, they end the combat, and returne with honour, hauing lost but sixe men in this bold encounter. Some daies after, the Lord Des Dignieres passeth the river, with most part of his horse, at Chaparouillon, and there charging a troope of the enemies, which made a good shew by the fauour of some trenches, gaue the Seigneurs of D Crequi and Buille the second honor of this victorie.

The last of October, the Kings armie ill lodged at Pontcharra, rettyred about Grenoble: from thence Des Dignieres sent foure regiments towards Barcelonne, and surmounting the toile of the way, being of most hard access to the Cannon, tooke Aliott: then in the end of Nouember, Saint Genis, to disappoint the intelligences which the Duke of Sauoy might haue with some ill affected in Dauphine. But a few daies before the Earle of Roche had failed by the means of Albigny a yonger brother of Gordes, to deliuer the towne of Romans to the Sauoisien: for Saint Ferriol, that commanded in his absence, had some ineking: who by the aduertisement hee gaue to the Officers of the Parliament, whom the plague had transported to Romans, hee saued the towne from the rule of a Stranger.

E The Duke wonderfully grieved to haue failed of Romans, retires to Chambery, and the Lord of Crequi with foure regiments to Maurienne, very happily to make his coming famous: for hauing first by the assistance of the Lord of Pasquieres, kept Dom Amade the Dukes bastard brother, from passing with his troops on the side of the mountaines, hee made the way open for a braue and generous stragem. The Earle of Carraual would likewise passe with a regiment of twelue ensignes, and two Cornets of horse. Crequi parts before day from S. Iohn of Maurienne, marcheth directly towards him, encounters him at Saint Andre, chargeth, defeats, takes him prisoner with all the Commanders, and for a monument sends their colours and Cornets to the King, which hang yet as a trophie in our Ladies church at Paris, to his Maiesties great content. Let vs now see the countenance of them that were besieged at Amiens. If there were valour without to win the wall, there was resolution within to burie themselves in the ruines thereof, rather then to abandon it. The batterie continued with a strange furie. The extraordinary deepe trenches, the sap and mine, the arrival of the Dukes of Mayenne, Bouillon, and the troops which increased daily, gaue hope to the Citizens of Amiens, loone to see themselves vnder the milde command of their lawfull Prince, and to returne to their ancient fortunes. The sickness, plagues, hurts, and other infirmities, had diminished the besieged to the number of two thousand: the diuersitie of nations threatened some new change, the soldiers diers would no more trust the cunning and vaine promises which Hernando gaue them by A counterfeit Letters from the Cardinall: the old and bad drugges killed in stead of curing: finally the Letter of Hernando to the Cardinall being intercepted, gines a very sufficient testimonie of the vrgent necessitie which leads him to his ruine. It is now time (saide he) that we cease to write, for I labour with the souldiers and Burgeses as the rauenin, where within few dayes I attend a continuall battery of the enemy on three parts. Mans reason sayes vs: our hope is in God, and in your Highnesse speedy comming to giue battell, or to receiue it. Wee attend the second causes should worke.

There is no lesse honour to keepe well, then to make a goodly conquest. To praefise this ancient saying, the Cardinall having assembled foure thousand horse, and fiftene B thousand foot, with eightene Cannons, and fise or six hundred wagons chained together, to serue as a barricado, and to inclose his campe, he marched to vngage or to succour the besieged, publishing in all places, that he would giue battell. But before hee approacheth, he sends to discouer the way which he was to take, and where he might lodge nearest to the towne. This charge he gaue to Canteras, Commissary general, who led the troope to Don Gaston Spinola and T. Alfedo Marshalls of the campe, to Don Ambros Landriano Lieutenant general of the Light-horse, Don John Bracamont, to Colonell Bourlotte, Nicholas Basso and other chiefe Commanders of his army. These to giue the lesse alarm, take about 400 choise horse, and make a shew as if they would come but to Dourlans, but they giue order that the troops of horse at Dourlans, Hefdin and Bapaume should bee ready when they passed.

Thus increased by the said garisons, and making a troope of nine hundred or a thousand horse, the nine and twentieth of August they come beneath Saint Quirice, a village vpon the banke of a small riuer, two leagues from the Kings quarter: and begin to view the said lodging. A troope of light-horse and Carabins comming from an ambush which they layed, discouer them, the Seigneur of Heucourt doth aduersely the King at six of the clocke in the morning.

Behold one of the effects of his Maiesties speedy resolution, of his great iudgement in warre, and his exceeding diligence in his executions. Behold moreover a patterne of that happinesse which attended him at this siege, and the earnest penny of an absolute victorie which God prepared for him against his enemies. Two alarms had kept the King waking the rest of the night, and he now began only to take a littlerest. Hee riseth, goes to horse, hauing about him the Master of his horse and some Noblemen: he passeth by the Carabins quarter, commands them to horsehacke with some light-horse, commands the Constable to stay in the quarter to giue order to all euents, and goes directly where the enemy had bene discouered, more with an intent to provide for the places which they might haue viewed, then to fight: thinking they would not haue bene so slacke in the retreat, being neere vnto an army led by so vigilant a Commander. The Marshal of Biron comes posting after him, the Lord of Montigny brings a troope of light-horse. Some Noblemen and Gentlemen of his Court post thither in haste, to haue their part thereof.

His Maiefty makes a battaillion 200 horse, and 150 Carabins. Hee pursues them with all speed to Encre, seuen Leagues from his quarter, hee puts his Carabins before, who seeing themselves seconded by his Maiefty, charge resolutely, and so smaze them, as seeing the King followe them, and knowing him very well, they brake, and take their flight diuers wayes, leauing them that were appointed for the retreat, or such as were not well mounted. There were about forty slaine at the first charge, and about two hundred of the best being prisoners, gaue the Carabins meanes to furnish themselves with horse, armes, and apparell.

To make this victory absolute, his Maiefty sends the Marshal of Biron with the Lord of Montigny before, and halfe his troope with them: the other hee keeps with himselfe, pursues them within a League of Bapaume, rithes their troope by the way, and doth not abandon them vntill they came within view of their retreat: he takes two Cornets from them, and kills or takes fise hundred horsemen. The generall ioy thereof in the army brought the newes vnto the besieged, who by a heavy and mournfull silence shewed they had no pleasure therein.

But see, the third of September the death of Hernand Tiello slaine with a Musket, at the defence of the rauenin which his Maiefty caused to bee assailed, assisting them with a pub-

A a publike sorrow, giues the Citizens as assurance of a speedy deliery, and the assailants to conceiue a certaine hope of victory. There is no so great prosperity, but is crossed with some aduersity, and trouble. Two dayes after, the Lord of Saint Laz; Gouernour of Brouage and great Master of the Artillery of France, slaine in the trenches, obtained that graue and worthy testimony of his valour from his Maiesties mouth, to haue lost that day a most valiant and faithfull seruant, leauing his people much grieved, and the whole campe lamenting this generall losse to France, as of one of the brassest Capitaines of his age.

In the meane time the Cardinall approached, vinting that he would fight within foure B daies. Yet had hee no inclination to put it in practice. The King to draw him to battell, prevents the policy which the enemy would vse to succour the place: he takes his place of battell on the top of Long-pré, a quarter of a league behinde the inclosure of his campe, intrenched as well to saue themselves from the cannon shot of the towne, and from theirs that came to succor them. And to keepe the enemy from sending in any succors on the other side of the riuer, he leaues the Lords of Montigny, La Noué, de Vicques and Chuseaux, there with three thousand foot, and foure hundred horse.

The fiftenth of the said month, the towne being reduced to that estate, as without succors it must needs yeeld of it selfe, the Cardinall in the morning casts two artificiall bridges vpon the riuer of Somme, where through the fauour of his forces and cannon he C passeth two thousand, fise hundred men, amongst which were eight hundred choise capitaines, so thrust themselves into the towne, and about two of the clocke he shewes himselfe in the view of Long-pré, with an order which in shew did promise a generous attempt. But the diligence of his Maiesties courage without feare, and the wise order hee presently gaue at his arriual, changed their braue countenance into a cowardly and base feare. The King leaues three thousand men to guard the trenches against the sallies of the towne: hee presently marcheth with all his troopes to the place of battell, and plants his Cannon to his best aduantage.

approacheth.

The Artillery of the besieged and of them that came to succor them, thunders, but they D passe ouer his Maiesties esquadrons. Our men during this siege haue bene well acquainted with the shot of the Cannon, but they stand firme like rocks. They tyre the enemy with continuall skirmishes, the Cannon mightily annoyes them, the admirable government of the Leader, and the firme resolution of the assailants doth so terrifie them, as at the first attempt they thinke of a retreat, and presently they retire to the quarter where the Kings light-horse did lodge by the riuers side. The foure aboue named Colonels hauing discouered the Cardinals Stratagem, charged them that came to succor the towne, kill, take, & force the whol body to repasse the riuer in disorder, and to abandon their bridges. The King seeing the enemy lodged alongst the riuer, passeth three cannons ouer the water, shootes at them, and doth annoy their lodging, and remaining all night on the place of battell, abates the ioy which the besieged had shewne by the number of fires which E they had made. So the Cardinall seeing all his attempts fruitlesse, in stead of turning head to the towne, or against the French troopes, he begins very early in the morning to retire and to take an other lodging on the mountaine of Vignacourt.

The King follows him with foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foot, lodgeth vpon the next hill and a great valley betwixt them, continues foure or fise houres in battell before their army, prouokes them by his Cannon and continuall skirmishes, views all their forces, number, forme and countenance, and seeing them disposed to retire, determines to charge them in their lodging. But it is good somerimes to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. Moreover, it was a great glory for his Maiefty to haue shamefully chased him away, without raising the siege from so great a towne, and to haue pursued F him with the Cannon three Leagues.

They take a contrary way, and couer the right wing of their army, which lay next to the French, with their wagons chained together: they cause their horse to aduance into the head of the army in forme of a halfe moone, and their foot into battalions, diuided into forward, battell and reuerward: they place their Cannon in the head of these esquadrons, in this sort they place their trooper, and their baggage in safety, making a shew sometimes as if they would charge. But seeing, that to come to the gates of the City besieged, they must force through the Kings army, which being in battell did fight with their their countenances and gesture, they have no will to attempt this passage, and by their speedy retreat, give all France an assured hope to be soon freed from this strange nation, which sought to ruine it. The besieged are now forced to yeeld to the victors law. This shamefull retreat hath ouerthrowne their first resolution. Their practices, incantations, engines, their incredible labour to cast vp earth, their many Cannons, their deepe trenches, their continual watching, nor the strength of the place, could not keepe the assaillants from lodging vpon their rampier and ravelin, and so neare, as they came to handy blows. So two daies after, the Marquis of Montenegro, who commanded in the towne after the death of Hernand, doth promise to yeeld the place, if within six daies he be not succoured with two thousand horse that should enter into the towne.

Amiens yeelded
and the
depart.

So was it said, and so done. The time inquired the Cardinall, and gaue him leasure, being with all his forces within seven leagues of the towne, but he had neither will nor power to relieue them. And therefore according to the capitulation made the nineteenth, that the souldiers should depart with their armes, their matches light, their colours flying, and drums sounding, with their horse and baggage, and whatsoever they could carry away of theirs: the 2. of the moneth, his Maiesty hauing put his army in battell, sent the Constable, the Marshall of Biron, the Duke of Montafon, and the Lord of Viques to the Port of Beauuois where the garison should come forth, who comming to the gate, the bridge is let downe, and the Marquis comes forth on horse-backe alone, but followed by a hundred and thirty horse, and as many Harguebuziers on foot for the guard of his person. They receiue him, and conduct him to his Maiesty, who attended him halfe a league from the towne: the King was accompanied with his white Cornet, wherein were about seuentene hundred horse, and fise hundred Suisses, hauing about him the Prince of Conry, the Dukes of Montpensier, Neuers, and Nemours, the Prince of Ioinuille, the Marshalls of France, and other Noblemen in great numbers, mounted vpon goodly Couriers with rich carapasons: he doth embrace him most graciously, and then dismisseth him. He goes to horse, and by the Kings commandement, the Constable conducts him two leagues vnto the confines of the King of Spaines territories.

All the Spanish Captaines and others both horse and foot, passing by his Maiesty, light from their horses and kisse his boote, with great humility and reuerence, and follow their Leaders, being receiued by the King with courteous words. After the Marquis and his guard, followed about a 1000 women of base quality, amongst the which some foure hundred of the towne marched willingly, a hundred and threecore waggons, laden with all kinde of baggage, and vpon them about 300 men sicke of the plague, and wounded, fourteene hundred shot, and six hundred corselets well appointed, and in the end ten companies of horse, six of men at armes Lancers, and foure of Carabins, which made in all about fise hundred horse.

The King hauing not by policy, but by the most memorabile attempt, and the greatest glory of armes that might be, pulled this strong Towne out of the strangers paws, without the recovery whereof he was in danger to be lost, and plunged in the gulfes of miseries: he entered the same day into Amiens towards night, triumphant and victorious, as into his owne towne recovered from the enemy, accompanied with a thousand gentlemen on horse-backe, and receiued with a wonderfull ioy and applause of all the people: he lighted at our Ladyes Church, and caused solemne thanks to be giuen to God: hee placed twenty companies of foot, and three of horse in Garison, and gaue the Government thereof to the Lord of Viques. Doubtlesse, O Lord, we haue reason herein to admire the wonders of thy mercy! The surpris of this place seemed late a Charybdis, to swallow vp the greatest part of France. But it is not now alone, that the iudgments of God doe make vs know, that if he puls vs downe with one hand, hee raiseth vs vp with the other; and if we be vpon the brink of our destruction, hee retirers vs by the hand to saue vs. So his prouidence subuerted the designs of the Spaniard, who by this trophie promised to extend his conquests, & recover these places and prouinces which he had lost. So from the trouble bred by the enemies of this estate, grew the aduancement of our quiet, from their pernicious practices, the assurance of the country, & seding of inconstant minds from their vniust attempts & violence: one of the greatest actions that hath been of long time for the good of France, and preservation of this Monarchy. The losse of Amiens was shamefull, but the recovery glorious: the taking strange, but the reduction admirable, at his enemies

A enemies nose, and in view of his armie. Finally, a reduction, which giues as much consolation as the inuasion brought desolation.

The Cardinall retreat puts the King in hope, that God would doe him iustice, for the wrongs that he and his had done vnto his Realme: with this designe hee marcheth with his troopes, and 18 peeces of Cannon to Dourlans, into the which the Cardinall in passing had put some of the best men of his army, with a great conuoy of victuals and munition of warre. He presents himselfe, and seeks by all means to draw them out of the precinct of their walls. But being loth to aduenture any thing, his Maiesty passeth into Arthois, fills the Country with feare and terrour, goes vnto the gates of Arras, into the which the Cardinall had shut himselfe, discharge thine, and twenty or thirty volleys of Cannon, makes a stand there: and by all the deuices which a generous and warlike mind may inuent, he seeks to draw him to fall forth, and to see some braue exploit of his men at armes.

Roads into Arthois.

In the end, his Maiesty not able by any stratagem to heat these cold humors which did freeze their hearts through feare, the rest of his victorious army, after so great toyle, endured in so long and painfull a siege, the raine and the sharpnesse of winter which approached called him backe to prouide for a people, who by the negligence of their owne health, had lately, as it were, enclosed within their walls the destiny of France, and to passe into Britany, to finish that great worke, for the restoring of this Monarchy, that afterwards he might with all his forces, set vpon the common enemy of his Estate, if the negotiation of peace betwixt these two mighty warriours, practised by the Pope, a common father, did not take effect.

retreat.

But before we proceed, let vs see the last acts of the Tragedy that was played in Sauoy. The difcommodities of the lodging of Pont-Charra, caused the Kings army to winter about Grenoble, and the extraordinary Snow stops the passages from Daulphiné into Sauoy. The Duke of Sauoy embraceth the time and occasion, to recover the Country of Maurienne. He parts in February with twelue Cannons, and by the indaction of Albigny, camps before Aiguebelle. At the first brute hereof, Des Digueres sent the Lord of Crequy, vnder the authority of Lieutenant general for the King in Sauoy: hee causeth him to passe the rough and steepe mountaines on foot, where through the rigor of the season, appeared no traces of man on the side of Vsaigny, to march more safely, accompanied onely with seuen or eight Gentlemen. He arriues happily at S. Iohn of Maurienne, findes that the Seigneur of Pasquieres, commanding in the said place, had fortified the approaches of the bridges of Amefrex and Hermillon with good barricadoes, and finished them with speed. The sixt of March the Duke puts his Cannon in battery, and the next day Arce Capitaine of the said place, yeelds it vpon composition not to ioyne with Crequy but to returne towards Grenoble. They supposed this place would haue held at the least fixe weekes: and the Sauoisien, to deceiue the Siegneur of Crequy, being lodged but three leagues from him, continues shooting his Cannon into the aire, to persuade him that the place was not yet yeelded. Crequy abused by this stratagem of Albigny, marcheth with a good troope of foot, to take some lodging from the enemy, thinking that Aiguebelle did yet hold good. But God will haue man to know that he is man, and that his condition makes him subiect to the chances of this world. Hee findes the Duke before him, being dislodged, the eight of the moneth, and thinking it some troope gone forth to the warre, he aduanceth neere, and with a furious charge seeks to open a way through the enemy. The whole army comes vpon him, and as hee thinks to recover his Barricadoes by the sides of the hills, as they gaue him hope, hee findes the snow had stopp the passages, and finally compassed in on all sides, hee is forced to take a Law from the stronger, and by his imprisonment to redeeme the liberty of Pasquieres, his Captains and souldiers. The duke proceeds, and taking all Maurienne, by composition, makes great designs vpon the towne of Grenoble, by the meanes of a fort which he had built to couer his Country on the side of Montmelian and Chambery.

Crequy values
prisoner.

The fort was vpon the frontier of Daulphiné, about a quarter of a League within the Kings Country towards Grenoble, vpon the side of a hill about the village of Bariaux, kept by Bellegarde a Gentleman of Sauoy, with seuen companies of foot, and furnished with all munition necessary, but made rather by ostentation (hauing as a great wonder that the place should therefore almost to all the Potentates of Christendome) then by any necessity, city, the place lying neare to Montmelian the chiefe fortresse of Sauoy, from whence he A might commodiously make his designes vpon Grenoble.

Grenoble did wonderfully apprehend this eye-sore, and Des Diguieres having dispersed the Kings army for to winter, framed many designs and enterprizes at Grenoble vpon this fort (the which, for that it was made defensible the eue before S. Bartholomewes day, the Duke called it by that name,) and had attempted it by siege, if he had not bene preffed with the want of the chiefe sinews of war. In the end, vrged by his duty, and moued by the misery of his Maiesties subiects, and preffed with the iust entreaties of the chiefe Officers, both of Iustice and of policy within the countrie of Dauphine, he learns of many souldiers that came forth, the estate of the place, with the forces that kept it, and sends off ten to view it in the night.

He is informed that it may be taken by Scalado in two places, at a corner on the right hand going from Grenoble, and on that side which looks towards Isere, the earth being not yet about two sadome and a halfe high. Hee causeth the troops nearest to Grenoble to approach, makes them to passe ouer the bridge into the towne, and faines that all the rest shall make the same passage, to goe into Maurienne, where the army of Sauoy was. But the fourteenth of March, on Palme-sunday Eue, he secretly puts some petards into a boate, and thirty ladders, necessary for the execution, and at the same instant hee causeth his troops to repass in the night in boats prepared to that end, to take from them of the fort all knowledge that they were on their side, whereby they might haue occasion C to call for supplies from Montmelian or Chambery. Things thus disposed he parts from Grenoble the five and twentieth of the said moneth in the morning, ioynes at a Village called Lombin, with such as he had appointed for this execution, making about three hundred horse, and a thousand or twelue hundred foot, diuided into foure troops, commanded by the Seigneurs of Morges, of Hercules, Lieutenant of Des Diguieres company of men at armes, of Auriac, and of Maurieu, ensigne to S. Julian: he calls these Commanders apart, acquaints them with this designe, to set vpon the fort the night following, and arriues there about eleuen of the clocke at night. The Captaines appointed to plant the Petards and the ladders, performe their charge with an incredible resolution, notwithstanding the alarme which those of the fort had taken, by reason of the fires indifferently kindled by their boyes. The Petards worke their effect happily, one at the false gate which looks towards Grenoble, and the other at the principall Port towards Montmelian: the alarm growes hot on all sides, so as they within the Fort knew not which side to guard. They mount to the scalado: some ladders are ouerthrowne, and with their shot they seeke to repulse the assailants, who get vp and come to handy blowes: the weakest must yeeld to the stronger. The enemies fought to make a new head: but after some little resistance they slew a hundred of them, and the rest leaped ouer the rampier where the alarm was least violent. Bellegard and some others remained prisoners: of seuen ensignes five were sent vnto the King, the two others were lost in the heat of the assault. They found there six peeces of battery, and three for the field, with great store of powder, lead, match, and corne, which had bene so many scourges against the vniust viurpations of the Sauoisen, if the reduction of the Duke of Mercœur, and that which remained to conquer in Britany had not laide their armes aside, and aduanced the Treaties which were made for the tranquillity of their estates.

The Kings authority had for nine years been banished out of such places as the Duke of Mercœur held in Britany: This Prouince was a prey for such as enriched themselves with the miserable spoiles thereof: the people hauing nothing left them but their voice, withheld to see themselves freed from the tyranny of many vicious men, and without mercy; and to taht with many others, the effects of the Kings clemency and bounty: and his Maiesty grieved infinitely to see them afflicted, and not able to relieue them, for the urgent necessity of his affaires. But after a storm comes a sun-shine. The Duke of Mercœur had often giuen hope of his submission & obedience; but the places of his command, and the quality of his person, in his opinion deferred a voyage thither. Our Henry is not sloathfull in that which concerns the good of his realme; and the great loue he bare to the ease and health of his subiects, who with a generall voyce giue him that fauourable title of Father of his people, and made them willingly to exceede the bounds of modesty.

At the onely brute of his coming, the Lords of Heurtault, and La Hostaye, sent

Britany.

A fange, commanding at Rochefort vpon Loire, knowing that the D. of Mercœur was ready to free himselfe from the Spaniard, and to bee reconciled to his Maiesty, they cast themselves at the Kings feet, beseeching him to receiue and accept of them as his most humble seruants and subiects, & that it would please him in that quality to continue them in the command of the said place: to appoint what garison hee pleased for the good of his seruice: to grant them a pardon for their taking of armes, and all other things which had followed vnder the authority of the Dukes of Mayenne and Mercœur, whom they had acknowledged for the heads of the Vnion: and with that capitulation they bring to the Kings obedience, the places of S. Symphorian and Rochefort.

B Pleists of Cosne at the same instant yielded the town and Castle of Craon to his Maiesties seruice. But the surprize of Dinan by them of S. Malo, one of the strongest places of Britany, in the which the said Duke put his greatest hope, forced him to fly to his Maiesties mercy. There is no cause so bad but may be shadowed with some apparant reasons. The Duke of Mercœur giues his Maiesty to vnderstand, as well for himselfe, as for those that shall submit themselves vnder his Maiesties obedience, that the zeale of the Catholike religion, the respect of the good of the Realme, whereof he had alwaies desired the preferuation, and feared the dismembring, the danger into the which Britany had been brought, when as the King encountered the Spanish violences vpon the frontier of Picardy, the intelligences of the greatest of the Prouince with the enemy, the means they C had to make diuers enterprizes, and to draw in forces to the great preiudice of the Crown and State, had caused him to continue so long in armes after his Maiesties reconciliation with the Pope: and therefore hee beseecheth him most humbly to take knowledge of his good will, and to countenance and vse him as his most faithfull seruant and subiect.

His Maiesty had alwaies wished, that God would giue him the grace, to end the troubles of his Realme, rather by a voluntary obedience of all his subiects, then by force and necessity of armes: that the last come might taste the same sweets, which his bounty shewed to those that had formerly returned to their obedience. So the said Duke of Mercœur, the Clergie, Officers, Gentlemen, and other persons of all qualities and conditions, making their due submission, and taking the oath of fealty, the King made the Edit which followeth.

An Edit made by the King vpon the Articles granted to the Duke of Mercœur vpon his reduction to his Maiesties obedience.

HENRY by the Grace of God, &c. We haue alwaies desired that God would giue vs the grace to end the troubles of this Realme, rather by a voluntary obedience of all our subiects, then by the force and necessity of armes, to the end the last come might E enioy the same fruits of our bounty, which the first which returned to their duties, haue receiued: The which hath so happily succeeded by the reduction of our deare and welbeloued cousin the Duke of Mercœur, (who hath shewed himselfe to willing to yeeld vs the obedience which he owes, with all those that were in armes with him,) as wee haue cause to rest content and satisfied: to approue the zeale which hee hath shewed to Religion, and to excuse our Cousin for that he hath continued so long in armes after our reconciliation with the Pope, and the comming of our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Cardinal of Florence, his Legate into this Realme; hauing giuen vs to vnderstand, that he was kept from making of this Declaration, for considerations which concerne the good of this Realme: whereof he hath alwaies desired the preferuation, and feared the dismembring, especially to preferre our Prouince of Britany from the danger whereinto F it was reduced, when as we were buffed vpon the frontiers of Picardy, to repulse our enemies, by reason of the intelligences which the greatest had in the said Country, and the means to attempt and draw in forces, to the preiudice of our seruice, and of the Estate. By meanes whereof, wee desire to acknowledge his good will, and to loue and intreat him hereafter as our good kinsman and faithfull subiect, inclining vnto the humble request which he hath made vnto vs, as well for himselfe, as for those which shall returne with him vnto our obedience.

To this Ediſt the King annexed many Articles, by the which hee forbade the exerciſe A of the reformed Religion in the Towne and Suburbes of Nantes, or within three leagues thereof. He did acknowledge the Duke of Merceur with all that had aſſiſted him and ſhould ſubmit themſelves with him vnto his Maieſties obedience, for his good ſubiects and faithfull ſeruants, taking the oath of allegiance, and making the ſubmiſſion required, after which they ſhould be reſtored to all their goods, offices, benefices, charges and dignities, notwithstanding any Grant to the contrary, all which hee did preſently reuoke. That no Clergi-men of Britany, which had payed their Tenths to the Receiueſſers of eyther party, ſhould be called in queſtion for what was paſt, and ſhould likewiſe bee eaſed for the Arrearages which they did owe. That all officers of Juſtice, or of the Treſure, which had bene made by the duke during the troubles, ſhould bee maintained in their places in taking letters of prouiſion from his Maieſty. That neither the Duke, nor any other which had followed and aſſiſted him, ſhould bee called in queſtion for any thing which had been committed during thoſe troubles, if they came with him to ſubmit themſelves vnder the Kings authority, the memory whereof was ſuppreſſed and extinguiſhed. The Duke and all which had aſſiſted him, were diſcharged of all impositions and leuies of money. There were many other Articles for the freeing of the Duke of Merceur, and thoſe of his partie, and for the ſetting of the quiet eſtate of Britany, the which the curious Reader may finde more at large in the Originall.

So our King about all the Princes of the earth, got this commendation, to haue exceſſed in wiſdome, valour and clemency. The whole Prouince, not by a politike neceſſitie C (which diſpoſeth people to the obedience of their Soueraigne Princes) but as it were appointed by God to command ouer them, acknowledged our Henry for their Soueraigne King, proteſted to liue and die in the obedience which loyall and faithfull ſubiects owe vnto their ſupream Lord. And by this milde re-union of the members with their head, of the parts with the whole, forgetting the bitterneſſe of the fore-paſſed warre, he diſperſed the confuſions and diſorders, which threatened to bury him vnder the common ruines of theſe vnciuill troubles.

So in the end, after ſo many labours, which Hercules could hardly haue ſurmounted, ſo many toyles, vnder which Atlas would haue ſhrunk, the ciuill warre ended, the minds D of the French vnited, their affections mutually conioyned by a ſtriſt bond of loue, vnder the obedience of their King, and all the forces of the chiefe Kingdomes of Chriſtendome, were ready to fall vpon the common enemy of his Eſtate. But you haue fought enough; the blood of your ſubiects, oh Princes, hath bene too outrageouſly ſpilt in your Champion fields: the furies of your armes haue wonderfully amazed your ſubiects. Shew your ſelues hereafter to be paſtors and fathers of nations, which reuerence the beauty of your Diademes. Let the ſeas, riuers and mountaines, which be as a barre betwixt the territories of your Dominions, limit hereafter the greatneſſe of your ambition. Heauen, the Iudge of controuerſies, doth pronounce that ſweet and ſacred name of Peace. A name which cannot diſpleaſe any, but ſuch as take delight in blood, ſpoile, and fire: and (ha- uing nothing of a man but the name) breathing out nothing but impiety, licentiousneſſe, E and iniuſtice. So after a long treaty betwixt the Deputies of both Kings, in the end a peace was concluded at Veruins, as you may read in the following Diſcourſe.

CONTINUATION OF THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF FRANCE,

from the beginning of the Treatie of Veruins, in the yeare 1598, vnto theſe times. Collected out of PETER MATHEVV, and other Authors that haue written of this ſubiect.

HE ciuill warres of France being ended, all the Kings rebellious ſubiects, & the reuolted Prouinces reduced to his obedience, God diſpoſed the hearts of the Kings of France and Spaine, to a general peace, for the good of their ſubiects, who had bene long oppreſſed with the ſpoiles and miſeries of bloody warre. God ſtirred vp Pope Clement the eight, who powred balme into the wounds of France, not like vnto his Predeceſſors (who reioyced at her afflictions, and ſought to make them incurable, applying no other remedies but fire and ſword.) Hee (like another Hercules) fought to calme the ſtormes which troubled both Land and Sea: he ſhewed himſelfe a common father of Chriſtians, a Mediator of Peace and Vnion, at ſuch a time as neceſſity and the eſtate of their affaires made them to deſire reſt. To this end he lets Henry the fourth King of France and of Nauarre, vnderſtand by Alexander of Medicis, Cardinal of Florence, then his Legate in France, and doth aduerſe Philip the ſecond King of Spaine, by his Nuncio: that it was now time to lay aſide all paſſions of hatred and reuenge, to reſume peacefull ſpirits, and to ioyne together againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendome, who onely made his profit of their ruines. That their ſubiects had bene ſufficiently drunke with the blood, gall and vineger of diſcord, and that it was requiſite to reſreſh them now with the ſweet wine of peace.

Theſe two Princes were too high minded, to demand a peace one of another. There muſt bee a third perſon, to vnite theſe two extreames. But there muſt be ſome one to make this entrance, and to bee as it were an Interpreter of their intentions. To this end, the Pope makes choyce of F. Bonauenture Calatagiron, General of the Order of the Franciscans or Grey Friars, to acquaint theſe two Kings with this holy and charitable perſwaſions vnto peace. Religious men had bene actors in this warre, they are now held neceſſary for the peace. Spirits ſeparated from the troubles and confuſions of the world, are moſt fit for ſuch negotiations, being leſſe tranſported E with violent paſſions.

The King of Spaine did not attend to haue the Pope exhort him vnto peace. He had begun his reigne by war againſt the French, he would now end it by a peace with them. He was now ſeuentie yeeres old, being deſirous to diſcharge himſelfe of the heavy burthen of ſo many kingdomes, and to leaue them quiet to his ſonne. To this end, he muſt marry his daughter Donna Iſabella, who remaining in Spaine, without a husband, might contend for the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, with Don Philip her brother. He could not giue her leſſe for her dowry, then the Kingdom of Portugall, or the Low-Countries, with the County of Bourgundy. By the one, he did weaken and diuide his Eſtates, and by the other, he gaue his daughter meanes to contend for her portion in Spaine. For it F was impoſſible to reigne long in Prouinces diuided by irreconcilable warre, hauing two mighty neighbours for enemies. And therefore to aſſure Spaine, he muſt marry the Infanta: and to confirme that which hee gaue vnto her in marriage, it was neceſſary to conclude a peace with the French King, and to baniſh thoſe vaine imaginations of the conqueſt of an Eſtate, the which will alwaies grow great, by the encreaſe of Concord: and fortified with armes and inuincible ſpirits, ſupports it ſelfe againſt any violence that ſhall ſecke to ſupplant it. Being thus reſolued of a peace, he deſires to vnderſtand the opinion of his Councell.

Reasons that moued the King of Spaine to a peace.

This resolution to haue a peace was iust, and all things shewed a necessity inseparable with iustice. The King of Spaine (to whom this was well knowne) had no need of any other counsell, for that his Councillors for the most part did hold, that his Estates could not continue in peace, vnlesse that France were at warre, and that they must alwaies maintaine a diuision in that Estate, whose forces are so mighty and warlike. Yet would he haue it resolved on in Councell, in the presence of the Prince his sonne, and the Infanta. The Prince transported with the courage of his great and high resolutions, had no other thoughts but to continue his fathers counsells.

The Prince of Spaine recites the council
of peace.

This peace being propounded in councell, euery one spake not what he thought the best, but rather to please the Prince (who valued resolution more then wisdom, and the dangers of warlike enterprises, more then the assurance of a happy peace) there is no place whereas dissembling should haue lesse credit then in a Princes Councell. But Christopher de Mors, holding it the chiefe and essentiall vertue of a Councillor, to speake the truth, and that it belonged to none but vile and base spirits to lie: hee fortified his opinion with the best reasons he could, to induce the young Prince to like of the proposition of Peace: the which he knew the King held to be iust and necessary, and therein this necessity, wise men found the surest law of their conduct, and the felicity of an Estate. You may read his discourse at large in the Originall. For which liberty of speech, contrary to the Princes humor (who shewed by his countenance, that such as loued peace were not his friends) de Mors was disgraced with bitter words, and commanded not to come in his presence: but he was restored againe into fauour by the Kings command, hauing made his excuse vnto the Prince, for that hee had spoken the truth too boldly, for the good of the peace.

to France and England 1546.
And by her marriage there con-ciled France &
Spaine 1559.

The King of Spaine (to preuent all private passions, which do alwaies corrupt counsels in publicke affaires, being unwilling to haue it treated of in Spain) commanded the Infanta Isabella, to aduise Alberus the Archduke (then Gouverneur in the Low-Countries, to whom she was promised) to make some ouerture of an accord, and to sound the mindes of the French. Shee (who was Daughter to the generous Princeesse, whom Spaine called the Queene of Peace) inuited the Archduke to imploy his counsell and meanes for the building of this Temple, proceeding with a good intention, and sincerity of zeale. The Archduke (who found no better rampart to defend the Low-Countries, then a peace) makes shew to haue no other thought in his heart, nor any word more ordinary in his mouth, then peace: greewing to see the misery of the warres, and that two of the greatest Princes of Christendome (whereof the one might serue as a sword, and the other as a Target against the power of the Ottomans) should bee so ready to ruine one another.

The Archduke
applies all his minds to a
Peace.

This conceit, that the Archduke, desired a Peace, did purchase him the loue of those people, ouer whom he should command in regard of his marriage: it confirmed him in the good liking of the King of Spaine, seeing that he did apply himselfe wholly vnto his humor, and did wonderfully content the Infanta, who desired to bee married with a beneficiall peace. All Europe aspired to this general good. Those which were farthest off, held it iust: the neighbours profitable, and such as were interested, necessary: and this interest did not onely concerne the French and the Spanish, but all neighbour States, whom it did much import to see a peace concluded.

The Archduke
adds armes
vnto the king.

The Archduke discovers the Kings disposition, by Monsieur de Sancerre, Agent at Brussels for Queene Elizabeth Dowager of France. Who coming to Montceaux presented the King with rich armes, which the Archduke had caused to bee made for him at Brussels, and withall hee gaue him charge to say vnto the King, that hee lamented to see the continuance of a warre so preiudiciall to two of the greatest Christian Princes, and so profitable to the common enemy of Christendome. That if it pleased him to hearken vnto a peace, his will should bee soone followed by the effect: offering all his vovs and seruice to the king of Spaine his vnkle, to make him resolute to a perfect & assured peace, wherewith Sancerre acquainted his Maiesty, after the delivery of his armes, saying "That the Archduke was a Prince full of holy resolution for the general good of Christendome, who lamenting the affaires of Christian Princes, which went to ruine by their discord, had commanded him to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, if hee would enter into any treaty of peace, the onely and last support of Christendome.

The first continuance a
peace.

The King receiued the Present graciously, and hauing a while considered of the proposition (made vnto him by Sancerre) he answered, That he had neuer yet tasted the sweetness of peace, desiring greatly to know what it was, not so much for his owne ease, as for the good of his subiects: and although he had alwaies feared war, yet had he neuer refused peace: that he was not insensible of the miseries of this diuision, and had often lamented so much blood vnprofitably spilt, & the weakening of the chiefe pillars of Christendome: That he had not entered into this war but for a iust and necessary defence, all Europe hauing seene the King of Spaine to traisse the greatest forces of the world, yes, and his owne subiects against him, and that there was no war more iust, then to recouer that, which was vnjustly vsurped. Yet notwithstanding, all these considerations should not hinder his inclination to a peace: But he could not easily beleue, that the Archduke had any such desire, hauing so many Spaniards about him, who would neuer counsell him to make any warre but in France.

The King
Spaine doubts
of a peace.

This holy resolution was imparted vnto the Archduke, and by him to the King of Spaine, who doubted that a Prince borne and bred vp in armes, hardened in the exercise of warre, and prosperous in his proceedings, would giue eare to a peace: and although the good of his Realme, might draw him to this resolution, yet such as had counseled him to proclaim war against him, when as his affaires were most desperate: euen when as foure or fise Dukes his subiects were in armes against him, would not aduise him now to make a peace, when as all France was reduced vnder his obedi-nce. He therefore commands the Archduke to proceed warily and easily and wisely, and not to doe any thing that might be dishonorable in seeking of a peace.

The Archduke knowing that the Kings inclination to a peace, proceeding from his owne proper motion, and from the best aduice of his seruants (who held a long warre to be as ruinous for France, as a long peace is hurtfull to a warlike nation) continued his first motion, sending backe Sancerre vnto the King who was then at Rouan, to speake more openly and plain vnto him, and to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, in what towne vpon the frontiers the Deputies of either side might assemble. This negotiation was not managed by letters, but by instructions, and by one man onely: the which was kept so secret, as on the Kings part, no man was acquainted therewith, but Villeroi (the Oracle of the secrets of this Estate) neither would the Archduke trust to any one but himselfe and the Duke of Sora, master of his horse, to the end that Spaine should not know any thing but what pleased him, when need should require. If matters had become managed more openly, they might haue proued lesse successfull. These Princes wanted not spirits of diuision about them which blamed this peace. There were some in Spaine which maintained, that the lawes of Religion and conscience, would not allow them to lay downe armes, vnill that France were reduced vnder one Religion: and that it were dishonorable for so warlike a nation as Spaine, to demand a peace of them which had proclaimed warre against them. In France some cried out that they should make no peace with Spain, without satisfaction for Milan, Naples, Flanders and Nauarre. Those which did second this good worke with their graue and wise counsell, were men full of affection to the publicke good, and capable of the remedies of this diuision. The President Richardot was the first to whom the Archduke imparted this secret, and the King would haue Bellieus his chiefe Councillor of State acquainted therewith, vnto whom Sancerre imparted the order and state of the business. This done, he returned to the Archduke to Bruxelles, carrying with him a resolution of the Kings pleasure: whereupon the Archduke commanded him to conduct the Generall of the Friars into France, being then come out of Spaine.

The Generall acquainted the King with the commandement he had receiued from the Pope: to pisse into Spaine to dispose the Catholike King to a good and holy peace, whereby the forces and wills of all Christian might be waied against the common enemy, who made his profit of this miserable diuision: that the King of Spaine forgetting it well, and lamenting this general delolation, had said vnto him, that he desired a peace: which by this will should be firme and durable for the recovery of that which discord had caused. The Christian Princes would desire not onely to treat a reconciliation of this ship borne betwixt the two Crownes, but also to prevent all occasions of future warre: And to this end, he had given all his power to the Archduke his nephew, who was a Prince dis-gustous of peace.

1598

The King answered: That he was desirous of a peace, neither would he prescribe him any other conditions, than the honour and justice of his pretensions, the which he held as assured, as no man might call them in question. The Generall of the Franciscans assured him, that the King of Spaine would give him all the contentment hee could expect from a iust Prince. Reason which alwaies finds place in generous minds, and Necessity whose stings (when there is moue) are very violent, made these two Princes lay downe armes, to releue their subiects, tired with miseries and publike oppressions. These first hopes of a peace, did but begin to appeare when as the King was advertised of the surprize of Amiens. This was a froit which nipt all the hope of this first feed, a winde which blew away all the flowers of this young plant. The Generall of the Friars returned into France to assure the King, that if it pleased him, the taking of Amiens should not hinder the peace. The King answered, that hee himselfe wronged in this proposition, that he neither could nor would hearken vnto it: and that hee neuer did any thing by constraint: neither were matters now fit for an accord. I will not (saith he) that I demand a peace of me in a braverie, I will neuer yield vnto it by force. Wee will talke more, when I haue recovered Amiens, Calais, and Ardes: and so hee sent backe the Generall of the Friars, to the amazement of the enemy, who did admire the Kings noble resolution, (which like vnto the ancient Romanes) was more admirable in Adversity then Prosperity.

The Kings generous resolution.

A iust peace is due.

Amiens being recovered, and the Pope foreseeing by the continuance of the Kings victories, that it would produce no other effects but a weakening of the whole body, hee coniuers the two Kings anew, by the apprehension of the publike miseries, and the pitifull state of Christian affaires, to agree and to resume their chiefe inclinations to peace. He commands his Legate to dispose them to some conference, whereby hee might discomfite who was to be blamed, and who failed in his affection, for the generall good of a peace. The Legate goes to S. Quintin: the Generall of the Friars comes thither vnto him, and beseecheth him, to be a means vnto the King, to send some man of credit, with whom they might confere of a treaty. The King sent the President Sillery, with an expresse commandement, not to consent to any treaty of a peace, but vpon assurance to haue those townes yielded vp, which were held by the King of Spaine. The Popes Legate, the President Sillery, and the Generall of the Friars met at Saint Quintin: the greatest difficulty at this first entrance, was for the restitution of places. The Generall of the Friars said, that the King of Spaine would not purchase a peace at so deare a rate. Sillery answered, that the King of Spaine did giue nothing of his owne, but did only yield vp that which he could not keepe, the King hauing made proofe by the recovery of Amiens, what hee might expect of the other places. And if they desired a good and a durable peace, they must make it iust: for else it could not continue. That there was nothing more iust, then restitution, nor more honourable then to leaue that willingly which they could not hold by force: That the King had expressly forbidden him to consent to any Treaty, nor to the choise of any place for an assembly, before hee had Assurance of this restitution: that hee held it a wrong done vnto the dignity of so great a Prince, to the honor of his commandements, to the equity of his cause, and to his good fortune, once to hearken vnto the difficulties they made to yield him vp that which was his owne: That whoseuer should treat with this prejudice, deserved to be punished as the authors of Treaties, that were dishonorable to their Masters.

The Generall of the friars (who could not get any other resolution at his hands) returned twice into Flanders, to let them vnderstand, that among all the reasons of the Treaty, that of restitution was inuincible: that it was in vain to demand a peace of the French, if they did not restore all. That this restitution was the soule of the Treaty, without the which it was a fantastike body, without any natural proportion and substance: That in the end, desiring too much, they should haue nothing: and thinking to hold all, they would lose all. The Archduke doth aduertise the King of Spaine, that there was no means to come into the Temple of peace, but by opening of the gates of Calais, Ardes, Doullans, and other places (taken in warre) vnto the French King. God inspired the heart of the King of Spaine, against the opinion of his Councell of State, to yield vp all his pretensions for the good of a peace, rather then to leaue the world in this perpetual discord and confusion.

A He did consult with his Councell of conscience, vpon the necessity of this restitution. They answered him, that he could not liue with a quiet soule, nor die in the integrity of his religion, if he did not restore those places. The King of Spaine followed this aduice, aduertising the Archduke, that he would not, for that which hee had gotten from another, lose the means to leaue a peace to his owne subiects. Vpon this resolution, the Generall of the Friars returns into France, and passeth his way vnto the Legate and Sillery, for the restitution: In as after an infinite toyle of two months, these three made all things ready for a Treaty.

The King of Spaine resolves to yield all the places.

Sillery returns to the King, leading with him the Generall of the Friars, as well to let him vnderstand from the Kings owne mouth, what hee had said vnto him by his commandement, as also to haue the Generall tell the King what hee had promised, and propounded on the Archdukes behalfe. The Legate remained at Saint Quintin, as gardian of the words and intentions of two Princes, being assured of eithers faith, they agree vpon a place for the Assembly of the Deputies, and to conclude the treaty. The Towne of Veruins (being vnder the Kings obedience, and neare vnto the Frontiers of Artois) was found the most commodious, and was presently furnished with all things necessary to receiue the Ambassadors. The King deputed Compans of Belicour Knight, Lord of Grignon, the chiefe and most ancient of his Priuy Councell, and Nicholas Brulart Knight, Lord of Sillery, Councellour of State to his Majesty, and President in his Court of Parliament, for the King of Spaine and the Archduke, there came Iohn Richard Knight, President of the Kings Priuy Councell, and of his Councell of State: Iohn Baptiste Taxus Knight, Commander of los Santos, of the military order of Saint Lamer, and Councellor of State, and of the Councell of warre: and Lewis Verriken Knight, Audiencer and chiefe Secretary and Tresurer of the Charters of the Councell of State, men of great experience and approved fidelity. The Cardinal Medici, Legate of the holy Sea, assisted by the Bishop of Mantoua, was as it were an Vproer of all difficulties in this good and holy reconciliation. The Kings Deputies arrived first, and those of the King of Spaine presently after, where hauing saluted one another with their hearts full of ioy and incredible content, they promised to treat roundly, sincerely and mildly, communicating their commissions one vnto another, and reforming those errors which they found, that they might begin to treat more safely and freely. After much question, and many protestations made by the Deputies of the King of Spaine for the precedence, in the end they yielded vnto the French Kings, to take what place they pleased, after the Legate, and the Popes Nuncio. At their first sitting, the Legate exhorts them to shew their fidelity and integrity in this action which their Masters desired, whereof he assured himselfe by their experiences, as of those which had happily managed the greatest affaires of Europe, more then any other men: wishing them to consider, that hauing the honour to counsell two of the greatest Princes of the world (who submitted their wills vnto their counsels, as the most diuine thing among men, when it is purged from ambitious passions, violent thoughts, and preiudicate opinions) they should omit nothing that might regard the contentment of their good intentions, and not to doubt, but that God, who hath an especial care of Kings and Kingdomes, would infuse the light of his Spirit into their most secret thoughts, and threaten them with the severity of his Iustice, if they did not apply all their endeavors to his glory, and the good of the Christian Common-wealth.

Veruins chosen for the conference.

The Precedency yielded to the French.

The Legate exhorts the Deputies.

Then they entered into treaty with a mildness fit for men of that quality, and the merit of the subiect. It was managed with such secrecy, as nothing was knowen before that all was concluded. The chiefe point of difficulty was, for the restitution of places. Many reasons were propounded on either side, but the Kings Deputies had great advantage: the force of reason; the prosperity of affaires in the recovery of Amiens: and above all, the fauour of the time and passions. The King of Spaine would not dye but in peace: he desired his Sonnes might reign in peace, and that his dearly beloued daughter might be married in peace. The Archduke languished with a desire to be satisfied: & fearing lest the promise which hee had (in taking this) during the life of the King of Spaine, the conditions would be made worse, he pressed Richard and Taxis, not to proceed in this negotiation after the Spanish manner, but to remember, that they must not prolong their consultations, nor protract an action, the praise whereof depended vpon the conclusion. So after they had balanced all matters in the Treaty, to reduce them to a iust proportion proportion of reason, all controuersies betwixt two Kings were reconciled and ended.

During this Treaty the most Christian King was at Nantes, he pacified Brittany, discharged the new garrisons, and some Imposts; and placed for Governour there, Caspar Meunier his base sonne, now Duke of Vendosme, who was betrothed to the only daughter of the Duke of Mercœur. Hee then granted the Edicts of pacification to them of the reformed religion within his Realme, as we shall shew hereafter. A peace being concluded at Veruins betwixt the two Kings, there was nothing yet agreed vpon for the Duke of Sauoy. It seemed the King of Spaine had forgotten him, and that he did not acknowledge him for his Sonne-in-law. The French King held him neither for kinsman nor friend, so long as he should detain the Marquisate of Salusses. The Marquis of Lullins (who was there Agent for the Duke) assured the Deputies, that the Duke had no other intention; but to give the King more contentment hereafter, then forepassed occasions would give him means. Vpon this assurance he entered into the treaty, the which by his occasion was in a manner broken off, three dayes before the conclusion. For, the King was resolved, not to thinke of any accord with the Duke; but by present effects: without deferring the satisfaction of that which was due vnto him. It was not likely (that drawing by the execution of the treaty, out of the hands of so great and mighty a King, six places in Picardy, and a Port of great importance in Britany; which was harder to take then the Marquisate of Salusses) the King would conclude a peace with the Duke of Sauoy, with lesse honourable conditions then he had done with the King of Spaine; and bring his indubitable right in question. But the Pope (feeling that this Marquisate of Salusses would proue an Aetna, to fire all Italy) prevailed so with the King, as he preferred the public good before his own particular interest, being content (for the finishing this building of peace) that the Dukes interest, and his right should bee put to compromise.

It was agreed, that the Pope should be the only iudge of this discord, touching the restitution of the Marquisate of Salusses, and that within a yeare. So a Peace was concluded, and signed by the Deputies: but it was not published till a Month after: only a generall suspension of Armes was proclaimed. The King being at Rennes in Britany, came Post to Tours; and so to Amiens, for the better execution of the peace, which was comprehended in thirty eight Articles.

It was concluded, That the treaty of Peace, made at the Castle of Cambresis, in the yeare 1598, should remaine in his full force, but what should be expressly derogated by this present Treaty. That there should bee a firme and stable Peace betwixt the said two Kings, their heires, successors, realmes, countries, and subiects. That there should be free trafficke and commerce betwixt them, and all Letters of make or reprisal suspended, and none to be granted afterwards, but vpon deniall of Iustice. That the Townes, Subiects and Inhabitants of either Country, should enioy the priuiledges and liberties which had beene granted them by precedent Treaties. That the subiects and seruants of either side, notwithstanding they had followed a contrary party, should returne into their offices and benefices which they did enioy before the end of the yeare 1588: provided that they should first obtaine leave and Letters-patents vnder their Maisties great Seale for the same.

It was also concluded, That there should be a reall restitution, one vnto another, of all which had beene taken and held by them, or any other in their names, in one another Country. That the Catholike King might carry away all the Artillery, powder, bullets, victuals, and other munition of war, which should be found in those places: he was to restore, with all their moueable goods; yet they might not exact any thing of the inhabitants, nor carry away anything belonging vnto them. That the most Christian King should furnish the Souldiers which were in Blauay with shipping; for their speedy returne into Spaine, and the transport of their Ordnance, baggage, victuals, and other munition of war, giuing caution for restitution of the Ships, and return of the Mariners within a prefixed time. That the French King hauing ratified the treaty, there should bee foure Offages deliuered vnto him, such as he should chooseth out of the Catholike Kings Subiects; vntill restitution were really performed, and then to be presently set at liberty: and if restitution were made of the six places in Picardy, then two of the Offages should be deliuered, and the other two remaine vntill Blauay were restored. That there should be Arbitrators deputed on either side, to decide certaine controuersies contained in this

A Treaty of Cambray, but not executed. That all prisoners of war on either side should be set at liberty, paying their charges, without ranfome, velleffe it were already agreed vpon. All others subiect to the said Kings, and detained in their Gallies, should be released without delay, and without demand of ranfome or charges. All rights, actions and pretensions were referred vnto the French King, velleffe hee or his predecessors had expressly renounced them, to make his pursuit by law, and not by armes: the like reservation was made for the Catholike King, and the Infanta his eldest daughter. It was decreed, that the Duke of Sauoy should be comprehended in this Treaty of peace, vpon certaine conditions to be presently performed, and some other controuersies betweene the Christian King, and the said Duke, were referred vnto Pope Clement the eight, to be decided within one yeare after the date of these presents.

Thus I haue briefly set downe the chiefe points of the Treaty, the which you may read more at large in the Originall: after which they come to comprehend their allies, as followeth in the thirty fourth Article.

34. In this peace, alliance and friendship, shall be comprehended by the common consent of the said Kings, if they will be comprehended: First, on the behalfe of the said most Christian King, the Pope, the Apostolike Sea, the Emperor, the Princes Electors both Ecclesiasticall and secular, the townes, commonalties, and estates of the sacred Empire, and namely the Count Palatine Elector, Marquis of Brandebourg, Duke of Wirtemberg, Landgrau of Hessen, Marquis of Hanspach, the Earles of East-Frizland, and the Sea townes, according to their ancient alliances. And if the said Catholike King pretends any thing against them, he shall pursue them by Law, before competent Iudges, and not by force in any manner whatsoever.

There shall bee also comprehended the Seigneuries of the Cantons of high Germany, the Grisons, and their allies, the Kings of Poland, Sweden, Scotland, & Denmarke, the Duke & Seignury of Venice, the Duke of Lorraine, the great Duke of Tuscane, the Common-weales of Genoua and Luques, the Duke of Parma and Placentia, the Cardinall of Ferneze, his brother, the Duke of Mantoua, the Duke of Vrbino, the chiefe of the houses of Colonne and Vrsins. King shall neither directly nor indirectly by himselfe or any other, molest any of them, And if he pretend any thing against them, he may pursue it by law before competent Judges, and not by force in any sort whatsoeuer.

36 And there shall be also comprehended in this present Treaty, all others that shall be named by the common consent of the said Kings, so as within six months after the publication of the said treaty, they give their Letters declaratory, respectiue as it is in such case required.

37 And for the better assurance of this Treaty of peace, and of all the Articles therein contained, it shall be verified, published and enrowled in the Court of Parliament of Paris, and in all other Parliaments of the Realme of France, and in the Chamber of accounts at Paris: as also it shall be verified published, and enrowled in the great Council, and other Councils and chambers of accounts of the countries of the said Catholike King, and all according to the form contained in the Treaty made in the year 1559, whereof the expeditions shall be giuen of either part within three months after the publication of this present Treaty.

38 Which points and Articles, together with all that is contained in euery one of them, haue beene treated, concluded, and past betwixt the said Deputies in their names, the which by vertue of their authorities haue promised, and doe promise vpon bond of all the present and future goods of their said Masters, that they shall be inuolubly obserued and kept, and to cause them to ratifie, and to giue authentike Letters one vnto the other whereas all this present Treaty shall be incerted, and that within one month after the date of these presents, in regard of the said most Christian King, Cardinal, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: which Cardinall shall promise to cause like Letters of ratification to be giuen within three months by the Catholike King. They shall solemnly sweare vpon the Crosse, the Holy Euangelists, the Canon of the Masse, and vpon their honors, in the presence of such as they shall please to depute, to obserue and accomplish, fully, really, and faithfully the contents of the said Articles: and in like manner the Catholike King shall take the same oath within three months after, or when hee shall be required.

In witness of which things the said Deputies subscribed the Treaty, at Veruins the second day of May, in the year 1598.

All which Articles contained in the Treaty: and all that had beene concluded, agreed, and passed by the said Deputies in their Masters names, they promise shall be inuolubly obserued and kept, and to cause them to ratifie them, and to deliuer one vnto another authentike Letters, signed and sealed, containing the whole Treaty, and that within one month after the date of those presents, in regard of the most Christian King, the Cardinall, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: and that the Cardinall should promise, to procure within three months after, the like Letters of ratification from the Catholike King, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: They should solemnly sweare vpon the Crosse, the holy Euangelists, the Canon of the Masse, and by their honors, in the presence of such as they should depute, to obserue and fulfill really and faithfully, all that was contained in the said Articles: and the like oath shall be taken by the Catholike King of Spaine, within three months after, or when it should be required. In witness whereof the Deputies subscribed the Treaty, at Veruins, the second of May. 1598.

He that desires Peace cannot buy it at too deare a rate, no though he pay as much as King Antigonus did vnto the Romans. The King of Spaine, who desired a peace at what rate soeuer, found no condition in this Treaty of Veruins, that might dissuade him from ratifying it: although his Council held the restitution of townes, to happily taken, and so hard to recover, dishonourable and preiudiciall. He prest to haue it sworne and executed, witnessing the contentment he received in his soule, for the good which Christendome should receive by the concord of these two Crownes. The Archduke, who did second his desire, sent Deputies to assist at the French Kings oath, the D. of Alsot, the Count Artemberg, the Admirall of Arragon, and Lewis de Pelasco, being followed by foure hundred Gentlemen Spaniards, Italians, Bourguignons, and Flemings. The Count S. Paul received them vpon the frontiers. The Constable feasted them at Amiens, and pacified some quarrells growne among them for place. The Marshall of Biron, with a great and goodly troope of Noblemen and Gentlemen, appointed by the King, received them

A them a quarter of a league without S. Denis gate, conducting them vnto their lodgings, which were prepared in S. Anthonies quarter. The next day they went vnto the Louvre, with all their traine, in rich and stately equipage, to kisse the Kings hands: who receiued them graciously, giuing an attentive eare vnto the discourse which Richardot made vpon the merit of this action, and the common profit and necessity of a peace, the which, hee said, was to be preferred before a iust war, and al hope of prosperity. The King answered, That he had desired peace, not for that he was tired with the discomforts of war, but to giue all Christendome meane to breathe: That his armes fell out of his hands when as they represented vnto him the teares which fell from the Popes eyes, for their reconciliation, which might greatly aduance the quiet of the Church of God: That he should neuer be taxed to be ill affected to the preservation of the peace: as he neuer wanted zeale nor iustice to seeke it, hauing alwaies preferred it before the vndoubted assurance of all the good successe, which the happinesse of his armes, and the reason of his defence promised him: belesuing the aduice of them which hold, that we must neuer for the hope of any fauourable successe, refuse a good peace, and ground the expectation of the euent vpon the apparance of present things.

The most solemne forme of a treaty is, the oath which binds them that treat. It was not sufficient, that the Princes had signed it, and engaged their faithfull promises to maintain it: they would make the God of heauen the Iudge and witness of their intentions, C engaging their faith in the hands of his Iustice, for an assurance of their promises. And therefore the King did sweare the obseruation of the peace, in our Ladies Church at Paris, in the presence of the King of Spaines Ambassadors. The Archduke did sweare it in the name of the King of Spaine, in the great Church at Bruxells, in the presence of the Marshall of Biron, Belleuere and Brulart, Councillors to the King and his Ambassadors. The Duke of Sauoy did also sweare it at Chambéry, in the presence of Guadagnus, Lord of Bourtheim, Knight of both Orders. The Oath was minisired in this manner: We promise vpon our faith and honour, and in the word of a King, and sweare vpon the Crosse, the holy Euangell, and the Canon of the Masse, for that which concerns vs: That we will obserue and accomplish fully, really and faithfully, all and euery point and article contained in the treaty of Peace, reconciliation and amity made, concluded, and determined at Veruins, the second day of May last past, &c. and will cause all to be obserued, maintained and kept inuolubly on our part, without any breach, or suffering it to be broken, in any sort or manner whatsoeuer. In witness whereof we haue signed these presents with our owne hands, &c.

The King would haue the sincerity of his intentions knowne to all the world, and Paris a witness of the oath he should take, to obserue the peace as religiously, as hee had made war iustly. The ceremony was performed in our Ladies Church at Paris, with great pompe: Monsieur de Villeroy did read the articles of the Peace, the King did sweare the obseruation thereof, signed the Act, and embraced the Ambassadors of the King of Spaine, wishing his Brother a long life, that he might long enjoy the fruits of this peace. E This ceremony was ended with great ioy and acclamations of the people. From thence the King went to dine at the Bishops Palace, where he feasted the Ambassadors, the Duke Montpensier supplying the place of Lord Steward. The feast was royall and magnificent, and all things were answerable to so great a Ceremony. That ancient custome of drinking to the health of Princes, which came from that of the Greekes, who offered to euery one of their gods a glasse of wine, and since hath beene vsed, to shew our deuoted affection to great personages, was not forgotten. The King dranke twice to the health of the King of Spaine. This ioy was continued at night at the Louvre, in dancing, and the daies following in feasting at diuers great mens houses, by the Kings command.

All this did not hinder the execution of the Treaty, neither did the Deputies forget the interest of priuate persons. The Spaniards intreated the King for the returne of some that were absent, especially for the Duke of Aumale. The King answered them, That if they restored vnto Antonio Perez his children and goods, he would giue the Duke of Aumale contentment, whereby he should enioy the fruit of the peace: the Spaniards replied, That Perez, who was then out of Spain for matters concerning the Inquisition, might not be equalled with the Duke of Aumale, who was absent but by reason of the troubles. Euery one was content, either with that which was done, or with that which reason did not allow to be done.

After that the Ambassadors of Spaine had obtained what they desired for the execution of the Peace, and admired the Kings houses, and the wonders of Paris, they returned with a remembrance of his Maiesties bounty, who gaue them Jewells, and Cupbords of plate. There remained foure principall men as Hostages, for assurance of the restitution of the townes, as it was concluded by the Treaty. All should bee performed by the second of August: they began by the townes of Picardy so faithfully, as the King (without expecting the full satisfaction of the Treaty) sent backe the Hostages, relying onely vpon their word.

It was also concluded by the Treaty, that the Archduke (who had approued the peace in the name of the King of Spaine) should also sweare the obseruation thereof in the same name, and in the presence of such as it should please the King to send: His Maiesty would not employ any other then such as had serued him so worthily in the conclusion thereof, as Belieure and Brulart, two of the chiefe of his Councell, and him whose valour in the recovery of Amiens, had much advanced the end of this war. This honour was accompanied with another, that was greater and more durable, vpon the chiefe of this Ambassage. The King doth neuer forget to recompence great and generous actions, he would haue the Marshall Biron as well a president of his fauours, as of the loyalty of his seruice: and therefore he erected his Barony of Biron into a Duchy, and made him Peere of France. He was receiued in the Parliament with a general applause and testimony of all the Assitants, that these honours, although they were great, did not equal the greatness of his merits. He made a solemne feast for this new dignity. The King went from Saint Germaine to honour him with his presence: witnessing that this was not the end nor period of the honours wherewith he would reward the perseverance of his seruices, and the constancy of his affection. At that time there was nothing in him that was lesse to be admired then imitated. Slander could not cause any corruption in a body inspired with the life of honour and valour (as fies breed not wormes but in dead bodies) and hee that had spoken ill of him, should haue gotten no credit. He had not yet receiued that pestilent infection which corrupted his blood, and deprived him of all iudgment. Reprehension had no power ouer him: but when as he spake vneruenously of the King, one of his Friends was then the Oracle of his fortune, who told him plainly, That if he did not forbear his licentious speech, he would repent it. What can they doe, answered he: The other replied, That which you feare not. And pressing him to speake more plainly: his friend (knowing that Princes are very apprehensieue and sensible; and that the offences which they dissemble most, they pardon least) said vnto him, halfe in choler, & halfe in iest, That the King would cut off his head. This threat was so vnlkely, as he made a iest of it. The bad intentions which began to seize vpon his soul in this Ambassage of Flanders, haue verified the prediction. Nothing could make him vnhappy, but the excess of his happines, which deprived him of all government and modesty. If he had beene less fortunate, he had beene more wise. It was no strange thing, to make the sonne of the Marshall Biron, Marshall of France. An ancient house might well be honoured with the title of a Duchy, a great Captaine, who had to doe great a share in the restauration of France, deserved the honour and title of a Peere, but this was to recompence him in the midst of his course, for all that he might expect at the end of his carriere.

The first seruice the Duke of Biron did after this new dignity, was the voyage of Flanders. He made his assembly at Peronne, from whence he went to lye at Cambray. In the mid way, the Earle of Sore, Lieutenant Generall of that Country, met him, who (after he had saluted him with a long and respectiue discourse) told him, That he had commandement from his Master to doe him seruice in that voyage, and to accompany him vnto Bruxelles. They of Cambray feasted him in their Towne-house. He had the like entertainment at Valenciennes and at Mons. Being arriued at our Lady of Halle, three leagues from Bruxelles, he found a Steward of the Archdukes, and fifty of his guard to attend him. The next day (which was the first after his departure) hee was met vpon the way to Bruxelles, by the Earle of Mansfield, the Duke of Anmale, and the Prince of Orange, with about two hundred horse in the Archdukes name, and so conducted through the city vnto his lodging.

Hee rested the Friday, and the next day hee went to haue audience of the Archduke. Hee was accompanied by Count Mansfield: Belieure by the Duke Deputies sent from the King to the Archduke to take his oath.

A Duke D' Anmale, and Brulart with the Prince of Orange. Thus they entred into the Arch-dukes chamber, whom they found alone without any one but the Bishop of Antwerpe, and the President Richardot. The D. of Biron began to discourse, and Belieure continued it halfe an houre after. On the Sunday following, the Duke of Biron went to the Cathedral Church, the Arch-duke hauing sent him twenty Carosses for himselfe and his traine: There did the Arch-duke solemnly sweare the obseruation of the peace in the name of the King of Spaine. From thence the Duke of Biron went on horsebacke to the Archdukes palace, where he dined. At the Arch-dukes table sat the Duke of Biron, Belieure, Brulart, the Count Mansfield, the Duke of Anmale, the Prince of Orange, and the Bishop of Antwerpe. At another table were some twenty French Gentlemen, chosen by the Duke of Biron, and eight or ten Spaniards and Wallons. After dinner the Arch-duke caused them to see a gallery full of goodly pictures of the country, and from thence hee led them into the Parke, in the midst whereof is the house whereas the Emperour Charles the first retired himselfe, when as hee resigned his Empire and other Estates. The next day the Earle of Mansfield inuited the Duke of Biron with some dozen of French Gentlemen to dinner: after dinner they put themselves in a round, euery one with a glaiffe full of wine in his hand, and in this order, the Earle said: Seeing we haue begun our follies in wine, it is fit wee should leave them there: and so he spilt the wine, and brake his glaiffe, the which was imitated by all the rest.

C So after some dayes spent in feasting, the Archduke hauing presented the D. of Biron with two faire horses, gold, plate, a rich iewel, and a rapier, with girdle and hangers set with precious stones, (all which were esteemed at ten thousand crownes) hauing also giuen to Belieure and Brulart rich futes of Tapistry, and chaines of gold, and to euery one of the French Gentlemen, a rapier blade, and a paire of Spanish gloves, they returned home very well satisfied. But the Duke of Biron did not so much respect what was giuen him, as the esteeme they made of his valour, if hee would employ it for the King of Spaines seruice. Picott did first infect him with this poison, (which caused a fever, and proved incurable, but by that shameful effusion of his blood) whereof the King was presently aduertised by a true-hearted Frenchman, who remained at that time in the Arch-dukes Court. The Duke of Sauoy, who enjoyed the same benefit of the Peace, was bound to the obseruation thereof by the like forme.

The King sent to Mons. de la Guiche Gouverneur of Lions, that he would willingly haue giuen him that charge, but that he feared his absence might somewhat prejudice the good of his affaires, and his indisposition not suffer him to performe the voyage. Hee therefore commanded Guadagne Seneschall of Lyon, and Knight of both Orders, to undertake this charge. The oath was taken in the Friars Church of Chambery, on Sunday the second of August, where the Duke was assisted with all his Knights of the Annunciado and to witness the content which he had of this peace and reconciliation with his Maiesty, hee said vnto Guadagne, that hee held this day the happiest of all the dayes of his life, and that all which remained, should be to maintaine and honour the memory thereof. That it were not onely an indiscretion, but a blindness and a madnesse for him to change the felicities of peace, for the miseries of warre. The D. gaue vnto Guadagne, and to the chiefe Gentlemen of his traine, iewels, horses, chaines of gold, and to all, so many good words, as there was not any one but did wish him more profitt by this peace then hee could. Hee refused not any thing that was demanded of him in the execution of the Treaty, for the deliuerie and ranfome of prisoners, but onely the liberty of the Admirall Gashillon wife. He made answer to the instance which Guadagne made in the Kings name: That the respect he bare vnto his Maiesties commandements, was so great, as to please him hee would restore her goods, and giue her some more liberty, whilst that he might giue his Maiesty to understand the iust causes of her restraint.

F That whatsoever had beene decreed at Rome, for her absolution, was rather in honour of his Maiesty, then for any reason, for that he was seized vpon books and writings that were execrable and damnable. The afflictions of this Lady did moue the hearts of the chiefe Officers of this Crowne, and of many great Noblemen of the Realme, her kindnes and allies. The King had commiseration of her: for her misfortunes, her imprisonment, losses and disgraces deserved pity. She was so transported with the good desires of the Kings affaires, that although she wrote among her captiues, yet the best of her actions could could neither be smothered vnder the ashes of affliction, nor vnder the fume of dissimulation: If she could have done that whereof they accused her, shee would have made as sudden alterations on the earth, as Henry King of Sweden did in the ayre, and as admirable: as her will was absolute to desire that the King might overcome his enemies, and have satisfaction for Nice and Saluffes.

Vpon this hope that this peace should give her some content, and that the Kings commendation by his Ambassador should give some truce to her miseries, she wrote a Letter of the pitifull course of her misfortunes, whereby appeared the excellency of her spirit, in these words: Although (saith she) the comparison be as different as betwixt an Elephant and a Gnat, yet are they both vegetative and sensitiue creatures: My fortune, and that of my house, hath alwayes followed that of France and the Kings: for as since his marriage, I have alwayes scene my Estate declining, euen vnto the period of a totall ruine, by the ill successe of his affaires: so now when as God hath powred his blessings vpon him, that hee hath reuenged him of his enemies, euen by his enemies; and that against the conspiracies of the wicked, and the iudgement of the good, hee doth enioy his inheritance, I will hope there shall be some change in my condition. I desire it may be good: but if it prove otherwise, I will not alter my resolution, to receiue both good and euill as from the hand of God. I haue this aduantage ouer fortune, that hereafter her iniuries how violent and sudden so euer, shall not be strange vnto me. I am inured to my afflictions, as a gally-slave to his oare. Necessity teacheth me to suffer constantly, and custome makes my sufferance easie.

The King also gaue Guadagnes charge, to let the Duke vnderstand, that he had receiued three severall complaints from the Citie of Geneva; that his troopes which hee entertained thereabouts, vsed insupportable hostilitie, tooke prisoners, chopt and changed them, and that his Maiestie desired the towne might reap the fruit and safety which the common good of the peace did promise them, and that the Dukes troopes might be retired, to the end all ieaousie and distrust might cease. The Duke would not answer heretofore by writing, lest (saith he) he should prejudice the pretensions which hee had to that towne, for aboute foure hundred years: saying onely, that he did not thinke it had been comprised in the Treaty of peace, for that all other townes and Prouinces had been particularly named, and not that of Geneva. That he could not see his neighbors from feare and distrust, but in retiring his troopes that were about the towne, to refresh them in Lombardy, he should take away the cause, hauing no intention to prefer warre before the happinesse of peace. He therefore commanded D. Iuan de Mediniza a Spaniard, to draw his regiment, which consisted of 1200 men, out of the territories of Geneva, and to passe to Milani.

A peace being proclaimed in France, the King applies his thoughts to reforme all disorders, and to administer Iustice to all his subjects: and for the better assurance of the publike tranquillitie, hee did as his predecessors had done in the like occasions: prohibiting, by the aduice of his Princes, Officers of his Crowne, and Lords of his Councell, the carriage and vse of Harguebuzes, Petronels, Pistols, Pistolers, and other weapons, which carried fire, vpon confiscation of Armes and horse, and two hundred Crowns fine for the first offence, and to be kept in prison vntill the money were payed: and for the second, losse of goods and life, without hope of remission. Allowing all men to stay and arrest all such as should carrie such prohibited armes eight dayes after the publication of the Edict. None were excepted, but the foure hundred Archers, and the foure Companies of horse of the guards of his Maiesties person, when as they waited in quarter, the Archers of the Prouost of his household, of the Constable and Marshalls of France, and they of the company of Light-horse belonging to the Duke of Vendosme, who by the Edict might carrie Pistols when as they were in service. And to free his subjects from the oppression of Builders, and to accustom them to obedience, to whom it is troublesome in the securest peace, hee cut off the companies, as well of horse, as of the regiments of foot: but this restraint was onely that which they might well forbear. It is dangerous to leave an Estate long without armes: A disarmed peace is weak. The King therefore reduced the places vpon the frontiers, which remained still fortified with ordinary guards. The guards appointed for Gouernours and Lieutenants generall of Prouinces were suspended, and the companies of men at Armes were reduced to a lesser number. Such whose spirits could

A could not liue in the cessation of armes, and which were good Captaines in the time of warre (like vnto Marins) but ill Citizens in peace, and leaue to goe seek the exercise thereof in Flanders and Hungary.

Peace doth change the exercise of Warre into hunting: the King made it his dayly exercise. Being one day hunting in the great Forest of Fontainebleau, there was heard about halfe a League off, a great cry of hounds and the winding of hornes, and suddenly all this noise which seemed to be fatte off, came (to his iudgement) within twenty paces of his care. He commanded the Count Suffons to set out, to see what it was, thinking that no man durst presume so boldly to interrupt his sports: the Earle aduancing, heard the noise, yet could not discerne whence it came. A bigge blacke man presented himselfe in the thickest of the bushes, crying out, Dee you vnderstand me, and then hee suddenly vanished away at those words. They which were discreet, thought it great indiscretion to stay longer there hunting. The Heards-men thereabouts say it is a spirit, which they call the great Hunter, who hunts in this Forest: others hold, that it is S. Huberts chaine, the which is also heard in other places.

Many Noblemen, and Gentlemen retired themselves now vnto their governments and priuate houses: the King hauing said long before, that hee would force euery man to liue of his owne, and not to importune him any more. Neuer any Edict was better obserued then this speech, for euen then hee resolved to employ the remainder of his reuenues in publike necessities, and not in the prodigalities of Villains, nor for the enriching of priuate men, saying, that he would ease the poore, & give example vnto the rich to content themselves with little, and to liue accordingly. The Constable went to his government of Languedoc, hauing obtained of the King a reuerfion of his government for Henry of Montmorency his sonne. The King in his wisdome, thought he could not sufficiently grace a house, which hath brought forth so many Gouernours, Admirals, Marshalls, and Constables: and which vnder the name of Montmorency comprehends that of Horne and Laual, which hath giuen viues to Kings of France and Dukes of Britany. The Letters Patentes were read and registred in the Court of Aydes at Montpellier, the Duke of Vantador being President, and the Bishops of Agde and Nismes assisting.

The order which the King did take for the affaires of his house, was a president to all France, shewing the religious desire which hee had to see his subjects enioy the fruits thereof. His iustice would not suffer them to be charged and surcharged with impossible duties, seeing that the violence of the warre had left them nothing but their tongues to complain, being like vnto a stone laid vpon a dead mans bones. Yet notwithstanding they were forced to pay the publicke charges for the time which they had not gathered. And therefore the King did vnto his subjects, as Constantine and Gracianus did vnto them of the Empire, by a general discharge of the remainder of their Tacke and Tributes. He also sent, according to the resolution of the Estates held at Roan, many great personages, as well of his Councell, as of other companies, to examine the necessities of his people, to order the Taxes and Tributes, and to protect the weak from the oppression and violence of such as during the ciuill warres had scene no light of iustice, but through the flame of Harguebuzes: hauing so abused the time, as to enioy the priuiledge of Nobles, they would be esteemed rather by their shew, then by the vse and seruice of the sword: and when as the Law (which doth chiefly binde Noblemen by reason of their tenures and titles of Nobility to the duties of Armes) hath conuired them to succour the necessities of their Prince and Country, they haue thrust themselves among the people, liuing idly in townes, or in the delights of their houses, so long as fire and danger was in field. Men unworthy of the name of men, of Gentlemen, and of Frenchmen. The Commissioners forced these kind of gallants to pay, who by pretended Letters of their Gentry, and abuse of the Priuiledges, had laid their Taxes vpon the people.

While the King labours to reforme all abuses, and to root out disorders: the Deputies of the Clergy of France (being assembled together at Paris, with the Kings permission) beseech his Maiesty to reforme the disorders of the Church, which speech was deliuered with great reuerence before his Maiesty, by the reuerent Francois de la Grosse Archbishop of Tours, accompanied with many of the said Deputies of the Clergy. The King with the reſpect which his predeceſſors haue alwayes borne to the firſt of the three Orders of his Realme, thinking that the honour which is done vnto the Clergy, hath a reference vnto God, and that Biſhops, although they be his vallaies and ſubiects, are no leſſe then the Miniſters and Ambaſſadors of the liuing God, and Interpreters of his holy will, he anſwers them in this manner.

"I confeſſe that what you haue ſaid is true, but I am not the author of theſe innovations: theſe miſchiefs were brought in before my coming. During the Warres I haue run to the greateſt fire to quench it. I will now doe what is needfull in time of peace. I know that Religion and Iuſtice be the foundations and pillars of this Eſtate, which is maintained by piety and iuſtice. But if they were not, I would plant them by little and little. I doe all things. With the helpe of God I will ſettle the Church in as good Eſtate as it was an hundred yeares ſince, as well for the diſcharge of my conſcience, as for your content: but Paris was not all built in one day. Let the people be as much perſwaded by your good examples to doe well, as they haue been heretofore diſſwaded. You haue exhorted mee of my duty. I doe admoniſh you of yours: let vs all doe good. Goe you one way, and I will goe another: if we meet, wee ſhall ſoone haue done. My predeceſſors haue giuen you Words, but I with my gray ſacklet will giue you Deeds. I am all gray without, but I am all of gold within. I will write vnto my Council to ſee your complaints, and will provide for you as fauourably as I may.

During theſe admonitions of the Clergy, the Cardinall of Florence moued the King for the reſtitution of the Jeſuits. The 7 Article of the Treaty of peace at Veruins did ſuffer the ſubiects and ſeruants of either ſide, as well Clergy-men as Lay, to retorne and enioy their Offices, Benefices, and Reuenues, obtaining permiſſion and Letters Patents vnder the broad ſeale from the Prince. Many thought that the Jeſuits ſhould be comprehended in this Article, and that if by this peace the Spaniards were held Allies, and as it were couſin germanes to the French, thoſe whom the Kings Aduocate had the yeare before in open Parliament termed Emiſſaires to the King of Spaine, ſhould now retorne to their Colledges, from whence they had been expelled by a ſentence giuen in December, in the yeare 1594. But the light of peace ſhines not vpon them. The new world which it doth produce hauing caſt the cinders of Warre, Rancor and Reuenge into the aire, allows them no retreat within the iuriſdiction of Paris. The Decrees which had baniſhed them, are grauen in Marble, the Water of Prayers, Favour and Teares, although it pierceeth ſtones, preuailes nothing. Their enemies had taxed them with the making of certaine writings which offended the Court, whoſe authoritie is alwayes wronged in the offences which concerne the Princes honor. This made them reuiue the firſt reſtraints not to find any

A any youth to the Schooles of their Order, as to Tournon, to Pont-au-Mouſſon, and other places, both within and without the Realme, and to declare, that ſuch as ſhould bee inſtructed & taught in their Colledges, ſince the Decree made the 29 of December 1594, ſhould not enioy the priuiledges of Vniuerſities, as incapable of the degrees thereof: Neither might they by vertue of any Degrees obtained, teach publicly, nor be aduanced to any Offices or Benefices, fir for Graduates; nor receiued Aduocates in any Courts or Seates of Iuſtice.

The Court had giuen commandment to the Earle of Tournon to expell them his country, vpon a great penalty contained in the Decree, and for that he had not performed it, his goods and Iuriſdiction were put into the Kings hands, and his Office of Senefhall of Auvergne declared void. But although the Parliament of Paris may terme it ſelfe the only Parliament of France, and the Court of Peeres: that it is the fountaine, and the reſſe but little riuers, yet her Decrees preſcribe no lawes to other Parliaments: That of Tholouſa prohibited the Earle of Tournon to obey that of Paris. The Jeſuites are yet there, their Colledges are frequented, their retorne deſired, and the exerciſe of Sciences as famous as euer. The defences to goe thither haue but augmented the number. The Kings Aduocate pleading vpon this ſubiect, ſaid they were the Authors of ſome execrable Pamphlets which he named nor. It was a booke printed in Flanders, for the apology of a miſerable Parricide, a prodigious Affaſſine, and a wicked Martyr, written with a pen of ſteele, and with inke of blood. Some ſay, the Author hath aduowed it, and iuſtified the Jeſuits. When they ſaw that this new ſtorme began to threaten them in the calme of publike tranquillitie, and that they had obtained letters from the Parliament of Bourdeaux, to chaſe them out of all Guienne, they had recourſe to the Kings Iuſtice: there is nothing that doth more aduance the greatneſſe of the Soueraigne, nor aſſe of greater reuerence, then to demand Iuſtice. Many things may be obtained from others, onely Iuſtice comes from the Prince. One equall may doe good to another, but the Soueraigne onely can doe iuſtice: wherefore in demanding iuſtice by their petition, they ſaid it was a right due vnto them; yea, were they the moſt guilty men in the world, it ſhould bee granted them ſo much the more freely, for that their Iuſtification concerned the good and reputation of the Realme.

D Since that time they haue been incountred both in Verſe and Proſe, and they haue defended themſelves learnedly. The more they fought to make them ſeeme unworthy of their retorne, the more they defended the iuſtice and neceſſity of their re-eſtabliſhment.

At the ſame time was concluded the marriage of Madam Katherine Princeſſe of France and of Nauarre, the Kings only Siſter, with the Marquis of Pont, Duke of Bar, and Prince of Lorraine, after many iourneys made by the ſaid Prince vnto the moſt Chriſtian King: in which accord there were great difficulties, as well by reaſon of the diuerſitie of Religion (the ſaid Princeſſe reſuſing to leaue the reformed, wherein ſhe had been bred) as alſo for that the could not be perſwaded to goe out of France. She had beene formerly fought by many great Princes, to whom ſhe would not conſent, for the one or the other of theſe two cauſes, and ſometimes for both together. Francis Monſieur Duke of Alençon deſired her in the yeare 1582, but the difficulty was then greater for matters of Religion. And before that, King Henry the third coming out of Poland did aſſe her: and it was thought, that if he had ſeene her at Lyons at his retorne, he would haue married her: but Katherine de Medicis the Queene-mother deſcribed her to bee a dwarfie (the which was moſt falſe) for ſhe was of a meane ſtature, and of a good countenance. It is true, ſhe had one legge ſomewhat ſhorter then another (which is a marke of the houſe of Albret: for ſo had Alain Lord of Albret, Father to King Iohn, great Grandfather to the ſaid Princeſſe Katherine.) The Queene-mother did this good turne for her God-daughter, ſeeking to diſgrace the K. of Nauarre, whom ſhe hated from his youth, vpon an imagination, being told by an Italian South-layer, that he ſhould ſucceed her children. Then the D. of Lorraine (who ſince was her father-in-law) fought her. The Prince of Conde loued her. The K. of Spaine ſent to ſee her, in the yeare 1580, promiſing great aduancement to the King of Nauarre.

F This failing, the Duke of Sauoy ſent twice in the yeare 83, promiſing no way to impeach her religion. His Agent being reſuſed, he went into Spaine about his marriage with the Infanta Catherine Michelle. In the yeare 86 the King of Scotland ſent Maſter William a Scottiſh-man, and others. The Prince of Anhalt being come to the ſuccour of the King her brother, at his firſt coming to the Crowne of France, demanded her hand for his person : but through the necessity of the Warres which were dispersed throughout all France, he returned as he came, with some discontent. During these warres, two Princes of the blood affected her, the Earle of Soissons, and the Duke of Montpensier: but the nearness of blood, the diversity of Religion, and the difficulty of affaires, hindered the effect of their desires. So as in the end he enjoyed her to whom God had appointed her. The ceremonies observed at this marriage, we will shew in the following year.

The King at the conclusion of the Treaty of Veruins, was desirous that his good Sister the Queene of England should be comprehended therein. But it was an accord which the King of Spaine would make apart : for the effecting whereof, the King did offer the Towne of Bouloungne for an interview of the Deputies; where they met of both sides : but the Ceremony for Precedence made it fruitlesse. For whereas the Deputies of England would not give place to them of Spaine, they returned without doing any thing : neither was there any of them that thought it reasonable, to purchase a peace with such prejudice to his Princes service : They say, that the peoples health is the Soueraigne law : but that which concerns the respect of the Prince, and the ranke which hee is to hold before others, is alwayes immutable. There are some lawes mortall, and others which neuer dye. Those have their continuance according to the time : Necessity makes the other alwayes durable, for the perpetual good they find in the obseruation, as Lucius Valerius said, pleading against the Oppian law. Of the condition of these mortall lawes is the right of Precedence. He that shall suffer the diminution, as not worthy of the increase.

During this dispute for the Precedence, the King was at Monceaux to take the diet. The Physicians had given him so great liberty to eat Melons of Chénouay and Lyons, as he felt it, and paid dearly for the taste of his delights : for the third day of his diet walking in his doublet in his gallery at Monceaux, a fever took him, which turned his diet into speedier remedies, and brought him to that estate, as many built their hopes upon the despaire of his health : and there were posts attended, ready to carrie thee bad newes. But the dignities of troubles and fashions dyed, when as they saw him recover his former health. The Duchesse of Beaufort served him in this sickness, with an affection and care equal to the love which makes the lover feeble the same griefe that the beloved doth. It was the same time when as he hoped to beas well Queen of France, as he reigned in the Kings heart. They said that our Dauphins should be Cesars or Alexanders, and that that which had bin but a sport or pleasure, should now be made a contract of necessity. Being recovered, he came to S. Germain in Lay, there to end the yeare, and to resolve upon his expences. Hee would have the aduice of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, to acquaint them with the estate of his affaires, to the end that if every man did not obtaine what he demanded, he should impute the cause vnto necessity. The great tables charged with vnknowne superfluities (more esteemed for the price and rarenesse, then for the taste or necessitie) were then cut off by the Kings example, which hath alwayes more force, then either law or correction. Excesse was conuerted into frugalitie, so necessary is an Estate, as the Romanes were no lesse bound to the Figs and Carrots of the Fabritii and Curi, then to their swords.

Then was there scene a new order in the disposition of the Kings Treasure, by the care and industries of the Marquis of Rhoeny, vnto whom his Maiestie gaue the charge of Superintendent. From the first day he let them know, how hard it was to draw money out of the Kings coffers: and for so many dealers in it as were wont to be, there should now be but one. His humour seemed strange: he cared not for all the petty gods, so as he pleased Aspulus saith. He refused many things to the end that the grant might be referred for the King, and all fauours receiued from his Maiesties onely hand, and not from any other, the which hath purchased him many enemies, who enuying his prosperity and condition, desire the ouerthrow of his happinesse, and yet are constrained to admire the force and soundnesse of his vnderstanding. Those who raised to the Sollicite of these greatnesse, must consider, that Princes fauours are alwayes perillous. It is a difficult thing to stand long firme vpon this Ice: and the fall, how gentle so euer, will neuer suffer him to rise againe: the which is proued in Tiberius to Seianus, Charles the sixth, to Iohn Montaigne and many others.

I have learned of a great perfonage, Ambaffador to a Prince of Germany, three words which hee caried grauen in a clocke. Hee faid them once a day, and did thinke of them

Fortune must alwayes yeeld vnto Vertue.

They talke of nothing at Court but feasts and triumphs. The King maries in the end of the last moneth of the yeare, and Katherine his only filter, had bene promised to the Marquis of Pont, Prince of Lorraine, and Duke of Barr, The Contracts were made in the presence of the Duke of Lorraine, who came into France. The conditions were, That the said Prince should be entituled Duchesse of Albret, Countesse of Armagnac, and of Rhodiz, Vicountesse of Limoges, and should haue for her yeerely portion an hundred thousand crownes : and in case she had any children, they should cary the same titles, and be provided for. And in case she did suruiue him, she should enioy the Duchy of Barr in Barrois, with a yeerly pension, taken out of the reuenues of Lorraine. This done, the ancient alliances which had bin betweene these two Houses, were renewed, and the marriage was consummated : but there was first some question touching the Reformed Religion, in the which she had bene bred, the which she would not change, by reason (as she saide) of her deceased mother, Queene Ioane of Navarre, whose life and actions were held worthy to be imitated. She did with all her heart affect that which did concerne the liberty of conscience throughout all France, beleeching the King often to let her see the assurances thereof whilest he was in France, and not to suffer his Edicts to remaine without execution being proclaimed, & without a durable obseruation being executed. She was daughter to a mother who preferred safety of conscience before assurance of honours and greatnessse, yea then life it selfe, being accustomed to say to them of her part, that armes should not be layd downe, but with these three conditions, either an assured peace, an absolute victorie, or an honest death. Moreover, she apprehended the reproach of inconstancy at that age, if she should change her religion, hauing returned vnto it after shee had bene a while Catholicke: yee she promised her future husband to suffer her selfe to be instructed and to doe what he pleased.

D The King seeing his sisters resolution, did what he could to reclaim her by mildness, propounding unto her his own example, and giving her to understand by some words, that the most otherwise looker for no favour at his hands. Seeing he could not prevail, before he signed the said contract (which was at Monceaux, a Castle belonging to the Duchess of Beaufort, whom the King loved) the common brude was, that shee did greatly presse this marriage, by reason of her pretensions: about the end of the year, the King told her, that his meaning was not to force her, neither for her religion, nor for her marriage. He assured his future brother in law to doe his dutie, and so discharge his conscience: He also advertised him of one expedient, which was, to remove certaine women, and other persons, from about the said Lady, for that her traine consisted of Catholics, and others.

E And amongst those others, there were some willfull and contentious, in whom the said Lady trusted much, for that they had bene bred up in her service from her cradle: bural

The said Prince of Lorraine accompanied with his brother the Earle of Vaudemont, and other Noblemen of Lorraine, with three hundred Gentlemen well appointed, a little before January, this year 1599, arrived at Paris, in which month the King had appointed the day of the marriage. He entered by Saint Denis gate, the King doing him the honour to enter with him, having met him in the field as he came from hunting. The King led the said Duke his brother in law (calling him commonly brother) to the Louvre, where they supped together, and Madam his sister with them. The time was spent in dancing, and other exercises of recreation and pastime among the great Princes. The Kings sister for her part shewed all the contentment that might be, as she had good reason, having assumed to that which she was accustomed to say, Grata superueniet que non sperabitur hora: the said Lady being well instructed in the Latine tongue: and she did the more apprehend this Latin verse, for that some had given it forth: she would never be married.

According unto that which the said Lady had promised, to suffer her selfe to be instructed in the Catholike religion, it was resolved by his Majesty, that there should be a conference betwixt some Catholike Doctors, and some Ministers of the Reformed religion.

in the presence of his sister: but they prevailed nothing for her conversion. The King foreseeing some inconveniences, resolved (as well to satisfy her conscience, as to avoid scandal) to have this instruction deferred until another time. And in the mean time they should proceed in the marriage. Hereupon there were some practices by the Ministers of the pretended reformed Religion, who would have the honour (said they) that the Kings only sister should be married by them: and that the Prince of Lorraine should seek his Spouse where she was, and that it was not convenient she should seek him in his Church. In truth this was plausible, and it seemed the Lady had a great interest in it. But the Prince on the other side, protested never to be married by a Minister: so as there was much arguing in what forme they should be married. But the King, by his accustomed wisdom, shewed the effects of his authority.

The thirtieth day of January being Sunday, in the morning, the King having advertised his sister over-night of his intention, and entreated the Prince of Lorraine to be ready, he goes and takes his sister at her rising, and conducts her by the hand into his cabinet, where her future Spouse was already. He commanded the worthy and reverend Archbishop of Roan his natural brother, to marry the said Marquis, Prince, and Duke, with the Princess and Duchesse his Sister, by words of the present. Whereunto the said Archbishop at the first made some refusal: saying, That the accustomed solemnities must be therein observed. Whereunto he replied most learnedly, That his presence was more than all other solemnities, and that his Cabinet was a sacred place. And therefore having commanded the said Archbishop to go on, notwithstanding all difficulties, he proceeded then to the nuptial blessing of the said parties present, that were there conjoyined in marriage, even as if they had bene in the greatest Church in Paris, which done, every one went to his devotion. Afterwards the King commanded his Sister to attire her selfe like a Bride: and so the feast was solemnly celebrated. All the great Officers did assist and serve there in their degrees, with all the grace and honour the King could devise to give unto the Prince of Lorraine his brother in law. This marriage was honoured with all kinds of sports and dancing.

About the end of February, the said Princess went with her husband into Lorraine, whereas the Duke gave her the greatest entertainment he could devise, embracing her as his own child. There had bene great heart-burning and discontentment, by reason of the diversity of Religion. The Kings intentions were, to drown the remembrance of the bitterness of fore-past reignes, in the mildness of his government, and that the common feeling of so many miseries which they had suffered, and which had continued, should persuade them to grow familiar and friendly together, and to have no more occasion to remember things past, then his Majesty had meaning to remember his owne wrongs. Warre is not dead in an Estate whereas consciences are divided: it doth but sleepe, a small matter awakens it: there is nothing more apprehensive, or that doth pierce more violently into the persuasion of men, to bandy them one against another, then religion. Every man thinks his owne the better, and so judgeth of it, more by his owne zeale and passion, then through knowledge and reason.

The King, during the warre, had runne to those things which did most presse him, and to the dangers that did most import: he had deferred to reconcile this division, being grieved in his soule that the impiety of the warre would not suffer him to make shew of the fruits of his piety.

They of the reformed Religion, made many and great complaints, that the Kings Edicts were not observed nor kept: that they were not provided of all things necessary for the exercise of their Religion, the liberty of their consciences, and the safety of their persons and fortunes. They said moreover, that they desired not that the order of government of State should be changed to their profit, or of any foraine Prince: nor to have the State torne in pieces, to please the ambition of some few men, but only to enjoy their consciences with peace, and their lives in safety. That so many iust requests granted unto them by the Edicts of Kings, predecessors to his Majesty, demanded and defended by himselfe, with so great zeale and vertue, had not bene hearkened unto vnder his reign, when and vnder whom they should best hope: and had it not been for the affection which they had unto his Gracemajesty, and the foundation which they layd on his good will towards them, they might lawfully and profitably have practised the wayes which they were forced to hold vnder Kings his predecessors. But they could not despair any thing of him, whom

A whom God by the protection of his Church had brought unto the succession of the Crowne, nor obtaine lesse then liberty and life, having spent their bloods so freely for him. They complained, that Preaching was banished from his Majesties Court, to banish them consequently from his House, where they could not serve him without serving of God. No good man might remaine there, but he was daily in danger of murdering, or to be hurt, without hope of comfort, or assurance of grace. That they practise daily to exclude them of the Religion from all charges and offices in the State, Iustice, Treasure and Policy, which they did neuer greatly affect, as his Majesty can best witness. They beseech him to iudge, if it be reasonable they should doe wrong unto their children, to deprive them of their dunelstee, to be held in future ages for Lewes within the Realme, in stead of the honourable ranke which their progenitours had left them, and which their service done unto his Majesty should have purchased them. That it was more tolerable to live vnder the truce of the deceased King, who was an enemy to their profession, yet he did grant unto them the exercise of their Religion, both in his army and in his Court, allowed the Ministry at his owne charge, and gave them a towne of refuge in every Bayliwicke.

His Majesties good servants knew not what to answer to these generall complaints, knowing that it is more trouble some to be deprived of that which is promised and allowed, then of things but hoped for, which makes troubled minds go passe from the hope of good, to the expectation of ill; from long and fruitlesse patience, to seeke for remedy. They knew well his Majesty was not without alarme: that he would take no delight to see a Protector, and would be ieaalous they should address themselves to any other but himselfe. This Petition ended with bolder speeches then were fit for an obedient Estate, and for men that will seeme moderate and faine, who desire nothing but what shall please the Prince, and who should referre all their wills to his discretion. We cannot speake too humble, too reverently, to Kings. We must use words of like, as Parifate said: Sir, will you take from them all desire to have a Protector, free them of the necessity, to open one to them your selfe, continue over them this first care, this first affection, prevent their supplications by a full motion, their iust demands by a voluntary grant of necessary things. When they should see you have care over them, they will not have it of themselves. But pardon him that should tell you, that they all doubt whether you have enough of your selfe. You know what hurts them, and what helps them: the petitions you presented for them to Kings your predecessors, for their liberties and safeties, take them now to your selfe. Doubtless since that time they have left nothing of their doctrine, they have done you great services, and should have purchased an increase in your authority, who may both report and fully satisfy their iust demands, and without any Deputies, and with more thanks, if you please, be both Iudge and Advocate.

Such were the discourses where with the King was daily importuned. The disposition of men, be above all of men of that sort, of Franchment of that Religion, is to have againe spurne which are hardly stayed: to day a complaint, to morrow a petition, after that a word: This publicke agitation profits them: they assemble, and dissolve not their Assembly before they know where they shall assemble againe.

The end of all these assemblies, was to obtaine an Edict from the King, so cleere and plaine, concerning all their necessities, as they should not be constrained to see for any other: as they did not cease until the King had signed it, being at Nantes, where he had reduced that Province unto his obedience, containing a Declaration of the Edicts of Pacification; and of the troubles growne in France for matter of Religion: the which was not allowed in the Court of Parliament at Paris; until the 15 of February this year 1599, by reason of many oppositions and difficulties that were made. At Saint Germain in May, Berhier, one of the Agents for the Clergy, made many petitions unto his Majesty, and did greatly importune the Lords of the Councell to consider of them. In like sort, the Bishop of Mompas, who was then the Popes Nuncio in France, dealt in it, beseeching the King to take care for his subjects that were gone astray, as the honor of God might require, and the Church receive no prejudice: in so doing, his Holinesse would endure all things for the peace of France.

Berhier demanded, that his Majesty would not suffer the Ministers of the reformed Religion, to have any other liberty on this side the river of Loire, but to live quietly, and not not to be sought after. That the Catholike Religion should be generally restored in all places, and Churchmen doe their offices without any danger. And thirdly, that the Clergy-men should be wholly freed from the vexations which they had suffered vntill that day, in townes and places held by them of the Religion, where they had taken away their pensions and reuenues, and in some prouinces had forced them. His Maiesty granted the second and third Article: and as for the first, the King not being able to make any such prohibition without some trouble, it was let alone.

Contention working their Synods with strangers.

There was also great contention in particular, betwixt the said Berthier, and some of the Reformed religion, touching the assembly of their Synods: the which they would haue free, without demanding leave from his Maiesty: maintaining that they might goe freely into foraine countries, and assit at their Synods and other Ads: and in like sort receiue strangers into theirs, the which the Marshall of Bouillon had managed with some, who perhaps had not foreseen the danger: but Berthier contended it so vehemently against the Marshall in the Kings presence, as his reasons being heard, and the importance of the thing considered, that it was a meane to continue their Leagues and Intelligences with strangers, to be ready to take armes at their pleasures, the which could not be but with the ruine of the State. The King hauing heard their contentions, and finding of what importance it was, he presently caused that article touching foraine Synods to be razed: forbidding them expressly to goe to any Assemblies without his permission, vpon paine to be declared traytors.

The Rector for the Vniuersity of Paris was also a sutor vnto his Maiesties Councell, that none of the Reformed religion, nor their Schoolemasters and Tutors, might be admitted into any Colleges of the Vniuersity: but to be excluded from all schollers. Whereupon there was great debate, especially for the faculty of Physicke. But it was answered, that they should not be admitted to teach: And as for the humane and profane faculties, they should be admitted as the rest. And although the difficulties were great, and the conditions in some cases more beneficiall then in the first, yet the common quiet of all France, shaken and almost ruined with the tragique violence of Schismes and Diuisions, hath made all to be held necessary that was for the quiet and continuance of the State. Although it were to be wished, that there were but one exercise of Religion, for that in this vniuersity all are of the same Religion, and the Church is the work of God, as well as the building of it, we must be content with that which may beget and leaue the triumph and conquest of soules, to his eternall victory. A wise man alone makes and frames the heart as he pleaseth, and giues the signe vnto many soules that are gone astray, to make them enter into salvation, being impossible for man to impose any necessity to things which God hath left in liberty as the conscience, the which should be as free in Estates as in our thoughts.

should be free.

The Church hath alwayes detested Heresies, but they neuer employed the rigour of their iudgements, but against the Arch-Heresikes, and but when they had shewed themselves obstinate in their errors: their punishments were more shamefull then cruel, more medicinall then mortall, desiring rather to see their faces blush for shame, then sweat with blood. Neuer Prince well-advised, did put his subjects to death to force belief, destroy his Prouinces by Warre, to intrude their consciences by the sword: knowing well that Religion is an act of Vnion, of Concord, and of Instruction; and Warre is nothing but Sedition and Destruction. And those which in this world haue troubled both heauen and earth, to force their subjects consciences vnto one Religion, haue in the end been constrained and forced, to suffer them to liue free and in rest, receiuing and refusing the aduise of those bad Physicians, who applied nothing but Antimony and Phlebotomy to all diseases.

should be free.

By these reasons,
the Prince
is forced.

By these reasons, the King (in whose person God hath done so many miracles, and poured forth a sea of blessings) seeing that the continuance of the warre had produced no other fruits but the ruine of Iustice and Pietie, which be the two vertues which doe canopie Princes, the two Pillars vpon whose firmnesse great Clouis was assured of the continuance of this Estate, he doth now confirme the Edict of Pacification of the troubles for matters of Religion, and wils that which he may, lest he should incur the note of such as seek to correct things that are incorrigible, and shew that the sore is greater then the remedy, that some things haue taken such deepe root, as they cannot be pulled vp. The Court of Parliament
against
the Edict.

A Truth and Reason haue proued, that this Edict was most iust, most necessary, and most profitable. Yet the Court of Parliament could not allow of this fraternity and communication of Offices: saying, That they should not be transported with the ambition of honours, but content themselves with the tranquillity of conscience: that it is not convenient in one estate, to haue great offices executed by men of diuers Religions, being a thing vniust, to haue the new increased as well as the ancient. They found a great difference betwixt this Edict and the Precedent, and refused to allow it. The King sent for the chiefe of them, and spake vnto them in this manner.

speaks to
Parliament.

B You see me in my Cabinet, where I come to speake vnto you, not attired in any Royall ornaments, nor with cloake or rapier, as my predecessors: nor as a Prince that comes from receiuing of Ambassadors: but apparelled like a Father of a Family in his doublet and hose, to speake familiarly to his children. That which I haue to say vnto you, is to desire you to confirme the Edict which I haue granted to them of the Religion. That which I haue done, is for the good of the peace. I haue made it without, I desire to settle it within my Realme. You ought to obey me, if there were no consideration but my quality, and the bond whereby all my subjects are tied vnto me, and you especially of my Court of Parliament. I haue restored some to their houses from whence they are expelled: and others to their credit, which was lost.

C If obedience was due to my Predecessors, there is as much or more deuotion due vnto me, who haue settled the State. God hath made choice of me to put me in possession of the Realme, which is mine owne, both by succession and acquisition. The Iudges of my Parliament should not sit in their seats but for me. I will not bragge, but I dare boldly say, that I haue no example to imitate, but my selfe. I know there haue beene factions in the Parliament: that they haue stirred vp seditious Preachers. But I will take good order for such people, and will not attend your pleasures. In former times they haue punished them with great severity, that haue preached lesse seditionously then they doe now. It is the course they tooke to make the barricadoes, and by degrees to murder the deceased King. I will cur vp all these factions by the roots: and will shorten all them that shall nourish them. I haue leaped ouer towne-walls, I will easily passe ouer barricadoes. They should not obiect vnto me the Catholike Religion, nor the respect of the holy See. I know the duty which I owe the one as the most Christian King, and the honour of the name which I carry, and the other as the first sonne of the Church. Those which thinke themselves to be in good termes with the Pope, are deceived. I am more then they. When I shall undertake it, I will make you all to be declared Heretikes for disobeying of me.

A Prince
reason of his Edict.

The Maiesty of Kings is alwayes wronged by the contempt of their decrees: but the offence is alwayes greater, when it comes from them that should see them to be obeyed. Those which deny the execution of my Edicts, desire warre. I will proclaim it to morrow against them of the Religion: but I will not make it my selfe. I will send them: I haue made the Edict, I will haue it obserued, my will should serue for reason, the which is neuer denied of the Prince in an obedient State. Their wils should be put in execution, and not interpreted: And yet I say vnto you, that necessity and profit hath drawne mee into it. I haue done it by the aduice of all my Councell, who haue found it good and necessary for the estate of my affaires, and the good of my seruice: to settle concord, and to disperse all the miseries which discord doth bring forth.

Necessity
reason and essentiall cause of
the Edict.

Some haue complained, that I would make leaues of Suiſſes, or of other troops. If I did, they must thinke it were to some good end, by reason of all my actions past. Witnesseth that which I haue done for the recovery of Amiens, where I haue employed the money of the Edicts which you would not haue passed, if I had not come my selfe vnto the Parliament. Necessity hath forced me to make this Edict: by the same necessity I haue here tofore played the souldier.

F They haue talked at their pleasures, and I haue not seemed to regard it. I am now a King, and speake as a King. I will be obeyed. There is not any one of you that finds me not good when I haue need of me. And there is not any one but hath need once in the year, and yet you are bad to me that am so good. If other Parliaments (for that they haue not met my will) haue beene the cause that they of the Religion haue demanded new taxes, I would not haue you the cause of other innovations, by your refusal. In the year 1598, and 99, when I sent vnto you a Declaration vpon the Edict, for the provision of Offices, I did

"did then promise, that I would not advance any one of the Religion to offices in the Court of Parliament. Since time hath altered the affaires, we must accommodate our selves thereunto: and yet I will be well assured of such as I shall advance to those charges, that they shall governe themselves as they ought.

400 pound sterling.

"Take not so much of the Catholike religion. To all these great criers, Catholikes and Ecclesiastikes, let mee give to one a thousand crownes a yeare in Benefices, to another foure thousand Livres of rent, they will not speake a word more. I have the same opinion of all others that shall speake against the Edict. There are some which hate the sinne for feare of punishment, but the good hate it for the love of vertue. For Gods sake let me know that you hate sinne for the love of vertue, or else I will chastise them that hate it for feare of paine: and afterwards they will thanke me, as the son doth his father. The Preachers deliver words in their Sermons, more to nourish, then to destroy sedition, yet no one of you saith any thing: these faults which concerne me, are not regarded. But I will foresee that this thunder shall bring no storm, and that their predictions shall prove vaine. I will not vse their remedies, which being out of season, will but increase the euill. Consider that the Edict whereof I speake, is the deceased Kings Edict: it is also mine, for it was made with me, and I doe now confirme it. I will say no more, but aduise you to imitate the example of the obedience of the Duke of Mayenne. Being perswaded to enter in some factions against my will, he answered, that he was too much bound vnto mee, and so were all my subiects, amongst the which he would be alwayes one that should expose his life to please me, for that I had restored France in despite of them that sought to ruine it. And if he that was the head of the League, hath spoken in this manner, how much more ought you, whom I have restored to the place from whence the League had expelled you, yeeld vnto my request, that which you would not doe for threats: you shall have none of mee: doe that which I command you, or rather what I intreat you, you shall not doe it only for me, but for your selves, and for the good of the peace.

This speech was well understood by the Parliament, and the difficulties which were found in the allowance of the Edict, were held tolerable, by reason of the Kings will, and the necessity of his affaires. Yet they continued forty dayes after, before they would resolve. The Duchesse of Barr, the Kings sister, would not depart out of Paris, before it was confirmed. She had shewed her selfe burning in zeale and affection in that matter, as in all other affaires in that nature: and it was not without reason, that after the Kings entry into Paris, when as the Deputies of the Churches of Poitou beseeched his Majesty for something depending vpon the execution of his Edicts: hee said vnto them, Address your selves vnto my Sister, your Estate is now fallen vnto the Disaffaite. The Articles and Edict are as followeth.

Edict of Pacification.

HENRY by the grace of God, &c. Amongst the infinite blessings which it hath pleased God to bestow vpon vs, is that the most remarkable, to haue giuen vs vertue and courage not to yeeld to the fearfull troubles, confusions, and disorders, which wee found at our coming to this Realme, the which was diuided into so many parts and factions, as the most lawfull seemed to be the least; and to haue so fortified vs against this storme, as in the end we haue surmounted it, and doe now touch the gate of this Estates rest: whereof the glory belongs to him, and to vs the bond and thanks, that hee would vse our labour to finish this good worke: wherein it hath bene visible to all men, whether we haue done that which was our duty, and in our power, yea somewhat more, the which it may be in another season had not bene so fit for the dignitie which wee hold, hauing not feared to expose our life often and freely therein. And in this great concurrence of so great and dangerous affaires, not being able to pacifie all at one instant, wee haue bene forced to hold this course, to attempt those first which could not be ended but by force, and suspend the rest for a time, which ought and might be treated by reason and iustice: as the generall differences betwixt our good subiects, and priuate grievances of the founteyne part of the State, which we held, might more easily be cured, the principall cause being taken away, the which was in the continuance of the ciuill warres.

This hauing by the grace of God well and happily succeeded, and all armes and hostilitie

A hostility ceasing throughout the Realme, we hope our successe will be no lesse in other affaires, which remaine yet to compound: And that by this meanes we shall attaine vnto the establishment of a good peace and tranquility, the which hath alwaies bene the end of our vowes and intentions, and the prize which we desire of so much paine and toyle; wherein we haue past the course of our age. Amongst the said affaires, to the which we haue bene forced to give patience, and one of the chiefe, haue bene the complaints which wee haue receiued from many of our Prouinces and Catholike towne, that the exercise of the Catholike Religion was not vniuersally restored, as it ought by the Edicts heretofore made for the pacification of the troubles by reason of religion; as also the supplications and remonstrances, which haue bene made vnto vs, by our subiects of the pretended reformed religion, as well vpon the not executing of that which hath bene granted by the said Edicts, as vpon that which they desire should bee added for the exercise of their said Religion, the liberty of their Consciences, and the surety of their owne persons and fortunes: pretending to haue iust cause, to haue new and greater apprehensions, by reason of these last troubles, whereof the principall pretext and ground was made vpon the ruine. Wherefore not to ouer charge our selves with too much businesse at once, seeing that the fury of Armes cannot agree with establishment of Lawes, how good soeuer, wee haue from time to time deferred it.

C But now seeing it hath pleased Almighty God to give vs some rest, we haue thought we could not better employ our time, then in that which might concerne the glory of his Holy name and seruice, and to provide that he may be worshipped by all our subiects: And if it hath not pleased him that they should bee all of one forme and religion, yet at the least of one intention, and with that order, as it might breed no trouble nor tumult amongst them: and that both wee and this Realme may enjoy the glorious title of The most Christian King, which hath bene by so many merits long since purchased. And by the same meanes to take away the cause of trouble, which may happen for matters of Religion, which is the most sensible of all others. For this occasion knowing this businesse to be of great importance, and worthy of good consideration, hauing receiued the complaints of our Catholike subiects, giuing also leaue to them of the pretended reformed Religion, to assemble by their Deputies, and to make their remonstrance, and hauing thereupon often conferred with them, and viewed the precedent Edicts; we haue now thought it necessary, to give vnto all our said subiects, a generall, plaine, and absolute law, by the which they may bee ruled in all differences which haue heretofore happened amongst them, and which may happen; wherewith all our subiects may haue cause to rest contented, according to the quality of the time.

The cause which makes vs to enter into this deliberation, is the onely zeale wee haue vnto the seruice of God, and that it may be hereafter duely performed by our subiects, and to settle a good and durable peace amongst them. Wherein we implore and attend E the same protection and fauour of his diuine bountie, which he hath alwaies imparted to this Realme since the first beginning: And that of his grace he will make our subiects conceiue, that in the obseruation of this our Edict, consiste (after their duty vnto vs) the chiefe ground of their vnion, concord, tranquility, and peace, and the restoring of this Estate to her first beauty, wealth, and force. And wee for our part, promise to cause it to bee exactly obserued, without suffering anything to be done to the contrary.

For these causes, hauing with the aduice of the Princes of our blood; other Princes and Officers of the Crowne, with great and notable personages of our Council of State, being neare vs, well and diligently weighed and considered all these businesse, we R haue by this perpetual and irrevokable Edict, said, declared and ordained; and say declare and ordaine:

That there shall bee an abolition and forgetting of all things past on either side. That the remembrance of all injuries shall be suppressed, and that they shall lye lowly together like brethren and fellow Citizens. That the Romish Religion shall be restored in all places of the Realme where it hath bene intermitted, and that no Clergie-man shall be molested in the celebration of Diuine Service, but shall enjoy the fruites and reuenues of their benefices, and haue full possession of whatsoever hath bene detain-

That no Clergie-man, or any other, shall demand any ground which is employed for the fortification and reparation of Townes and places, but when they shall be ruined by the Kings Decree. That they of the Religion may liue in all the townes and places of the Realme without feare, vexation or molestation, nor be forced to do any thing in matter of Religion contrary to their consciences. That Noblemen and Gentlemen hauing high iustice, may haue the exercise of the reformed religion in their houses. That they may continue the exercise of the religion in all townes & places where it had been publickly vsed in the years 1596 and 97. That they might not vse the exercise of the reformed Religion, but in such places as were allowed by this present Edict. It was also forbidden in Court, or beyond the mountains, within the Citie of Paris, or within five leagues thereof: notwithstanding they which dwelt there, should not be molested in their houses, nor forced to do any thing contrary to their consciences, carrying themselves modestly according to this Edict. That they should not haue any publicke exercise of the Religion in any army, but in those quarters where the chiefe Commanders were of that profession; except that where the King should be lodged. That they might build houses for the exercise of the religion, in all Townes and places which were granted them. That all Preachers and Readers should carry themselves modestly, and not speake any thing which might tend to sedition. All men of what quality soeuer were forbidden to take any children by force, and against the will of their parents, to haue them baptised or confirmed in the contrary religion. That they of the reformed Religion should not be molested for any aburition, promises or oaths which they had formerly made. That they should be bound to obserue the Feasts appointed by the Romish Church, and not worke vpon those daies, nor sell or detaile any thing in open shops. That no bookes concerning the reformed religion should be printed or sold, but in those townes where the exercise thereof was allowed. That there should be no distinction in regard of religion to receiue Schollers into Vniuersities, Colledges, and Schooles, and the poore into Hospitalls. That they should be bound to obserue the lawes of the Romish Church, touching marriages in degrees of consanguinity and affinity. That they of the reformed religion shall be forced by all due means, to pay their Tythes to Clergie-men, or any other to whom they shall belong, according to the custome of the place. That excommunications or deprivationes made in hatred of religion should be void. That all they which made profession of the reformed Religion, should be capable to exercise all estates, dignities, offices, and publicke charges, and be indifferently admitted vnto them. That they should haue prouision made in all townes and places of the Realme for the interring of their dead. That the Kings officers should foresee there should be no scandall committed at the same, and should bee bound within fifteene daies (vpon request) to provide them sufficient place for their burials, and not to exact any thing for the conduct of their dead, vpon paine of concussion. That there should be a Chamber erected in the Cour of Parliament at Paris, consisting of one President, and sixteene Councillors, and called the Chamber of the Edict, which should not onely take knowledge of the causes and suits of them of the reformed religion, which shall bee within the iurisdiction of the said Court, but also in the limits of the Parliaments of Normandie, and Britany, vntill there should be a Chamber erected in either of them. That there should be two Chambers erected for the Parliaments of Grenoble and Bourdeaux, as there was at Castres for that of Thoulouze: and for the reception and entertainment of all the Presidents and Councillors of the Religion, which were to be admitted vpon these new erections, there was prouisions made at large by the Edict.

All Sentences, Iudgments, Seizures, Sales and Decrees made against them of the reformed religion, aliu or dead, since the death of King Henry the second, by reason of the said Religion, were reuoked and disannulled, and to be taken out of the Registers of all Courts, and the marks and monuments of the said executions against their persons, memory and posterity to be defaced and taken away: And generally he reuoked all proceedings and informations made for enterprises pretended to bee treason, ordaining that they of the same Religion, and others which had followed their party, and their heires, should returne into the actual and reall possession of all their goods. That all proceedings, Iudgments and Decrees giuen during the troubles, against them of the Religion

That all sentenced giuen in Courts of Parliaments in matters whereof the knowledge did belong to the Chambers, appointed by the Edict, since the year one thousand five hundred seuen tyen, in the which the parties haue not proceeded willingly, shall bee void and of no force. In all enquiries for any ciuill cause, if the Inquisitor were a Catholike, the party should be bound to chuse an assistant of the reformed religion, and the like should be practised if the Inquisitor were of the reformed Religion. All soueraigne Courts, and others within the realme, were forbidden to take knowledge of any causes belonging to them of the religion, the which by the Edict, are referred to the said Chambers, if the reuoy be demanded. That all tides, papers, instructions and documents should be restored on either side to them to whom they should belong. That the children of such as had retired themselves out of the realme since the death of King Henry the second, by reason of the religion and troubles, although they were borne out of the realme, should be held for naturall Frenchmen and Denizens, and not be bound to sue for any letters of naturality, vpon condition that they should returne within ten years after this Edict, and liue within the realme. That they of the Religion should also be discharged from all general and prouinciall assemblies held vntill that day, and also of the Councils erected by them throughout the Prouinces, with the orders made in the said assemblies and Councils, touching the maintenance of the war, and generally for al which had beene done, established and ordained by the said assemblies and Councils. That they of the reformed Religion should praisely desist from all practices, negotiations and intelligences, as well within as without the realme; and the said assemblies and Councils made within the Prouinces to be presently dissolved.

That all prizes at Sea during the troubles, and those which had beene made at land vpon the contrary party, should remaine suppressed vnder the benefit of the Edi& and for the which there should be no publike made. That they of the reformed Religion should not be called in question for any opposition they had made since the troubles, so the execution of any decrees, made for the reestablishment of the Romish religion in diuers parts of the Realme. That all execrable acts should bee exempted out of the general pardon, as the forcing of Virgins and Virgins, burnings, murders, and rebellions; done by attachment, and not in the public manner, and such like. That crimes committed betwene persons of the same partie, should be punished, if they were not in the commanded by the heads of either party, according to necessity, and the order of the war: And that all exactions of money, carrying of armes, and other exploits of warre done by private authority, should bee prosecuted by course of law. That Townes demanded during the troubles, might be repaired at the Inhabitants charges. That all Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others of what quality soever, of the reformed religion, and others which had followed that partie, should effectually enjoy all their goods, rights, honours, and actions, declaring all judgments made to the contrary to be void and of no force.

That all purchases made by them of the reformed religion, by any other authority then from the deceased Kings, his predeceffors, of land belonging to the Church should be of no force: and that the said Clergie-men should presently enjoy the actual possession of the said lands so alienated, and not be bound to yeeld any value for the same.

That all former Edicts, secret Articles, Letters, Declarations, Decrees, and Records made heretofore by himselfe, and the Kings his predeceffors, concerning matters of religion, and the troubles past, should be void and of no force, expressly declaring, That this Edict should be inuiolably kept and observed by all his Officers and Subjects, notwithstanding any thing which might seeme contrary.

And for the better assurance of the obseruation thereof, his pleasure was, That all Gouernours and Lieutenants of Provinces, with other inferior Magistrates and Iudges, should sweare to cause it to be kept and observed, every one in his iurisdiction: and that they should cause the chiefe Inhabitants of their Townes, to sweare the obseruation thereof, presently after the publication.

This was the substance of the Edict of Nantes, containing ninety two Articles, besides some other which were secret.

And for the resolution of many other difficulties, for the chiefe government of them of this Religion, by the which many things were granted, whereof it is not lawfull for subjects to demand the reason, being most certaine that the Prince doth not any thing but for the good of his people. It sufficeth that they know it which deserve to know it. But the more the secrets of an Estat: are lookt into, the more carefully they are to be concealed. This Edict which heretofore hath bene the cause of ciuill dissensions, is now the true ciment of peace, the which shall poure forth from all parts streams of heavenly blessings. But as it is made for publike and generall respects, so must it haue priuate effects, in smothering all seeds of partialities and factions: and that we may finde among the French, that which the Emperour Maximine desired vnto the Romans, a forgetfulness of things past, and assurance of loue to come.

The Edict was made at Nants in April 1598, but it was not verified by the Court of Parliament at Paris, vntill February the yeare following.

The Edict was sent, by the care and diligence of the Kings Attorney General, vnto all the Bayliuicks depending vpon Paris: and yet his Maiesty had deputed in euery Province, certaine Commissioners for the execution thereof. The exercise of the Catholike Religion was restored in Rochell, and in aboue a hundred walled Towns, and a thousand Parishes and Monasteries, where the said exercise had bene interdicted aboue fiftene yeares: and in Beame for the space of one and thirty yeares.

This yeare death stricke a great stroke among men and women, who shewed their generous resolutions against the feare and terrors thereof. Peter de Pinac the last of that name, Primate of France, Archbishop and Earle of Lions, died in the beginning of January: whose life was so famous, as it deserves to bee briefly set downe in this History. The reputation which he had gotten at the Estates at Blois, made King Henry the third his great Prince, as well in ludging as in recompensing of good wits: to call him to his Council, after the death of Morlus Bishop of Valentia: whereas he shewed himselfe to be of that judgment, as he was in short time employed in the greatest affaires in Council. At that time the Court was in a manner all Gascon, there was no entry into the Kings iadours, nor bounty, but at the Duke of Elpermons pleasure, who was the Hephestion of that Alexander. Peter de Pinac heart could not submitt it selfe to that of John Bala of Nogaret, he was too much his owne to be any others mans: and the thought, that if he must needs serue, it was enough to be the Masters, and not to submitt himselfe to the will of the seruant.

A He did not affect the tedious serpnide of the Court, nor did much care for that forced kinde of life. Writing vnto his friends, long before the trouble of the League, he said: That amidst the greatnesse and honour of charges, wherein the King did employ him, he did not leaue to desire the content of a happy retire. But things fall out contrary to what he expected. The League burst forth in Champagne. The King sent him to pacifie the Duke of Guise. In this negotiation he had a quartell with Espermon vpon certaine words which blemished both their honours. He had written a Poeme against the Mignons, wherewith the King was offended, commanding him to leaue the Court: so as he retired himselfe to his owne house, after the treaty of peace made at Nemours. But as the Kings blowes were but threats, so knowing well that this Prelate was not so stolidely in a corner of the Realme, and that this great deligne of the League (like vnto a deluge of snow) did encrease in many rownes, whereas the Kings obedience was grown cold, and that the Princes enemies to this Crowne, prepared to gather the Flower-de-Luce, he neuer ceased vntill he had called him againe to Court.

This returne was the beginning of his miserie. Many others before him hauing fallen into disgrace with the Prince, haue not bene raised againe but for a greater fall. It is scene in the Courts of all Princes, such Tragedies are viall. Hee was presently called to the helme of affaires, and was followed and respected more then any other Noble man in Court. But as we may not iudge of the day by the morning, nor of the felicity of man by the good daies of his life, this happinesse was but the entry to misfortune, which did attend him. He embarked himselfe in the same Ship with the Duke of Guise, the which being broken at the Estates of Blois, he had no other meanes to saue himselfe but through the fauour of the Baron of Lux his Nephew. He was giuen in ransom to Gast, who kept him seuen or eight moneths in the Castle of Amboise, and then set him at liberty for thirty thousand Crownes. He went to the Duke of Maine, and seeing that the affaires of his party tended too much to confusion, and to a popular government, he perswaded him alwaies to retaine the forme of a Monarchy, to the end he might oppose a kinde of Royalty against the King, and not be blamed to haue broken the bonds of the Estate. So through this aduice, they made Officers of the Crowne, and gaue him the D Seales. He neuer engaged himselfe vpon the promises of Spaine, but said alwaies, that he was a true hearted Frenchman.

The faction of Spaine knowing him to be such, hindred Pope Sixtus the fifth from giuing him a Cardinalls-hat: and they disuaded Clement the eight, who had said, That at the first promotion he would remember his merits. He requited them well: when as the Spaniards came to Paris to propound the Coronation and mariage of the Infanta Isabella of Spaine, letting them know that the Flower-de-Luce could not split. He returned to Lions, leauing the Duke of Mayenne, intending to settle his affaires, and to accommodate himselfe with the peace and generall good of the Realme. At his returne grew that tumult against the D. of Nemours, the which he fled ill, for his wildestone did not second the occasion. Great vnderstanding failes sometimes in the perfection of judgment and discourse. He saw himselfe forced to depart the City, and neuer to returne againe, vntill the King made his first entry. The King (who had shewed effects of his bounty and clemency to his greatest enemies) could not loue him, hauing this impression in his soule, that he was the onely instrument to crosse his fortunes. Speaking one day of the peace of Nemours, in the yeare 1586, he said vnto him, That in that negotiation he had giuen good testimony that he loued him not, and that he had done him bad service. "My Liege (answered he) I could not doe better for the seruice of the King my Master: I had done otherwise if I had bene your seruant, as I am now. When as the Duke of Elpermon returning out of Prouence, went to visit him at his Palace, amongst other speeches of the remembrance of things past, he said vnto him, That he did not thinke there was any one in France whose Fortunes had bene so crosse as theirs: the Archbishop answered him, As for mine, it was neuer crosse but by you. After the reduction of the City of Lions to the Kings obedience, this great spirit borne to adon, grew discontented to see himselfe no more in the honour and reputation that he had bene. Hee then resolved to apply his minde onely to the affaires of his charge, to chooseth the time most convenient for the tranquillity of the house vnto hee approached. When as the Duke of Nemours had said his escape vnto

Pierre-anize, he said, that he would not vse his liberty well: he writes vnto his friend A in this manner.

Remember that I haue alwaies said vnto you, that Monsieur de Nemours will find himselfe much entangled with the Spaniards, who haue led Monsieur de Maine into an inextricable Labyrinth, and will bring Monsieur de Nemours vnto a miserable Estate: and I dare in a manner prophesie, That in the end the Duke of Sauoy will finde himselfe deceived as well as the rest. The Spaniards shirte is nearer vnto him then his doublet, and hee will rather seeke to preserve his owne, then to vsurpe an other mans estate for an other.

The King sent for him to the Estates of Roan: but the necessity of his affaires would not suffer him to goe. He said, That he was not fit for this age, and that he was like vnto the Adamant, which serueth not for all seas. In the end of his last yeare, he complained vnto his friends of the shortnesse of his life, saying, That he was not to liue about ten or twelue yeares, when he liued not twelue daies. His Physitians disagreed vpon the cause of his griefe: he had bene long troubled with the Emoroyds, the which had so emptied his body, as there was no blood found in him when he was opened. His lights were much altered. And for that his Physitian said vnto him, that his griefe was the gout, hee replied, Is it possible that any one should die of the gout without a fever? I see well what it is: seeing men vnderstand nothing, wee must haue recourse vnto God. The third day of his sicknesse his body was called to the earth, and his soule to heauen. He withstood C the terrors of death with as great a courage as when it was presented vnto him at the Estates of Blois. Foure or five houres before his decease, a Capuchin came to visit him and to comfort him, exhorting him to free this last passage courageously, and to let him know that the issue of this life is equall. Death disrobing man of his titles and dignities, as Stage-players doe their attire: he called him simply by his name: when as hee vnderstood this new manner of complement, and that they called him Peter de Pinac without any other ceremony, he lifted vp his head and eyes, to say vnto him that spake, What art thou? They found that this speech did somewhat amaze him, and that he did take it as a watch-word of his departure, which was about midnight.

The D. of Biron did see him in his sicknesse, and assisted at his Funerall. No man liuing did better iudge of the nature of men by the consideration of their vilages: he did diuine of the Marshall Birons fortune by his countenance, and the proportion of his visage, for hauing considered it somewhat curiously, he said vnto his sister after his departure: He hath the worst Physiognomy that euer I obserued in my life, as of a man that would perish miserably.

The Archbishop of Lions had profited so little by the troubles, as had he liued longer, necessity had forced him to feele great discommodities: his Sisters estate was engaged, the fruits of his benefices were seized on, and yet his table was as sumptuous as in the best daies of his prosperity. The Leagues had cost him fifty thousand crowens, the Doubtles of Spaine had left him nothing but Doubles.

Those which haue read the publike actions of this Prelate, may iudge of this doctrine, but no man can represent the grace and force of his action but those which haue seene them. He had in him a concurrence of all things necessary for an eloquent discourse. A grave pleasing countenance, a goodly personage, a facility of words, and an action that did charme his Auditors. The Duke Ioyeuse Marshall of France, being at Paris in March, hauing heard father Laurence Sermons in Saint Germain L'Auxeroise, being moued in confidence, after that he had taken his leaue of the Ladies and some other friends, he returned againe to the Capuchins: where being receiued by the fathers he did a hard penance, and submitted himselfe to all the duties of a religious man. All men were amazed to see him returne the second time to his couent, being plunged (in shew) vp to the eares F in the delights of the world: but his confidence tied him to returne by the bond of his vow, perswading him, that it were better not to vow, then not to keepe a vow made freely, without constraint or compulsion in his maiorty. The first motiue of being a Capuchin came into his heart by inspiration, when as the deceased King Henry the 3 went on foot in procession to Chartres to haue issue, if it pleased God. He was then called Earl of Bouchages, he made choise of this order among all others, the better to doe his penance. And the rather, for that hee vnderstood that he was dedicated by his deceased father,

A to be of the Church. When he was first a Nouice, hee applied his study with so great a courage, as he was blamed for his great diligence, wearing the haire continually. Hee had his shoulders all torne with wounds.

In this Estate he continued vntill the hottest of the late miserable warre: when as after the death of his father, his younger brother, who was a Knight of Malta, and Grand-Prior of Languedoc was called Duke of Ioyeuse, for the Duke of Ioyeuse, brother-in-law to King Henry the 3 deceased, his eldest brother, who was slaine at the battell of Coutras with Saint Sauueur his youngest brother, died without children, the said Duke of Ioyeuse being acknowledged by them of Tholouse, Narbone & others of the league, B for their head, he made an enterprize vpon the towne of Villemur in Lauragais, where hauing planted the siege, for that it was held by the Royalists, euen as he thought to haue forced the towne, the Lords of Themines, Chambaut and Missillac came to relieue it, who charged him with such aduantage, as they put all this army to rout, so as the said Duke retyring to the passage of a riuer, he was drowned with many others. By this meanes the house of Ioyeuse was reduced to the Cardinall of Ioyeuse his brother and to the Earle of Bouchage a Capuchin (whom then they called father Angelo) the Tholousains and Nobility of their party being much amazed, had recourse vnto the Cardinall, whom they intreated often to take the charge of leading them: the which hee would neuer accept. And in the end, at their instant sute, that in raising his house, hee would succour them by C the meanes of the Earle of Bouchages his brother, who was then more then capable of such a charge: but he was a Capuchin. This difficulty was propounded to the countell of the Diuines, who concluded that by reason of the vrgent necessity they should withdraw him from thence: the which was propounded vnto himselfe, and he refused it. But after that hee layd before him the example of his owne father, who being Grand Prior of Languedoc was yet dispenced withall to marry and to raise his house, the which remained onely in him, and whereof God had approved his blessing by the effect, so many braue Noblemen being borne of that marriage, hee consented to returne vnto the world, vpon two conditions. The one was, that it should be with the consent and leaue of the Generall of the Order. The other by the dispensation of the Holy Sea, and that he might D returne againe when God should send rest to the Church and State. This obtained from the Pope and his Generall father Angelo is againe of the world, and doth all acts of a worldling, of a Captaine and of a souldier, applying himselfe to the humours of the time.

After that hee had pacified many popular seditions in Tholouse, and bene a meanes to reduce it to the Kings obedience, being at Paris, hauing with the Kings good liking and pleasure married his only Daughter to the Duke of Montpensier a Prince of the blood, hee be thought himselfe of his bond contained in his dispence, and went and yielded his obedience vnto the Holy Sea and Order, whereas hee is now one of the chiefe conductors, hauing referred all his domestically affaires to the Cardinall his brother, and to the Duke his sonne-in-law.

E His mothers teares preuailed much for his returne. Shee was more afflicted for this change, then for the death of all her other children, and neuer ceased vntill she had drawn Friar Angelo (for so the still called him) out of the delerets of Egypt, to Mount Caluarie, and that hee had seene him in the habit which hee had left. These bee mighty effects of grace, which reformes that which is deformed, and conformes that which is reformed, confirms that which is conformed, transformes that which is confirmed, and makes the soule to liue more in Heauen, whither it aspires, then in the body, where it breathes. The King went to visit him, and commended his resolution, saying that hee did sometimes thinke to speake vnto him of it: and had done it, but he doubted that hee would mistake his meaning and think hee did to berid of him. Dying one day in a place whereas there F was only his Maiesty & three other Noblemen, hee said vnto them, that in the world there were men of all conditions & qualities to be found, but they should hardly assemble foure so different, and that in these foure whereof he was one, there was a finner conuerted, a Leaguer repented, a Capuchin diuerted, and a Huguenot peruered.

This amazement in Court for the Duke of Ioyeuse, was increased by the sudden death of Schemberg, who was taken with an Apoplexie returning from Conflans, whereas Villeroy had seafed the King and all his Councell. It gaue him no respite to speake French nor Dutch. Warre dying, had left no quarrell in France, but for the Marquise of Salices, which which the King demanded as depending vpon Dauphine, and the Duke of Sauoy fought to vaite it vnto his house, from the which he pretends the Dauphines had wrested it. The difference of this restitution must be determined by the Pope, who was named Arbitrator, by the treaty of Veruins. It is the most important sute that hath bene long time in Rome. The parties send their Ambassadors to Rome, to sue vnto the Arbitrator for Iudgement. President Brulart goes for the King, and the Count d'Arconas for the Duke of Sauoy, and they come to Rome in the beginning of the yeare. In the meane time the Duke beseecheth his Maiesty, that he will giue him leaue to visit him. The King answered, that he would gladly see him: but refusing to accompany his sister when she should goe into Lorraine he should not make any long aboad in any one place during the rest of the winter, and therefore hee desired him that hee would deferre his voyage vnto the spring, thinking that hee should not bee troubled to seeke him any farther, then in the City of Lions, where he meant to be about the same time. They pursue the Arbitrement at Rome: the Arbitrator (the best of good Popes) shewes as great integrity, as the parties did passion.

He was free from all affection that was contrary to Iustice, and would do nothing contrary to his conscience. He was carefully instructed by either party, concerning this controuersie. You may read the whole processe at large in the Originall. The Duke of Sauoy (hauing kept the Marquise of Salusses some yeeres, whilst that France had turned her own armes against her selfe) considered, that so soon as the King should overcome his other affaires, the recovery thereof would not be the last of his enterprises, for the restoration of that to his Crowne. He was therefore one of the first that sought to reconcile himselfe vnto the King: and the first propositions were made by Sebastian Zemet. The King could hardly beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would separate himselfe from the designs and counsels of the King of Spaine (who had alwaies a body of an army in France) being so strictly tied vnto him. He therefore sends to Syluery, his Ambassador in Switzerland, to enter into conference vpon this matter with the Dukes Ambassador there, and to sound his intention. The Duke had sent the Marquis of Aix into Spaine, to know how he should treat with the King. At the same time they surprized a Pacquer coming from Spaine, the which being deciphered, they found the Duke desired to treat in good earnest: for his Ambassador writing from Madril, lent him word, that touching the forme of the accord, for the which he desired to haue counsell, the King of Spaines Ministers would neuer tell it, but with many conditions, and secretly, although it were a thing which they desired, that they might retire their forces, and employ them in Flanders, where as all things went to wracke. That if his Highnesse, whom it did import, could find the means to effect it, he was assured in the end they would find it good, as they had done many other designs, reiected by them in the beginning, and afterwards allowed, according to the successe, many conferences were made concerning this cause, before the peace of Veruins, but nothing could bee concluded. His Holinesse being made Iudge and Arbitrator of all controuersies, betwixt his Maiesty and the Duke, the parties produce all their pretensions. The Ambassador of France demanded restitution of the possession, saying: That it ought to bee iudged before the Propriety, and that the possession of aboue a hundred yeares, should serue for a good title to France, if they had nothing else. The dukes Ambassador answered, That power may giue possession without right, and that his Master had preferred his interest with the possession.

After many difficulties and much dispute, the French that were resident within Rome, gaue it out, that they had pleaded too much: that there was no reason the Pope should overthrow the right of a great King, to please a petty Prince: that they must end this quarrell with the Cannon in the plaines of Piedmont. As these men braued it in words, the others published their reasons in writing, shewing that the rule of the law which will haue the dispossessed restored to his possession, is not practised among Princes, nor for principalities. The French insist vpon the contrary, and vrge an end of this businesse with great vehemency, desiring rather to be presently dispatched, then to languish in the tediousnesse of the remedy. The Spaniards delayed the decision of this processe all they could, holding the dispute more available to them then the resolution, & the disease more profitable then the cure.

The time appointed for the Arbitrement was almost spent in tedious difficulties, as vnto the

A pleading vnto the Pope as to the French. And although hee had no lesse zeale to maintaine concord, then he had shewed affection and care to suppress discord, yet would he gladly haue bene freed of this Iudgment, for the bad effects which hee did apprehend, and whereof the coniectures were easie by the consideration of things past. Hee desired not that the Iudgment which he should pronounce, should giue any cause to the one or the other, to complaine of his Iustice, being troubled what hee should pronounce, for that it was a thing without example, and was dangerous to determine of that which had bene decided. In these two extreames, either to iudge the possession of the Marquise to the King, or to ioyne to the Petitory to content the Duke: hee finds a means to haue the Marquise sequestred into his hands as a Newter, to remaine in deposito, vntill it should be iudged vnto the one or the other. To this end F. Bonauenture Calatagiron, Generall of the Friars, and newly made Patriarch of Constantinople, was sent into France with Roncati the Dukes Secretary: vnto whom the King not onely granted (against the aduice of his Councill) that the Marquise should remaine in deposito in the Popes power, as one who had no pretension nor title vnto it: but also a prolongation of the Arbitrement for two moneths. The Duke was well pleased, that this sequestration should maintaine the hope of his possession. The French desired rather a definitiue sentence, then a sequestration: for although they had no cause to doubt of the Depositors fidelity: yet through too much trust, men do often fall into great inconueniences. The Kings Ambassador freed them of these apprehensions, and managed this Sequestration so politickly, as they found it in better estate, then the Kings Councill did expect. Hee caryed himselfe herein like a man of great Iudgment, neither could he serue his Master meanly, in a subiect of so great import. The Duke grew in some ialousie of Arconas, for that he was a Milanois, beleueing that hee did rather follow the Spaniards intention, then his: whereupon he called him back to Turin, vnder colour to send him into Spaine. Hee that succeeded Arconas in that charge, marched all, receiuing the Instructions that were giuen him too lightly, and delusiuing them too indifferently: for visiting the Cardinals, which he thought did fauour the intentions of the King of Spaine, and the Duke his Master, he drew nothing from them, but that the issue of this businesse would not be as he expected. The rest of the Cardinals which had other designs, blamed the Dukes councill, who had engaged him in the expectation of a Iudgment both doubtfull and of small honor: that the best hee could hope for, was the haue of a great Prince, who would alwaies remember this iniury: and that they had caused him to plead so long for his owne. The French vsed other subtilties, to make them counsell the Duke to breake off the Arbitrement. And for that this engagement in anothers hands, was not pleasing vnto them, they held it little for the reputation of France, to follow such tedious formes by the way of Iustice, seeing there was a more speedy course by the way of armes.

They gaue it out, that the Depository would hold things in that Estate, as when it pleased him he would make it knowne, that the thing engaged belonged vnto himselfe: that he behad good correspondency with the King, and that his intention was to make one of his Nephewes Marquis of Salusses, and Feudatary of France. This feare, or rather indifferency of the Ambassador, imbarqued him so farre in this realousie, as hee holds the Iudge for suspect, and sends to his Master, that hee should dislike of the Depository, as much as of the King. And although the Popes intention was not to bee corrupted, yet hee beleueed it to bee true by the Popes coldnesse, and hee did not onely beleue it, but thinking it a vaine to dissemble it, and treason not to speake it, hee told the Pope. That his Masters Highnesse did expect an assured Iudgment from his Holinesse, to bee maintained in possession of the Marquise, as a thing which he held of his Predecessors, whereof hee had bene spoiled by the violence of the stronger, and had recovered it by the good hap of an occasion. The Pope said vnto him, that hee desired not to leaue these two Princes long in this dispute, nor to breake the course of happinesse which their subiects promised themselves by the continuance of the peace. But the Ambassador, who was transported, added: That if his Holinesse gaue sentence in fauor of his Master, hee should dispose of the thing adjudged, and make thin as hee would of it as any other, to second his intentions, when it should please him, to haue the Marquise for one of his Nephewes. The Pope who marche vprightly being offended at an order so contrary to the integrity of his intention, said vnto the Ambassador, that hee neuer had any such thought, and to free him from all feare, hee would desist from the Iudgement; and A deale no more neither with the Arbitrement nor Sequestration.

All men thought at Rome, that the Arbitrement was broken, and the content for the Sequestration revoked: the French cared not, & the Duke was content that things should passe by other formes then those of the Consistory. The Ambassador of Spaine residing at Rome would not have the duke of Sauoy doe his businesse alone, nor the controversie for the Marquitate of Salusses, to remaine at his disposition: the King his Master was interested therein, it was reasonable he should be the first Mouer of all his motions. Hee therefore intreated the Pope, not to leaue things imperfect, and not to refuse to end a worke so happily begun for the generall good of all Christendome, greatly interested in the concord of two Kings, who could not long continue, if all occasions of warre, that might grow vpon this question for the Marquitate of Salusses, were not taken away. The Duke had already found in many occasions, that the counsels of Spaine were not alwaies put in execution to his content: that he fastened his hopes to a rotten cable, trusting to their resolutions: and that their deccits (though couered with goodly shewes of loue and affection) were so much the more odious vnto him, for that he which deceiues va-der the name of friendship is more to be blamed, then he that is deccieued. He therefore propounded to do his busines without them, and from many great discontents, he tooke a resolution to goe into France: so as from that time he neuer slept quietly, vnill hee was assured of the Kings word.

The Duchesse of Beaufort had alwaies fauored his intentions, and desired to assure her-selfe of such a Prince, who offered vnto her all his meanes to support her fortune, hauing sent vnto her the goodliest Jewell that was in the cabinet of Madam Marguerite his Mother. She also considering, that whatsoeuer is done by men, may be vndone by them again: that Princes fauours are inconstant, and that humane things haue nothing firme nor constant, no more then the Sea; shee willingly gaue eare to the promises which hee made her for the good of her hopes. Hee could not haue found a better sollicitor: but death tooke her away. She parted from Fontainebleau in the beginning of the week before Easter, to come to Paris, and there to passe the feasts. The Diuiners, whom idleness and curiosity entertaines commonly at the Court, said, that a child should hinder her from attaining to that whereunto shee did aspire. Shee had heard something, and in this apprehension, shee tooke her leaue of the King at her departure, as if she had been assured neuer to see him more, recommending her children vnto him, the finishing of her house at Mon-ceaux, and the rewarding of her seruants. This recommendation of her children did chiefly concerne the Duke of Vendosme, whom shee loued deely, and whom shee intended to bring vp in the most perfect imitation of vertue.

Being at Paris, shee went on the Wednesday to S. Anthones Church to heare the Massick; where shee was seized with extreame paines, which neuer left her vnill that life had left her. They killed the Infant in her, and tormented her with such cruell conuulsions, as they drew her mouth to the nape of her necke. Shee was first lodged at Zanetti house, neere Saint Anthones gate: but being fallen into this extremity, shee was carried to the lodging of Madam de Sourd her Aunt, in the cloister of Saint Germain l'Auxerrois, where on the Saturday shee ended her life. Vpon the first aduertisement of her sickness, the King went from Fontainebleau to see her. The Marshall d'Ornano met him, and beseeched him to returne, for that fight could not prolong the life of the sicke, and would but increase his griefe. Presently after attired Belieueur, who brought the newes of her death, into whose Carrosse the King went, to euaporate more at ease his sighes, the which hope of recovery had somewhat restrained. Words are not able to charme such sensible blowes: and it is an error to thinke, that griefe is driven away by exorcismes, that it regards words, or is slayed by discourse. Yet this first violence of the Kings affliction, was calmed by the wife and graue admonitions of this Nepheue, who said, that France had acknowledged him for her Hercules, and as he had bene like vnto him in many labours equally glorious and admirable, so now hee should be vnlike him in that hee did abandon the Argonauts, for the griefe hee had for the death of his whom hee loued.

This death did much trouble the Court, for the sorrow and lamentation which the King made for her. Her beauty and good behaviour had moued the King to loue her, for the long absence of Queen Marguerite (whose place shee was in hope to possesse absolutely)

Absolutely) Shee left him three children: Cesar Monsieur Duke of Vendosme, Alexander Monsieur, who was named Earle of Armagnac, and at this time is appointed Grand Prior of France: and one Daughter. Shee was more lamented of priuate persons, then of the publike, who found her hopes more insupportable then her catiage. Shee offended few, and bound many vnto her. A great personage said: That shee was of such an humor, that seeing the King must needs loue, hee could not loue an obiect, whose loue would be lesse preiudiciall to himselfe, nor to his people, so as shee continued in the first condition of her birth.

This great beauty, neere vnto the which the most esteemed beauties had no light, (as great bodies seeme small in respect of greater) vanished in an instant. This flower against the order of others which last vnto the seuenth day, and sometime twice as long, did wither, dry, and fell downe dead within two or three houres. Shee died too soone for them that had made triall, that her fauour was a step vnto the Kings: many did write vpon her death, which shewed that shee had offended few, & bound many vnto her. Death took her at such time when as those that desire to be reputed faire after their death, should desire to dye, before the failing of their beauty. For when as they dye old, and that there re-maines nothing in the vessell but lees, they remember no more what they haue been, and speake no more of them, but as of a torch which falls to ashes, when as all that intertaineth it is molten and consumed: or as flowers which the more pleasing, liuely, and well growing they be, displease and stinke the more, when they are gathered, withered, and haue lost their colour. Shee was one of the three beauties, which being seene together, they said of the first, that shee was faire: of the other, that shee had bene: and of the younger, that shee would be.

The Duke of Sauoy was much grieved for her death. But as Domestically afflictions, which chance to Princes, although they be separated from the publike, are not lesse feeling and violent; his griefe to see his affaires so crost on all sides, was augmented by the death of D. Philippin his bastard brother, whom Creguy slue in combat: It is a great paine to purchase honor, a greater to preferre it, but greatest of all to recouer it when it is lost.
Speaking of honour, I meane the reputation of goodly and virtuous actions, whereof honour is the recompence, and the sweetest nourishment. Of those things which doe blemish the lustre of honour, the first and most base is, to speake or doe any thing for feare of death. The second is, to endure and suffer a word of contempt, injury or affront. The third is a lye: This rigorous obseruation of the point of Honour, doth now countenance a Combat, as memorable for the condition of the persons, the forme and circumstance of the combat, and the cause of the quarrell, or any other of this age. Quarrels haue not alwaies reasonable grounds: this had nothing but desptight, which D. Phi-lippin had conceived, being told him that Creguy had wanted hee had gotten his carcase, at the taking of the little Fort, built by the Duke of Sauoy, neere vnto Chamouffet, to fa-uour the passage of his army. D. Philippin some moneths after, thinking that this was

E spoken to the preiudice of his honour, sent him a Challenge. Creguy comes to the place appointed by the appeale; but the appellat was kept backe by the Dukes commandement. The Earle of Brandix (who seemed alse to haue a desire to fight) sent word to Des Digueires General of the army, that if hee had any minde to see the combat betwixt
D. Philippin and Creguy his sonne-in-law, hee should not returne without his part of the sport, but hee should find one to exchange a thrust with him. Hereupon Creguy was taken prisoner going to succour Charbonniers. During his imprisonment the quarrell grew that point, as if he had bene at liberty, it had bene ended at Turin. After that the Treaty of peace had sent him home into Dauphine, D. Philippin sent to challenge him at Grenoble, and they met neere vnto the Fort at Barrault, where the appellat was F thrust through the thigh. This combat, which had bene sufficient to haue ended this quarrell, was the cause of another, for it was told the Duke, that Creguy had wanted, that hee had of the blood of Sauoy. Wherewith hee was offended, and gaue D. Philippin to vnderstand, that he would esteeme him no more as hee had done, nor euer see him more, if hee were not auenged of those words. Whereupon, another challenge was sent, the which was accepted as cheerfully as the first.

fight in Dauphine: that the example of the Gouvernours son-in-law should not draw others to the contempt of the Law. It was therefore resolved, that they should fight in the Duke of Sauoy's Country, vnder S. Andrew, a place belonging vnto the Countesse of Antrémont, vpon the banke of the riuer of Rhofne, on foot, and in their shirts, which is the most resolute kind of combat. That they should fight with Rapier and Dagger: That the Baron of Attignac should second D. Philippin, and la Buiffe should second Creguy. That none but they should come into the field, and they should not part the combatants, vntill that one of their deaths had ended the combat. That there should be 12 Gentlemen on Dauphine side, and as many on that of Sauoy, who should be ready to receive the body of the vanquished, or to resist any violence that should be offered vnto the victor. That the 12 of Sauoy should be so farre from the place of combat, as they of Dauphine might passe the water, and come at the same instant to the place of fight. It was long disputed whether the Seconds should fight: for la Buiffe said, that he would not be one, vnlesse he might giue or take, and that he which goes in such actions to be a simple spectator, wants affection or courage. But the Combatants thought it good that the Seconds should not meddle with the decision of their fortunes.

The day appointed being come, all came vnto the place. De Morges passed the Rhofne, and scoured vp and downe the fields, to see if there were no ambush nor greater assembly then was set downe in the Accord. The Seconds visited the armes of the two Champions, and searched them, if they had any Charmes or Enchantments about them. La Buiffe did importune D. Philippin much to part, saying, that he had a desire either to drue it off till night, or to defer the triall till the next day. He told D. Philippin by the way, all the braueries he could of Creguy's valor, to the end he might dant him: and seeing Creguy a far off in the meadow, he cryed vnto him, he is ours: but Philippin carying an eye without trouble, and a heart without feare, said vnto him: why haue you so bad an opinion of me? Not so, replied La Buiffe, I know you are braue and generous, but you haue to doe with one of the most furious men at armes in France, and that makes me foretell your losse. La Buiffe forgot nothing in this action, that might shew the office of a friend. And it is well known, that if Creguy had not returned, la Buiffe would haue stayed to haue slaine D. Philippin and D' Attignac, or to haue bene slaine by them. Du Belier his brother, knowing his humor, and that hee had too much courage and honour, to returne without his friend, was vpon the banke of Rhofne, attending the issue of the combat, meaning to passe through the riuer on horse back, and to haue had his part of the glory or perill of this action. When as D. Philippin entred the field, he had his iudgment so cleare, as obseruing his enemies guard, and the aduantage which he had, turning his backe to the Sun, hee said Monsieur de la Buiffe diuide the Sunne: and seeking himselfe to make the partition, he thrust at Creguy with such violence, as the lookers on doubted of the issue of the combat, seeing him still in his danger. This first fury did but thrust Creguy out of the meadow, and Philippin out of breath. Creguy being resolved to thrust, not according vnto the iudgment of choller, but of occasion, attended vntill this fury were past, thrusting him into the body with such force, as he ouerthrew him, and nayled him to the ground. He then willed him to take his life of him: but he was not in case to humble himselfe to that demand, neither was it in Creguy's power to giue it him: for his wounds were mortall, and all those that were of this side cryed to him: Dispatch him; neither did Attignac's request preuaile any thing. Creguy repayed the Rhofne with the twelue Gentlemen which came to fetch him, leaving D. Philippin vpon the place. The Duke repented of the commandement which hee had giuen, or it may be his religion (by the aduice of his Confessor) counselled him to reuoke a commandement, in the execution whereof there was hazard of two liues, and the losse of two soules. He sent a post to forbid them to fight, but hee arriued two houres too late. Creguy thanked God for his victorie, and would not suffer his friends to vse their accustomed congratulations, intreating them to speake no more of it, although the glory were great, to haue vanquished his enemy in a forsaigne Country. D. Philippin was caryed to his lodging. The Religious of Pierre-Chastell refused to bury him according to the holy Constitutions of the Church-gouernment, which holds them that dye in this sort desperate, and murderers of themselves, and makes the paine to continue after death, that the shame which followes them to the graue, might diuert them from this liberty.

As the Kings enemies at Rome laboured that he could haue no reason of the Marquise of Saluiss, so there wanted no practices to hinder his affaires in Suifferland. It is a long time since the King of Spain discouered his ieaousie for the generall alliance of the crown of France with the thirteene Cantons, hauing long practised to haue his share. Our Kings hauing alwayes hindred it, he could neuer get any footing there, as King of Spaine, but hee hath had an hereditary alliance for the reuenues of the House of Austria. So in the reigne of King Charles the ninth, when as the King of Spaine demanded to bee receiued into alliance, Belieure Ambassador of France, seeing the Catholike Cantons almost perswaded to prefer new amities before ancient, laid before them the great succors they had receiued of the Crowne of France for the setting of their libertie: whereas contrariwise the House of Austria had done all they could to suppress them. That they should be wary, not to trust in the alliance of a House offended, in the which the wounded did yet bleed, by the death of three Princes defeated by their armes. That hee was not ignorant, that the K. of Spain, as descended from the House of Austria, had hereditary delignes vpon them, by reason whereof, the greatness and prosperity of his affaires should bee suspect vnto them: for as we ought neuer to feare nor suspect the prosperity of friends, so must we alwayes doubt that of enemies. These admonitions were of such force, as for that time the Ambassadors of Spaine returned as they came.

But since the troubles of the last ciuill warre in France, the King found himselfe charged with so many affaires within the Realme, as he could not possibly prouide for all abroad. His owne subjects did so trouble him, as he could not answer the hopes of his allies. This was a goodly occasion for the King of Spaine to worke his will with the Suiffes, and to winne the game, seeing that no man played against him. And as mercenary friendship vaniseth, when as money failes, the French Crownes appearing no more in Suiffe, the enemy caught his ducats to be dispersed among the petty Cantons, so as they choaked all the first seedes of the Flower-de-luce. Then might you see in France, Suiffes against Suiffes, and Cantons against Cantons, the one shewing their duties vnto the King as his allies, the other armed against his seruice, as hirings to the King of Spaine. When as they see that they were not payed their pensions, and that their Captaines and Colonels receiued no thing of that which was due vnto them, the free petty Cantons tyed themselves more straitly to the King of Spaine: and Colonell Pflister, who had great credit among them, taught them not to cast their eyes but vpon the Sonne which riseth at the Indies. The greater Cantons continued still firme in the Kings friendship. The wildome of Brulart shewed it selfe in this bad season, as good Pilots are best knowne in the greatest tempests: for hee entertained the Kings seruice beyond all hope, in the greatest of his troubles, when as the King had for his Scepter a Lance, for his Loure a Tent, and for his credit, hope, and the lawfull right of a Kingdome. It may iustly be sayd, that he did great seruice to France in this charge, and the wisest haue wondered, how he could maintaine the affections of this people, when they were entertained onely with the words of his wisdom, and how he could so long continue this hope amidst the common despoire of the affaires of France.

But when as the Suiffes did see that all France was reduced vnder the Kings obedience, their patience was turned into complaints, and they gaue it out, that if they had not effects for words, wherewith they had bene fed so long, as they law the King could giue them nothing else, they had courage enough to come and demand it themselves. During the siege of Amiens, there was a Captaine of one of the petty Cantons, who desiring to make his profit of the time, and of the extremity of the Kings affaires, proposedd the bold counsell to get their pay.

The Realme was yet so full of trechery, the King so full of fear of his subjects, the forces of Spaine so great, and so farre entred into France, as if they had done what he propounded, our Caesar had not sent them backe with so good a composition as in former times he had done what he could to giue them money. The Court of Parliament had confirmed certaine Edicts, the profit whereof was appointed to content them: as that of reuision of the Registers to the Reuenues, that of the sealing of Lether, and the Companies of handicraftsmen. Whilest that the Captaines and Colonels laboured for the execution, the Ambassador entertained the rest with good words and great hopes, which serued much to temper the impatience of the most violent, and the languishing wearied of Artois.

dants. He imparted vnto them the Kings counsels for the re-establishment of his affaires, A and the payment of that which was due vnto them.

The King sent them money : but as there was not so much as they expected, and that the greatest part was appointed for such as had served in the last occasions : so it did but increase their discontents and complaints of the rest; so as in the beginning of this year, Montaigne the Kings Ambassador left his charge to come into France. Such as thought to make their profit of this retreat, gave it out, that it was forced : but it was freely of himselfe, who thought it expedient for the Kings affaires to make offer of this voyage, and to charge himselfe with their demands : but the Suisses stayed nor long to demand his returne, after the which he died, and was solemnly buried at Solleur in a rich tombe. B The King doth husband the peace well. He employs all his thoughts for the profit of his subjects, to restore them to those commodities whereof war had deprived them. And therefore considering that a great multitude of his people remained vnprofitable, for that they were not employed in trades and occupations most necessary for trafficke : for that the workes which should be made within the Realme by Frenchmen, were bought and sold by strangers, namely, silkes, and cloth of gold and silver : hee did therefore forbid by an Edict, the entry into his Realme of all Ruffes, made of silke, gold, or silver, pure or mixt, vpon paine of confiscation : to the end the French might be employed in the making of all those merchandizes which were forbidden to be brought in.

As the Merchants of Tours did sollicite these prohibitions, so they of Lions made great C suite to hinder it. They alleged, that prohibiting the entry of Merchandize made by hand, they must of necessity be made in France, the which being well planted, would yield sufficient commodity to nourish 500000 Frenchmen, and the gold and silver which goes out of the Realme in specie, in great abundance, should continue there still. Those of Lions did shew, that this prohibition made the King to lose halfe of his Custome at Lions : that it would ruine the Payres, and this ruine would draw after it the ruine of the City, the which had bene built for the commerce and trafficke of all Europe, and was neuer seene more flourishing then since strangers frequented it, by means whereof, it did for a time so abound with money, as our Kings have found great succours in the necessity of their affaires, and sometimes were indebted six or seven millions of gold, as well to the inhabitants, as to Merchant strangers. That the whole State was interested in her preservation, being out of the bulwarks of the weakest part, and lying open to the enterprises of his enemies. That many strangers, being ready since the peace, to come and make their bank at Lyons, were held back vpon the brute of the prohibition of strange wares, and if the citie should continue dis-inhabited of Merchants of that quality, it would be dangerous to leave it in the hands of poore Artisans, who are insolent in the time of peace; impatient in troubles, and alwayes desirous of innovation; having nothing more vs leading vnto them then the present. Norwithstanding all these reasons, the King would have the Edict passe, and the Duchesse of Beaufort was greatly affected to it. The deceased King would have done it, and it was found reasonable by his Council : but in the end, time didles him know, that it was no time to vse such prohibitions, and that before they hinder the entry of foreign Ruffes made of silke, they must haue wherewithall to make it within the Realme. And therefore this Edict was reuoked at the Quenes entry into Lions.

This year there was a notable imposture, which ministred matter of discourse to the Kings Council, to Preachers in their Pulpits, and to the Court of Parliament. A young Maid of Romorantin, named Martha Brosier, having curiously read ouer the Discouerie of the deuil of Leaon, she was so transported with the imagination of that which theread, as imitating the motions of her folly, she seemed to haue the fits and passions of one that were possessed with the deuil, although nothing be so hard to counterfeit as the deuil. James Brosier her father, a man of himselfe busie and factious, desirous of new things, ha- F ving observed in his daughter furious motions, with such a stupidity and feare, as it did moue commiseration and dread in the most resolute and feare in the weaker, hee seemed to beleue that which he would haue the people beleue; who came running to see this new deuil, publishing euery where, that his daughter was possessed with an euill spirit. He presented her to the Theologall of Orleans, who beleued something; & seeing that this designe grew into credit, he led her to the most famous place of all the Dioceffe for deuotion : so all the people beleued certainly that she was possessed : which must be verified by the

A the iudgement of the Church. But the Bishop of Angiers, a graue and wise man, disco- uered her to be a counterfeit, and sent her away, threatening to punish her, if she returned into his Dioceffe. The Official of Orleans did also find out her imposture, forbidding the Clergy of the Dioceffe to exorcise her, vpon paine of suspension. After that shee had runne fiftene moneths vp and downe the Country, and being growne perfect in her counterfeit trickes and deuillish motions, her father thinking shee knew enough, and that it was now time to present her vpon the great Theater of France, he conducts her to Paris, and leads her to all the Churches to gather almes : the people cry out presently to haue the deuil consured, holding it an impiety to suffer one of Gods creatures to be so tyrannically tormented by the Deuill. The Bishop assembles the learnedst Diuines and Physitians of the Vniuersity of Paris, to haue their aduice about the consuring of this deuil: the Physitians say plainly, that it was but counterfeit. A Capuchin grieued to see the incredulity of the Physitians, said with some passion, if any one beleene not : if he will but stay her, the deuil will carry him away. Marcesot fearing not to be carried away by this kind of de- uill, answered, that he would abide the hazard : and setting his knee vpon Martha's breast, and his hand to her necke, he commanded her to be quiet, whereupon she stirred not, say- ing, that her deuil was gone.

The Court of Parliament seeing that all the people did runne after Martha, and fear- ing that superstition (which goes before, and is alwayes the fore-runner of impiety) C should diuide their opinions and affections, and cause some dangerous sedition, they com- manded that Martha should be deliuered into the hands of the Lieutenant Criminal. The Clergy said, that those that were possessed, did not belong vnto the temporall iurisdiction, and that the Church had power to iudge thereof. Yet she is committed to prison. They haue recourse vnto the King, who commands that the Parliament be obeyed. So as by a decree of the great Chamber, and the Tournelle, the Lieutenant of the short Robe was in- ioyned to conduct Martha with her sisters, and James Brosier his father to Romorantin, forbidding her to depart out of the towne, without leaue from the Iudge of the place. And so the deuil was condemned by a sentence.

Another deuil possessed the soule of a miserable wretch, who made an execrable attempt D against the Kings person. A Capuchin of Milan, called Father Honorio, gaue intelligence thereof, and the party that was described in his letter, was found and apprehended at Pa- ris. The King did thanke this good religious man by expresse Letters, and did witness by his Ambassador resident at Rome, that he would preferre the remembrance of so good a turne, to make it knowne vnto all his Order, that he had bound him vnto him. God would not call a Prince so necessary for the earth, so soone into heauen, before hee had settled his people in that rest which their long paines and calamities had deferred. It was the Kings only care to settle euery thing in his order, with the aduice of the Princes of his House, and the Lords of his Council. They found that the subjects could not fully enjoy the benefit of the peace, nor be eased of their charges, so long as the Crowne was indebted, E and that that which should serue to maintaine his royall Estate, was not sufficient to pay the rents and pensions, which amounted to two millions of gold: the fees of Officers came to eightene thousand crownes, and many other charges, which were not discharged for lesse. This extreme necessity made them to seeke out many rights and duties belonging to the crowne, the which had bene morgaged and aliened during the last troubles, which suffered all that could not be amended.

This was most apparent in Languedoc, whither the King sent de Maiffe, one of his Council of State, and Refuge a Councillor of the Court of Parliament of Paris. And al- though it be a hard thing to draw a multitude compounded of mutinies and factions vnto reason, yet through their persuasions, the country did grant vnto the King the summe of F two hundred thousand crownes, to be paid in foure yeares, with an increase of the Ga- belle or Custome vpon Salt vnto two Crownes, which came to fifty thousand crownes a year at least, more then the King received. So as the assured succours from that part, encreased the Kings treasure a hundred and fifty thousand crownes yearly. But it encreased much more by the continuance of the imposition of a Solz vpon the Liver, the only re- medy to supply the Kings affaires, the ground whereof is necessity, which makes that seeme iust which is profitable to the Common-weale. The Commissioners appointed to establish this levy of a Solz vpon the poore French, were not received without opposition, nor executed without murmuring, vsuall in such innouations. There was no towne which found not it selfe ouer-burthened, to few that they were not able to beare any more. This body was growne so weake with this long disafe, as euery little thing, how light soeuer, did seeme to oppresse it. But they complained not alone of this imposition : other Subsidies were the cause of more ordinary grieuances, and grounded vpon more reason. Traffike is one of the Elements of a Realme: when that ceaseth, the subiect feelles it presently: nothing hath so much hurt it, as the augmentation of Customes and Imposts, nothing hath made it so contemptible, as the couetousnesse of such as had the charge to gather it, and no man hath more felt the difcommoditie of it, then the Merchants of Lyons, who complained chiefly, for that they had erected a new Custome-house in the towne of Vienne, B which stayed all Merchandize that came out of the Leuant. These complaints were so common, and so often reiterated to the Gouvernor of Lyons, as hee thought it good to send some one, when as the twelue townes in Dauphine should assemble their Estates, to intreat them to take away this Custome, which made the Merchants to keepe from Lyons, lest they should come neere vnto these Gulphes. The Deputy made an excellent speech vnto the States of the Prouince assembled at Grenoble: The which I haue thought good to insert.

Peace is vniuersally good.

If things (said he) which are vniuersally good, are better and more perfect then those which are good but to some, the good of peace must bee esteemed so much the better, and the more perfect, for that it is common and generall to all men, for that it hath restored to France her soule, and made it a new body. But this good is not so disperfed ouer the whole body, but there remains some members tired, the which during the fainting and generall convulsion, did not feele the mischiefe so violently as at this present. For although the Prouinces be discharged of fouldiers, and that euery one finds both in Towne and Country that order and safety which he desired, yet the liberty of traffike being not restored, and merchandize lesse fauoured in peace, then in the violence of iniustice, and the liberty of warre, this good remains vnperfect, if I may not say vnprofitable. Wherefore the towne of Lyons finding it selfe deprived of the fruits of this peace, by continually lets in the liberty of their traffike, would not let passe the Assembly of your Estates, without coniuring you by the inseparable interest to the good of both Prouinces, to seeke with her D the perfection thereof. She hath giuen you heretofore to vnderstand the increase of this mischiefe, you know the excessse, I am now onely come to intreat you to seeke for the remedy. This mischiefe is the continuation of a Subsidie imposed vpon the riuer of Rhofne, and the passage by land from Vienne. The cause was first the publike good, which since hath degenerated into a priuate interests the effects, the ruine of traffike; the remedy, to obtaine abolition from the King.

This Impost was first erected for the reduction of the Towne of Vienne, and for the considerations which were so much the more iust, because they regarded the Kings seruice, the which precedeth all others, and for the common good of either Prouince. And although the towne of Lyons did then foresee the dangerous consequence of this erection, E with the ruines and difcommodities of the leauy, yet did shee the more willingly consent thereunto, for that she thought the yeares whereunto the continuance thereof was limited, would passe insensibly, and that they should sooner see the end, then any occasion to complaine. Moreouer, the Princes will, being a Soueraigne Law, they could not take that ill which pleased that great King, whose valour exceeds admiration, and admiration surmounts all praise, hauing drawne France out of the bonds of tyranny, as Pursh did Andromeda, and hath in his heriocall actions made vic of his seruants goods to assure them the possession, as Scipio in opening the publike treasures, was the cause they were shut againe.

Timetugments
or diminisheth
euery thing.

But as things which in the beginning seeme sweet and easie, in time grow sharpe and F intolerable: this Impost passing from one extreme to another, is growne a sheefe against the which no man strikes but he suffers shipwracke. It hath had its birth growing like vnto that of the Crocodile, and in few dayes is growne a terror to them that goe by water, and the ruine of Merchants which trauell by land. The yeares of her continuance are past, and now it begins to grow perpetuall, hauing like vnto the ancient customes, her Farmers and Committees, and retaines nothing of the cause of her first institution and ordinance, but the pretext and the apparent semblance.

A The Farmers are so rough and seuerer, in exacting, not that which is ordained, but many times what please them: that as it is the nature of men to loue that which profits them, and to abhorre that which hurts them, the Merchants flee from it as from a sheele, and speake of it as of a snare which strangles them. They cause them to languish whole weekes before they compound for the paiement, and cease not vntill they haue scene the bottome of their packes and purses, so as that which in a lesse corrupted age, and not so couetous as ours is, was giuen rather by way of a gift or present, then of a duty of necessity, in acknowledgement of the publike protection, and the safety of the passage, is now exacted by heretofore vnheard of extortions, and punishable concussion.

B Thus the towne of Lyons sees it selfe bereaued of the benefit and commoditie of trading, in the preservation whereof Dauphine hath a sensible interest, these two Prouinces being like two neighbours which are not diuided but by a gutter which runneth through the midst of the street. And this commerce is the chiefest support of this towne, from whence as from a Spring, which long peace may make perpetuall, flow infinit benefits to all other Prouinces, but most abundantly to her neighbours, wherefore those which haue considered the situation thereof, as in the center of Europe, that for seven leagues crossing the Ocean and Mediterranean seas, impart vnto it all the Merchandize which may be brought from any part which hath bene discovered by man, to distribute them to other Prouinces, they haue reason to call it the Magazin and Store-house of Europe, as Strabo C saith, that it is seated in the midst of Gaule like vnto a Citadell.

But since that the passage of Rhofne hath bene decreed, and that the Merchants had rather aduenture any other hazard then to passe by this iniustice, hauing bene so famous and flourishing, we shall see her become a desert, if the liberty of traffike be not restored. All Merchants that were wont to come from the Leuant to Marseilles, haue abandoned their ancient passage, and sought other longer courses but more safe, as by the Countie of Auignon, Sauiy, Bresse, Geneva, and the Franche Countie, to passe into Germany: and others by Languedoc, Viaretz, Forests, Auvergne, Marignies, to passe by the riuer of Allier, into that of Loire, and from thence to Orleans, and so forward. So as breaking (as they doe) the ordinary course of the Leuant trade, they cut the veins which bring blood D to nourish the body, the which in short time we shall see consumed to skinn and bones, and the calamities so to increase, as besides the griefe, to be no more the eye of Gaule, as Athens was of Greece, she shall haue nothing perfect remaining, but the remembrance of her first felicity, and the cogitation of her by-past flourishing estate.

Wherefore she coniures you to ioyne your prayers and pursuits with hers: to beseech the King to pull this thorne out of the foot of Lyons, and this moat out of the eye of Dauphine: she hopes to obtaine it by the wise resolutions of this Assembly, consisting of men who can iudge of the importance of this petition, and are not ignorant, that as publike buildings are made of the best stuffe, and erected of another forme and fashion then priuate edifices, so publike pursuits for a generality, require different and contrarious resolutions E to those which are necessary and commodious for priuate affaires.

Think not, my masters, that Lyons is so badly instructed in the knowledge of obedience (which is the best and most happy possession of the subiects) that she meanes to contradict the Kings intentions, or to diminish his tributes. She knowes well that in an obedient Estate, whereas the iust commandments of a good Prince make the subiects prompt to obedience, such thoughts are criminall. The burthens which the people beare, although they be grieuous & insupportable, are called holy, & alwayes reputed iust. They are in the Estate as sayles in a ship, not to charge & overload it, but to conduct and assure it. Tributes are the sinewes of an Empire, we must beware that in leauying them it fall not in pieces. But that which we demand doth not preiudice the Kings reuenues, which draweth no F thing from this custome.

Priuate men onely should lose by it, and should learn, that they must not make their profit of publike difcommodities. The interested are such good men, as they will neuer hinder the lesser good from yielding to the greater. They bee Noblemen which haue neuer preferred their priuate considerations before the publike profit: They enter into the Kings Counsell as the Ancients did, into Temples, and whose interest are like vnur Kings, they which haue not one and the selfe same Spring and the same course, and yet in the end, they come into that great sea of publick profit, whereas they lose their name, and haue the same taste and fauour with the same sea. They themselves which haue meanes to find more lawfull assignations to recompence their seruices, will not onely excuse, but commend this pursuit, which informs them of the abuse which is committed vnder the title of the Kings commandements, and they shall see that we haue had the courage not to suffer our selues to be drawne head-long into this feruitude, from the which there is no issue, for that it is a violent preiudice to suffer things which are established, and get footing more by sufferance and permission, then by reason, and that the posterity of Princes is but too constant to maintaine these ruinous inuentions.

The Kings bounty and iustice shall make vs hope well of this pursuit, and beleuee that as he is full of piety and clemency (the true Character of that Soueraigne power of heauen, which hath placed him ouer vs here on earth) so he will not suffer these two Prouinces to be deprived of the fruits which they haue promised vnto themselves, hauing not yet tasted the perfect good of peace, for the purchasing whereof they had as much as any other contributed their goods and affections, and haue not bene the least instruments for the restauration of this Estate.

This discourse full of reason and truth, had not the power to make them of Dauphine redresse the complaints of Lions, but only to beseech his Maiesty to moderate the cause. His affaires would not suffer him to giue that ease, which iustice and his Maiesties clemency desired. Whilest that the Commissioners trauell throughout the Prouinces, about the execution of the Kings Edicts, as well for the good of the peace, as to supply the necessity of his Exchequer, he passeth the greatest heat of Summer at Blois. There the King of Spain gaue him to vnderstand by his Ambassador, that he had great reason to complaine of the French (especially of the Lord La Noue) who against the conditions of the treaty of Veruins, were gone to serue Cont Maurice, and the States of the Low-Countries: and if the publicke faith did not maintaine these reciprocal bonds, the peace would be more iniurious then war, being impossible to auoid the deceits of hostility, of him who shewes himselfe a friend, and is an enemy in effect. The king hauing protested that his intention was to haue the contents of the Treaty truly obserued, he commanded la Noue and all his subiects, to returne home within six weekes, vpon paine of losse of life, forbidding others to goe thither vpon the like penalty. The Archduke sent the Prince of Orange to visit the King, and to giue him intelligence of their arriall into the Low-countries: and Andrew the Cardinal hauing resigned vp his charge, takes his way through France, to see the King.

About this time, the yeare granted for the arbitrement of the Marquise of Salusses, was expired, with the prolongation of three moneths: yet would not the King attempt any thing, but commanded his seruants onely to stand vpon their guards, whilest that hee approached neerer to the D. of Sauoy, to know what he would say. The bruite notwithstanding of an army which the King of Spaine had caused to embarke in Portugal, staid his voyage vntill he might see what way it would take. But this great army which had no reputation but as farre off, and was not knowne by reason of the distance, proved in the end but fine vessels, the which were encountered by the States, and beaten neere vnto Dunkerke. Nothing did hinder the Kings exercises and sports at Blois and Males-herbes, where hee spent his time with the Marquis of Vernueil: in the meane time, his good seruants watched both within and without the Realme, for the good of his affaires: all laboured in diuers actions, but with one will, and to one end, to make the State as flourishing as it had bene, and the Maiesty of the Prince to be respected as it is, sacred and holy. Out of this number of good seruants, and officers of the Crowne, Death tooke away Philip de Hurault, Earle of Chiuerny, and Chancellor of France. He had bene at the first Comptroller of King Henry the thirds house, being Duke of Anjou, and King of Poland, and by him made Keeper of the Seales, in the life of the Cardinal of Birague, and after his death Chancellor, and by him dismissed to his house at the States of Blois, when as the seales were giuen to Monsieur Advocate in the Court of Parliament. In this change he made trall, that Princes officers are in his hands, as Counters be in an Auditors, who rallseth them to the greatest and highest number, and suddenly brings them downe to the lowest. And although it bee not spoken why the King commanded him to retire, yet as soone as they saw him disgraced, the friends of his fortune, and the seruants of his fauours, abandoned him. He continued a while like an old castship which lies in the harbor, & serues to no vse. He returned to his charge, and serued the King stoutly in the most troublesome time of his affaires.

A Afterwards hee had many crosses. There were so great complaints exhibited against him in the Assembly at Roan, as he was in danger to haue lost the keeping of the Seales, or not to haue a Cardinals Hat demanded of the Pope for him. He did not affect the second, and the first he preuented, considering that they could not take away anything, nor diminish his great dignities, but with shame and disgrace.

Pompon de Belieure succeeded him after his death, he restored the Seales (the sacred instruments of Soueraigne Iustice) to their honour. All corrupt practices which made friends to the preiudice of the Common-weale, were banished. There is no other fauour then that of Iustice; no other expedition but in publique, and by order. Nothing is seded extraordinarily but by the Kings expresse commandement, or for the good of his seruice, which may not be deferred vnto the sealing day, and that in the view of all the Officers of the Chancery. Nothing is presented which hath not bene examined and held iust by the Masters of Requests that were present. The King hauing received newes of the Chancellors death, he commanded Villeroy to dispatch his Letters before he demanded the place: which done, he presented himselfe to take his oath betwixt his Maiesties hands, kneeling vpon a cushion of Veluet, the which the Chancellor and Constable onely doe, and no other Officers of the Crowne. His Maiestie would not binde him, but to doe what hee had alwayes done, for the good of his seruice and of his Crowne. To conclude, hee was not preferred to this high dignity before any one that exceeded him in the ranke of seruice, or in merit or experience, hauing vndergone the chiefe charges within the Realme, and happily performed abroad important and weighty Ambassages for the King.

This yeare tooke away some Princeesses in France: amongst others Adamoiselle the onely daughter of the Prince of Conde, the which hee had by his first wife the Princeesse of Neuers, and Marques of Lifle. Her obsequies were made at Saint Germain des Prez with great pompe, as it was fit for a Princeesse of the blood. Lesle de Budos, the Constables wife dyed also (a little before the Duchesse of Beaufort) hauing left one sonne and one daughter, whereby the famous house of Montmorency is renewed, the which was like to fall to the disface. The Marques of Belle-Ile (widow to the Marquis the eldest sonne to the Duke and Marshall of Raiz, a younger daughter of the house of Longueuille, hauing passed five yeares of her widowhood, and brought vp her sonne in all vertue and piety) departed secretly out of Britany; not aduertising any one of her kindred, and went to professe her selfe a Nun, in the Monastery of the Peuillantines at Tholoufa. Her brother and her husbands brethren posted after to diuert her, but she was already in the Couent, and resolute to end her dayes there. A generous resolution of a Lady, issued from that noble house of Longueuille, which holds one of the first places in France: It is Soueraigne of the Countie of Neuf-chastel in Suisse, and allied to the House of Bourbon in diuers branches.

The Commissioners which were employed for the execution of the Edict of pacification, found some difficulties in those places, whereas the Bishops and Pastors of the Catholike Church, had neither Temple nor place of retreat: yet the Masse was restored in those places where it had bene banished fiftene or twenty yeares: and the preaching appointed onely in those places that were allowed by the Edict. They found in all places a true and violent spirit, very hard to be dealt withall, which inuented idle quarrels, when as they wanted iust cause of complaint. The Commissioners exhorted either party as well to concord as to piety, and alwayes to contain their wils within the bounds of obedience, and not of rebellion, and to forget the factious names of Papists and Huguenots, the which hath bene no lesse fatal to France, then those of Guelphes and Gibellins in Italy. They aduised the Preachers to take heed that their discourses were not streames of sedition, as they are sometimes of Eloquence: for they that make profession to teach the Word of God, may doe as much harme in fauouring a Sedition, as they shall gather profit of his Ministry when he shall preach Peace. The Commissioners did admonish the Magistrates and chiefe of Iustice, to prevent the first mooues of Sedition: which getting credit with the people, is the cause of great disorders.

So the Edict was executed throughout the Realme, and the most sad age began to lye loungety together, burying the remembrance of things past. Things done cannot be recalled. We must grow more wise hereafter by the consideration of what is past: we must haue our eyes open, to distinguish the causes from the pretexts, and discover the euill A which is hidden vnder a shew of good, holding for an infallible Maxime, that there is no iust occasion to arme against his Prince, nor to trouble the quiet of his country: wee haue bene so abused, as wee haue taken the maske for the face; slander for innocencie, and falshood for truth: and vnder these false impressions, we haue left an assured peace for a doubtful: we haue beleueed those Empericks of State, who desirous to continue our languishing, and to prolong our diseases, haue said that Principle of truth, that civil war ruines both Estate and Religion, drawn this Proposition: That France cannot liue in peace with two Religions. The which hath cost the liues of those that haue maintained it, and the ruine of others that haue beleueed it. Being then reconciled for that which is past, and well aduised for that which is to come, hauing escaped shipwracke beyond our owne hopes, let vs remaine in the port of this concord, where the King doth guide vs, after so many stormes and tempests, wee shall be there assured. The sea doth no harme to ships that haue good anchors: Obedience is the anchor which doth assure our Ship against the fury of wind and waues. It is that which giues life and motion to all the members of the body: and there is not a more certaine signe of the life of an Estate, then obedience. It is the eye of the body, which liues last, and dies first: it should bee the heart, which liues first, and dies last.

This yeare the Princeesse of Antoinette, daughter to the Duke of Lorraine, was conducted by the Earle of Vaudemont her brother, to the Duke of Iuilliers, who had married her: shee was attended with a goodly traine, and came to Collen, where she was honorably receiued by the Senate: and after some dayes, she went downe to the river to Duisseldorp. The nuptiall ioy was great and flatly, although it were somewhat disturbed by the insolvency of the armies, as well of the States, as of the Admirall. The marriage of Sibille, Sister to the Duke of Iuilliers, and of the Marquis of Bourgondy, brother to Andrew of Austria the Cardinall, caused a peace in the country of Cleues, and all the Spanish pretensions went to smooke.

When as after the death of the Duchesse of Beaufort, they saw the King falling into a new shipwracke, from the which he was lately escaped, and that loue (mourning yet for his first Venus) led him to another, you might heare the sighs of the most modest; the murmuring of the most turbulent, and generally, prelates of some approaching storme. This was the onely droppe of oyle which did pierce through the glorious actions of this Prince: who superiour to all other in courage and valour, and alwayes equal to himselfe, made himselfe subiect to this passion. Truth will not suffer mee to suppress that which cannot be hidden. It is good to conceale that which is doubtfull in his actions that hath no other Iudge but God: but to keepe secret that which is knowne and scene of all men, is a baseness. It imports to know things truly, which not being written, shall passe to posterity according to their passions, which shall begin and continue the tradition. Ancient Histories (as full of simple truth, as void of affectation) haue not concealed the loues of Princes, whose vertues they haue written. Of all the follies of men, there is none more excusable, nor of the which fewer doe excuse themselves, then of loue. All fight vnder this banner. If then it was necessarie for the King to loue, hee could not loue any thing more worthy of his loue. But when as death did see that the lower grew blind in the thing loved, & that this blindness had brought France into confused darkness, he separated them.

Vpon this consideration, the Court of Parliament finding, that there is nothing that doth more preserve France from falling into fore-past miseries, or more assure the present, and continues their prosperities hereafter, then the Kings issue: therefore, they beseeched his Maiesty to marry, and to giue to himselfe a Sonne and a Successour to his Realme, there being no army more powerfull, either by sea or land, to assure an Empire, then many children. La Guesse the Kings Attourney General, made the Speech. He represented vnto his Maiesty, how much he was bound to God. He discovered the publick difficulties of his Estate: shewed the remedies: and in the end let him see, that the enioying of all the felicities which peace, (purchased by his victorious armes) could promise him, was weakly grounded: France was not assured to see it durable, the which depended on the lawfull birth of a Dauphin. That although by the law of State (a sacred and immutable law, and an originarie law of the Crowne) the succession belongs to the nearest kinsman, yet France is too full of those turbulent spirits, which in the calme of peace, watch carefully

A fully for occasions of warre, which in the midst of rest, breathe after troubles: and freed from the perill of armes, hold still (like mad-men) their hearts and their courages armed to moue new contentions another day against the law and order of the Realme: wherof the King himselfe had made such tryall of their bad intentions, as without the vertue of heauen infused into him, his Right had been vanquished by force.

That although his Maiesty by his wifedome, accompanied with a singular bounty and charitable affection to the quiet of his subiects, hath declared his succesor to the Crowne, yet France hath alwayes obserued, that when the Crowne did leape from one branch of a Family vnto another, and that the Sonne did not succeed the Father, it was disputed with new factions, and the fields bathed with the blood of her Citizens, and the fire of ciuill warre so kindled, as two ages was scarce able to quench it.

That to take away these iust feares and apprehensions of these publike calamities, the succession must not change the branch, for where there is no change, there is no stirre, and the children succeeding in the fathers Realme, it seemes that hee that reigned, is rather growne yong againe then changed: there is nothing new, the Crowne continues in the same house, the fathers face is noted in that of his sonne. That the shining of the Sunne is pleasing as a calme sea, or the earth couered with his greene tapistry. But there is nothing so goodly, nor so delightfull to the eye, as the sight of children newly borne in a family that wanted this aduantage. That to attaine vnto this happinesse, they must begin by the dissolution of the marriage betwixt his Maiesty and the Queene, Duchesse of Valois, being no lesse easie then that of Charlemagne with Irmengrade, and Theodora daughter and sister to Didier, King of Lombards, for indispotion and sterility: of Lewis the 7, with Elenor Duchesse of Guienne for some discontentments set downe in the History, and couered with the pretext of Consanguinity: of Lewis the 12, with Isabe of France daughter to K. Lewis the 11 constrained by force, and want of consent.

That they should not be troubled to seek lawfull causes of this dissolution: for besides the want of issue, in the which consists the second end of matrimony, and the preservation of the State, they should not need to inuent the degree of consanguinity, being knowne to all men, that the King and Queene are in the third degree, a blemish which hath alwayes accompanied the marriage since the solemnization thereof, and the which was not taken away by the briefe of Pope Gregory the 13, for that the necessary and essentiall formes were not obserued. After that he had shewed the necessitie and profit of this separation, he beseecheth the King to chooſe his second wife, in a chiefe and Soueraigne Family, and which had bene heretofore honoured with the like happinesse, and to consider that so great a Realme flourishing in Princes and many Noblemen, and ancient houses, cannot easily submit themselves to the command of those which by both sides shall not bee of the blood Royall or Soueraigne, halfe Princes, halfe simple Gentlemen. And if at any time we must respect the distinction of births and races, it must be when as they that come, are born to commande other others.

That they could not giue Heires to a Realme of too worthy a House: and if hee be not equally by the fathers side, yet at the least, that he come nere vnto it: for men being by nature high-minded, doe not willingly submit themselves to them whom they thinke to be inferior to their fathers, vnto whose command they haue bene inured.

The King was well pleased with this discourse, and aduertised Queene Marguerite thereof by L. Angellois, one of the Masters of Requests of his Maiesties household, to vnderstand her resolution touching the nullity of her marriage. Shee (who vpon the like demand during the life of the Duchesse of Beaufort had made refusal for some reasons) returned him answer, that she would deliuer her minde vnto Berthier, Agent for the Clergy, and Intendant of her affaires. The Kings intentions were imparted vnto him, and he sent vnto her, who returned with this answer vnto the King and his Councell: That she desired nothing more then the Kings contentment, and the quiet of the Realme: and withall, she sent a priuate Letter vnto his Maiesty, beseeching him, To grace her with his protection, vnder the shadow whereof she would passe the remainder of her yeares. The said Queene sent a petition vnto the Pope, containing, That her brother King Charles the 9, and the Queene her Mother had married her against her will, so which marriage her heart had neuer consented: That the King and shee being in the third degree of consanguinitie, shee beseecheth his Holinesse to declare the marriage void. The King made the like request. This businesse was managed very seriously by

by the Cardinall of Oſſat, and by the Lord of Sillery, the Kings Ambaſſadour at Rome A (who at the ſame time purſued the Iudgement for the Marquieſſe of Saluces:) they beſeeched his Holineſſe in his Maieſties name: That for that which ſhould concerne the nullity of the ſaid marriage, he deſired no other ſanctur then that of Iuſtice.

This buſines was imparted by the Pope to the Conſistory, and many reaſons ſet down to proue the nullity of the marriage. All the difficulty was, that Pope Clement the eight thought it ſomewhat ſtrange, that he ſhould declare that marriage void, which Pope Gregory the thirteenth had approued, and who by his abſolute authoritie had taken away all lets and hindrances. All which was answered at large. And although it were true, that Queene Marguerite had continued long with the King: yet this cohabitation was alwaies B forced, and the ſame feare which was in the beginning of the marriage, had continued during the life of her brethren, and the Queene her Mother: and the time was to bee regarded ſo long as the ſcare continued: for marriages contracted by force and conſtraint, without conſent are void, and time doth not extinguiſh the nullity, if hee that is forced hath not liberty to doe that freely, which they haue made him to doe by force.

In the end, it was reſolued on in the Conſistory, that a Comiſſion ſhould be granted to certaine Prelates, to take iuſt knowledge of the cauſe vpon the place, and to iudge of the nullity of the ſaid marriage. His Holineſſe ſent his Comiſſion vnto the Cardinall Ioyeuz, to the Biſhop of Modena, his Nuncio in France, and to the Archbiſhop of Arles, C a learned Italian Prelate, and well practiſed in thoſe affaires, who being aſſembled at Paris, after that they had obſerued all ſolemnnities that were requiſite, and cauſed information to be taken of his Maieſties age, hauing viewed the requiſition of the three Eſtates of France, containing the great intereſt they had therein. All being well examined and conſidered, they declared the ſaid marriage void, and ſet the parties at liberty to marry where they pleaſed.

The King ſent d'Alincourt, Gouverneur of Pontoife, and Knight of his Orders, to to thanke the Pope for his good iuſtice: and the Earle of Beaumont to Queene Marguerite, to let her vnderſtand, that the Popes Delegates had giuen vp their ſentence. And ſeeing that God had diſſolved that the bond of their coniunction was diſſolved, the which his diuine Iuſtice had done as well for their particular quiet, as for the publique good of the Realme, he deſired no leſſe to cheriſh and loue her then before, reſolving to haue more care of that which did concern him, then he had had, & to let her vnderſtand, that hereafter he would not be a brother to her onely in name, but he ſhould find effects worthy of the truſt which he had reſoſed in the ſinceritie of his affection. Shee made anſwer vnto the King. That although it were eaſier to receiue comfort for the loſſe of any worldly thing, yet the onely reſpect of the merit of ſo perfect a King and ſo valiant, did by the priuation thereof cut off all conſolation, being the marke of the generoſitie of ſuch a ſpirit, to make her griefe immortal as hers ſhould be, if the fauour which it pleaſed his Maieſtie to doe her by the aſſurance of countenance and protection, did not baniſh it.

At the ſame time ſhee ſtaied the effects of the Kings liberalitie by the encrease of her penſions, liuing happily at Veſſon neere to Auirillac, in the tranquillitie and ſilence of her fortune. This change is no leſſe, but the ſhal be alwaies one of the firſt Princeſſes of Europe. No man can take from her that which Heauen and Nature haue giuen her. It is a Theater, which although it hath been beaten with lightning, is ſtill admired. And to ſpeake the truth without affection or flattery, ſhe her ſelfe hath ruined the greateſt of her fortune, in that the would be what ſhe is.

This marriage is no ſooner diſſolved, but they treat of another. In the bleſſings whereof the French promiſe vnto themſelues the increaſe and continuance of thoſe of Heauen. The great Duke of Tufcany did carefully keep Mary of Medicis his Neece to increaſe the honour of his houſe by ſome great alliance. It was in a ſeaſon when as the Sovereigne houſes of Europe had no daughters ready to marry, or there was ſome diſparity for their Age, or Religion. Great and important conſiderations, which Princes ſhould not paſſe over lightly. It ſeemes that the eternall wiſdome, which concludes the marriages of Princes in Heauen, and bleſſeth them on earth, would not marry this Princeſſe vnto the Emperour, but reſerued her for the good of a greater Empire, not being pleaſed that France ſhould ſeek the meanes to continue the Crowne in the Kings poſterity, any where elſe but at Florence, one of the eyes of Italy, and in the houſe of Medicis, which goeth equally with A with the firſt in Italy. The hiſtory of which houſe you may read at large in the Originall. Cofmo furnamed by Pius the 5, the great Duke of Tufcany, had by Madam Eleanor of Toledo, daughter to the Victroy of Naples, Francis, Ferdinand, Peter, Garcia, Iſabella, and Eleanor. Francis married Ioane of Auſtria, daughter to the Emperour Ferdinand. Of this marriage came two daughters, Eleanor and Mary: the firſt is married to bee D. of Montour, the happineſſe and good fortune of the other is referred to the Queene of France. And the King being now ſet at liberty, ſett all his thoughts vpon her marriage.

The D. of Sauoy had ſent many of his Miniſters into France, to treat vpon the difference for the Marquieſſe of Saluces, without expecting the Popes ſentence. All the voyages B which Jaſcob, the Preſident Rochette, the Marquis of Lullins, the Cheualier Breton and Rencas his Secretary had made, brought him no other fruit then to haue obſcured the State of the Court, pierced a little into the Kings deſignes, the which is alwaies the firſt of an Ambaſſadors inſtructions, & noted the countenance of ſome ſpirits impatient of reſt, and deſirous of change. And although the Patriarke of Conſtantinople had by his perſuaſions drawne more from the King then the Duke of Sauoy hoped for, and made knowne how much a diſcourſe full of affection and perſuaſion may preuaile, there being nothing that doth more ſubtilly ſteale away the opinions of men, then the eloquence of Mercury, yet could he neuer change the reſolution which the King had taken to haue the Marquieſſe againe. He was at Lyons whereas ſickneſſe ſtayed him for a time: the King hauing commanded the Governour of Lyons to lodge him, feaſt him, and ſupply all his wants: Rencas attended vntill he was recovered, to conſult and accompany him according to the order which the Duke had giuen him. But as things went on more ſlowly then hee deſired, hee thought that this purſuit required a greater preſence and action: that hee himſelfe muſt doe his owne Ambaſſage, promiſing more vnto himſelfe by his onely ſhadow, then by all the ſoliciting of ſeruants. Hee therefore prepared himſelfe to goe to the King, although the chiefe of his Council diſſwaded him.

The onely thought of this voyage made him irreconcilable to the King of Spaine, although it had not paſt the reaſmes of a ſimple proſperity, ſo did hee make ſhew to bee deſirous to breake wholly with him: hee had in few great occasions to complaine of his D friendſhip and ſuccours, who did but entertaine his grieſe, and made the cure deſperate. It is good for a Prince to know the humours of many Nations. Hee knew the Spaniards well: their manner of liuing, the ruinous conditions which they lay vpon them whom they aſſiſt: the length and languiſhing of their promiſes were odious vnto him. Hee did conſider the iniuſtice, & inequality in the portion of the Infanta his wife, who of ſo many Scepters and Crownes which the King her Father had, receiued but ſix ſcore thouſand Crownes of yearely penſion, whereas the eldeſt had the Low-countries, and the Franche county in marriage. He could not forget, that at the treaty of Veruins, hee had been in a manner forgotten, and that a Peace was almoſt concluded before they thought of him. He beſeuered that if the Spaniard would, the queſtion for the Marquieſſe of Saluces had E been ended, the which might haue been left to him in exchange of Calais, Dorland, Ardes, and other places. That the King of Spaine did thinke (that to prevent that all theſe diſcontentments ſhould not eary this Prince to ſome dangerous party) it was neceſſary to ſee him vnto the Crowne of Spaine by ſome ſtrong bond. They therefore demaied the Duke Prince, and the firſt Infanta, vnder colour to bring them vnder a royall manner, and in a Court whereas they might one day hope to riſe.

The King was diſcontented with this demand, perceiving well that it proceeded more from diſtruſt, then affection. His Council aduiled him to giue this content vnto the King of Spaine, that hee could not lodge his children better, and that that was the ſauiest and very cement of perfect friendſhip. Yet hee reſolved to keepe his children, and not ſend the Count Le Morte to make his excuſe, that the preſent eſtate of his affaires would not ſuffer him to ſend them, nor to provide them a traine and furniture fit for the voyage.

The King of Spaine, to take away all excuſe, giues order to haue money provided for him at Milan, and perſwades the Duke to ſend the Count Le Morte as Governour and conſulor of the Prince. The D. takes the money, and keeps the ware, ſaying that the ayre of Spaine was not proper for his children, that their indiſpoſition and the tendreſſe of their age, would not ſuffer him to hazard them ſo ſoone in ſolong a voyage.

This reſuſall offended the King of Spaine, and makes the Duke to reſolve, vpon that which which he held most profitable. From that time he could no more looke on a Spaniard. He then left the Spanish Ambassador at Turin, and came to Chambery: when as hee did see any one afarre off in his Councell of the Spanish Faction, hee looks on him with such a disdainfull eye, he shewes himselfe no more in his presence: hee scornes the Spanish faction, and commends the French, saying, That there is no such felicitie as to conquer ones selfe, and to yeeld himselfe absolutely vnto himselfe.

The King was long before he would yeeld vnto the Dukes comming into France, saying, That it was not necessary he should passe the mountaines without the Marquisate of Saluces. But the Cheualier Breton and Roncas did presse the King, that he would be pleased to giue their Master leaue to see him, assuring him that he would giue him all content. The first was framed to the fashion of that Court, and did beleue that when they should see a Prince great in Iudgement, admirable in liberalitie, and indued with many excellent qualities, they would grant him all without any difficulty. Many dissuaded the Duke from this voyage, laying before him the dangers in trusting a great enemy, wanting no examples, whereof one in such remarkable accidents were sufficient to make him to change his minde, and to ground his iudgement vpon experience.

Roncas returned from the Court, he found the Duke at Hautecombe, and brings him Letters from the King, fuller of desire to see him, then of any hope that this enterview should yeeld him any great profit. This Letter well considered, was not sufficient to make the way for such a passage, shewing that although the King desired his comming, it was always without preiudice, to have reason of the Marquisate. It was imparted to the Councell: whereof some said, that this voyage would giue an offence which Spain would neuer pardon: others said, that the end of this game would be the losse of friendship of the K. of Spaine, which would be profitable to the Duke, and necessary for his children. The Duke answers, that the Mariner is ill aduised that strikes often against the same rock where he hath many times suffered shipwrack. That the hatred of Spaine would make the conditions of the treaty more easie and beneficiall, and would lay open that which none but himselfe could expresse, carying in his brest certain designs which hee could not trust to any but himselfe. There was no reason of force to make him change this opinion. He said, that as soone as he had seene the King he should be content. They had much adoe to persuade him to send (not an Ambassador, but a simple Post) vnto the King of Spaine, not to aske his aduice, but to cary him assurance of his going into France: the which hee vnderstood when as they could not beleue it in Court, thinking that he had changed his resolution.

When as all doubts were taken away, the King gaue order for his receiuing, commanding the Gouernor of Lions to prepare the Archbishops lodging for his owne person, and the nearest houses for the Noblemen of his Court: That hee should accompany him in the best fort he could to doe any thing that he desired to see within the towne. That he should goe and meet him in the mid way of the last post, with all the Nobility of his gouernment. That they of the towne should attend him at the gate when hee should enter, and that the Prouost of Merchants should tell him, that he had commandement to do him the same honour that was to be done to his Maiesty, and visiting him in his lodgings, to present vnto him the goodliest & rarest fruits that might be found in the country, and that they should feast him, and defray him with all his traine. This was executed with such order and state, as the Duke hath said often said since, that this entertainment had bound him. The Earles of the great Church of Lions were in doubt whether they should receiue this Prince as they had done the Duke Emanuel Philibert his father. The Dukes of Sauoy, as Earles of Villards and Soueraignes of that county in the country of Breffe, haue had place as Chanoin of Honour in that Church, the which is represented vnto them the first time they enter. The same honour should haue bene offered vnto the Duke passing by Lions, as had bene giuen vnto his father when he came after the peace in the year 1559, if things had bene in the same estate, or if they had not found a greater difference. The Chapter of this Church had great reason to intreat the Prince as they had done his predecessors, seeing the King would haue him receiued like vnto his Maiesty, and giue him that testimonie of honour, the effect whereof did honor them as much that gave it, as he could find himselfe honored that receiued it. But for that through the Kings conquest the country of Villards was no more vnder his obedience; that things were yet in suspence of war or peace; that Princes are always offended with the communication of such honours; they

A they refused not to doe any thing therein, but what it should please the King to appoint. They aske the Gouernors aduice: whereupon La Faye, one of the Earles of that Church, was sent to Court, to know the Kings pleasure touching this difficulty.

The King demanded of him, what a Chanoin of honor was, and if the Duke of Sauoyes reception had bene like vnto his. La Faye answered, that the great and famous Churches of Europe had Chanoinnes of honour, who were either Soueraine Princes, (in whose dominions they were founded) or foraigne Princes, who by their piety haue bound the Church to this acknowledgement of honor. That the place of a Chanoin of honour, is neither for the office, nor for the charge, but onely for reuerence and priuiledge: for as the Prince who is a Chanoin of honor, is not bound to any other thing, but to sweare the protection and preservation of the rights of the Church, so he reapes no other profit, but is partaker of their praier which they make there.

That this honour should bee of small import, if the greatnesse of Princes which had desired it, did not make it great in a great Church, the which being one of the chiefe of France as well in Antiquity as in Dignity, the reputation thereof hath bene spread in farre nations, who haue founded their Churches after this modell. That this honour had bene giuen in ancient time to the most Christian Kings, to the Dukes of Sauoy Earles of Villards, to the Dukes of Bourgundy, Dukes of Berry, and Dauphines of Viennois, which haue bene receiued Chanoinnes of Honor in that Church, but those receptions did differ from that of the Kings.

The King asked the opinion of his Councell in that case, and by their aduice he answered, that the Duke of Sauoy holding no more the County of Villards, should not pretend the rights that depended thereon: that comming into France, to reconcile himselfe vnto his Maiesty, hee would make for small an aboad in Lions as hee did not thinke that hee would stay for so simple a ceremonie. That if hee should demand that place of a Chanoin of Honour as they had giuen it to his deceased father, the Chapter should excuse themselves, vntill they knew the Kings pleasure, to doe their duties at his returne.

The Duke was much offended with the refusal of that was due to him, and the which D hee had giuen vnto his deceased father. Neither did hee dissemble his discontent, for he would not goe into this Church, although he were lodged in the Archbishops palace, nor passe ouer the place, which is before the principall doore: and when as the Deane with the whole body of the Church went to salute him, hee said that hee had alwayes honoured that company, as hauing the Honour to be of it. Being receiued into Lions according to the Kings order and command, hee had many prefaces of discontent in his voyage. His seruants in Court aduertised him that if he came without other designe then to offer the Marquisate of Saluces, hee would repent his comming. One said vnto him that hee should not get any great matter of the King, seeing hee was not pleased that the Cathedrall Church at Lions should afford him a little honour and E ceremony. A man at armes of the company of the Marquis d'Yrfe, was put in prison vpon a false aduice that came from Geneva, that he followed the Duke with an intent to doe a bad act at Paris. It was strange in Court that the King had not sent any other vnto him then the Controulour generall of the Postes. But nothing troubled him more, then when as Varenne (among other discourses which the Duke offered, to found their opinions touching his voyage) said vnto him, hee should be welcome so as hee restored the Marquisate. A speech which toucht the Duke vnto the quicke, who esteemed not all the Estates of his patrimony, as the Marquisate alone. It is true that they loue that better which they haue gotten, then that which hath bene purchased by their Predecessors. He went by post from Lions to Roane: from thence hee went by water to Orleans, whither the King sent the Duke of Nemours to receiue him. Betwixt Orleans and Fontainebleau he was met first by the Marshall Biron, and then by the Duke Montpensier, being followed by many Noblemen.

The 13 of December at night (a memorable day for the Kings birth) hee arose: when hee knew his traine to bee asleepe, and departs secretly to get to Fontainebleau before his people were awake. Varenne who had commandement from the King to come before and aduertise him, had much adoe to follow him, and if the Duke had found horses ready at the first post, they had not caried the first newes of his arrival.

Duke of Mercœur voyage into Hungary in October. 1599.

He found the King coming from Maffé, with all the Noblemen of his Court, attired in red, and ready to goe to horse-backe to meet him : they did walke long together after their first embracings and excuses. Then the Duke told him the occasions of his voyage, the which hee had kept secret from his Councell : but hee could draw nothing from the King by this first parlee, but hee should haue him his friend in yielding him his Marquisate. It is a difficult thing to feed a King that hath a white beard with words. The King said alwaies that hee desired nothing but his owne. And the Duke of Sauoy being in the Louvre spake as boldly as if he had beene in the Citadell at Turin, that no power in the world should euer make him yeld to this restitution. A free and courageous speech in anothers Court, nor amongst his owne people, but to Villeroy the Kings chiefe and most confident Secretary of State. From Fontainebleau hee went to Paris with a goodly traine, hee was lodged in the Louvre, and spent the Christmas in Nemours house. He admired this great Court, where hee sees the chiefe Noblemen of the Realme, and noted that L'Escliquiers who had so much troubled him, was not so great in Court as in Dauphine. The Dukes presence did increase his reputation, he gouerned his actions in such sort, as he freed them from the scorne and mockery of the Court. His wisdom, his discretion, and his courtseie, made them to forget the tales which were yet told of the good Duke Charles his grand-father. They did obserue in his actions courtseie and courage, bounty, discretion and policy. This yeare ended with all sorts of pleasures and sports, familiarities and proofes of true friendship, so as many beleueed that the two hearts and the two Courts of these Princes were but one, but there was alwaies some marke of constraint, and amidst these embracings there alwaies past some gird or quip. The King who is fudden in his answers, gaue him alwaies some touch to thinke on. There was too great difference betwixt their humours to make a long and good harmony. But whilst the Court abounds in pleasure and delights, the Duke Mercœur is in Hungary, in the midst of many discomforts, which hee holds pleasing for Gods cause : but before hee goes hee giues them occasion to talke of him in the Court of Parliament. Hee had a cause pleaded there, and his Advocate gaue him the quality of a Prince : Servin the Kings Advocate (holding it a base preuarication to be silent at that which ought to bee spoken for the Kings seruice and the Law of State) did shew that that quality did not belong to any, but to Princes of the blood. The Duchesse of Mercœur (who was then in presence) said that they could not take from her husband a quality that was due vnto him by the right of his birth, and that the King held him so.

The Duke Mercœur, holding that which the Kings Advocate had sayd, in discharge of his duty for a brauado and a contempt, went the same day vnto his house, and gaue him iniurious words. The King being aduertised thereof, held it a bold act. The Court esteemed the injury done vnto them, and desired the more to repaire it, for that the honour of the Kings seruice was wronged, and that it had beene done in sight of the Parliament of the capital City of the Realme, and in his house that was wronged, the which should bee to euery man an inuolable Sanctuary. The Court decreed that hee should bee personally adorned, and had proceeded further if the Kings commandement had not stayed them. It was a great vertue in the President Lixet, when he decreed that the quality of a Prince (which the Cardinall of Lorraine tooke) should be razed out of his Advocates pleadings. The Cardinall complained vnto the King : but the President Lixet answered with such courage and constancy before the King, being in councell, that the Cardinall was no Prince nor equal to Princes, and if you will faith beue it, shew vs the place of your Principality. A free speech which purchased the old man much reputation, and yet within two yeares after hee made him resigne his place vnder another pretext. There was no Nobelman in France that vied the benefit of the peace more worthily then the Duke Mercœur, for disdainning the idleness of the Court and the ease of his house, hee employed himselfe to succour the Christians, against the greatest enemy of their Religion. Hee leads with him the Count of Chaligny his brother, with some Gentlemen at his owne charge, resolving to imploy his goods as well as his life in this holy warre, hauing vowed to serue Christendome two yeares at his owne charge. He shewed himselfe a great Capitaine as well to defend as to assaile, hauing kept the enemy with an Army of a hundred and fifty thousand men from

A from besieging of Strigonia : this was in his first voyage before whose returne the Emperour desired to see him, and intreated him to take his way by Prague.

In the beginning of the yeare, the Duke of Sauoy sent the King two great Basins, and two Ewers of Chrystal, the rarest peeces of the Cabinet of Beatrice of Portugal his grandmother, and of Lady Katherine the Infanta of Spaine and his wife, the which could not bee valued neither for the matter, nor for the workmanship : and the King returned vnto the Duke a fewell of Diamonds, in the middell whereof there was one Diamond Transparent, which discovered his Maiesties portrait, the which hee esteemed so much, as hauing lost it once in dancing, he gaue five hundred Crownes to him that found it. The Duke was not to bee imitated in his bounty, and when as they thought that hee had giuen all, hee invited the King and the Court to a dancing, where he shewed himselfe in Jewels, as they were esteemed to bee worth about six hundred thousand Crownes. Hee gaue Presents to all the Court, who accepted them with the Kings permission : Once the Duke of Biron refused the horses that hee sent vnto him : but the King had nothing the better opinion of their intelligences, nor the Duke lesse assurance of his affection by this refusal, for it was chiefly for his sake, that the Duke of Sauoy had made his voyage, to draw him wholly from the Kings seruice. It was that great occasion which hee caried secret in his brest, and would not reueale vnto his Councell, when they disswaded his going into France : the Marquisate of Saluces was the pretext of his voyage, but the finishing of this great conspiracy was the true cause. It was a goodly soyle well set out, but couered with a false stone.

La Fin was employed as a Truchman of the Wills of the Conspirators and Confederates. The first time that hee had any speech with the Duke of Sauoy, was the night after the feasts of Christmas, when he was brought into the Dukes Chamber in Nemours house, by Seigneur Jacob, without the priuity of any other. The Duke of Nemours (comming to giue the Duke the good night) was intreated not to enter, for that the Duke would take his rest. They would not haue him acquainted with any thing, fearing lest he should aduertise the King, hauing obserued what hee sayd the first day of the Dukes arrival, that nothing should draw him from the Kings seruice, and that excepted, hee would doe any thing for his Highnesse. There was not any night but La Fin spent a good part of it, to acquaint him with the State of the faction. Those that were of this intelligence, met at the most remote Churches, to acquaint one another with that which past. Nothing was said in the Kings Councell, but the Duke of Sauoy was presently aduertised thereof, by them that were at his deuotion. But he had not yet spoken with the Duke of Biron of their designe, but by a third person : it was necessary they should ioyne to knit the knot of their vnion. They had both sought the occasion, but there was still some obstacle, or some spie that hindred them. They encountered a fit opportunity at Conflans, being all alone, the King hauing commanded the Duke of Biron to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy vntill his returne : they lost no time, in plying it but in three or foure words of trust, and assured intelligence, referring the rest to the mediation of La Fin. Their discourse was broken off, by the comming of the Count Soissons, and the Duke of Montpensier.

The Dukes proceeding therein, was very cunning and iudicious, for often-times hee would begin a discourse of the valour and courage of the Duke of Biron, to found the Kings opinion, who did not alwayes giue him the glory of those goodly executions, whereof hee vanted. The Duke did still aduertise the Duke of Biron of any thing the King had sayd of him, that might any way alter him, which made him to breake forth in the bitterest words hee could, against all respect of the Kings seruice, being very sensible of any thing that was spoken against the reputation of his valour, in regard whereof hee esteemed nothing : and when hee entered into the History of his life, hee would speake contemptibly of all the world, not sparing the King himselfe, whose valour and experience in military actions, hath obscured others, and forced them to confesse, that hee hath not beene aduanced to the Royall Throne by the benefit of Fortune, but by the merit of his vertue. The Duke of Biron committed great errors against the rules of such as desire to raise and aduance their fortunes. No man must euer enter into comparision of valour and sufficiency with his Prince : hee may not dispute of his aduice, contradict his opinion, nor affect to seeme more aduised, advised, more iudicious, nor more capable. Many haue bene cast away vpon this selfe. A The Duke of Biron was of this humor. The exceſſe of his courage made him to diſallow with diſdaine, all that was not done or inuented by himſelfe. He ſayd ſometimes vnto the King, that he would not haue them write in the Hiſtory of France, that other then he had done ſuch and ſuch a thing.

The ſecond day of the yeere, the King went to Saint Germaine in Lay, leading the Duke with him, to ſhew him his buildings, his Grots or Caues and his Chafes, and with all hee ſhewed him his other houſes, and all the goodlieſt places about Paris. In the meane time he diſſembled his diſcontent, with ſo great wiſdome, as hee ſeemed alwaies one, at the table, at hunting, at play, and at dancing: the King though he reſuſed what he demanded, yet did he ſtill ſhew him new fights, to recompence the ſained repentance his voyage.

The King leads the Duke to the Court of Parliament.

After that he had ſcene all that was rare about Paris, the King would ſhew him his Court of Parliament, for all that hee had ſcene was nothing in reſpect of the admirable greatneſſe of that reuerent Court, whereof in former times, many Emperours, Kings, and Princes, coming to Paris, had more admitted the Juſtice that was adminiſtered there, then any thing elſe that they had ſcene. The King aduerted the chiefe Preſident Achilles de Harley, that hee would goe ſee and heare there. They prepared the lodging of the golden Chamber, whereas the King and Duke might ſee and not be ſcene. There was a moſt tragicall cauſe pleaded, whereof the firſt Preſident made choiſe: The ſubiect C was a of one Iohn Proſſ a practitioner of the Law, who had bene murdered at Paris, and the authors could not be diſcovered. His mother accuſed a Baker where hee was lodged, vpon ſome apparant preſumptions of certaine money which ſhee had lent vnto him. Wherevpon the Baker was condemned to be rackt with all extremity, after the which he was enlarged for a time, putting in Caution for his appearance againe in Court.

It happened afterwards that three Gaſcons were taken for robbing of a houſe, and condemned the next day to be hanged. At their execution, the laſt of the three ſaid, that the Baker was innocent for that whereof hee had bene accuſed, for the murder of Iohn Proſſ, and that it was he with his companion La Sale that had ſlaine him, thinking that he had money: and that after they had ſlaine him, they did caſt him into the Priuy, whereas D he was yet. The which was found true: Wherevpon the Baker being declared innocent, hee preſents his petition vnto the Court, and demands reparation of honor, with his charges, damage and intereſt againſt the mother. The mother defends her ſelfe, and ſaith, that her accuſations were not calumnious. Maſter Anne Robert pleaded for the Baker, and for the mother Maſter Anthony Arnault, and for the Kings intereſt Maſter Servin his Maieſties Aduocate Generall.

Anne Robert Advocate in the Court, pleading for the Baker being Plaintiffe, ſaid thus:

May it pleaſe ye:

THE ancient Poets taking pleaſure to diſcourſe of many combats happened at the battell of Troy, report that Telephus (the ſonne of Hercules) receiued in an encounter a fore wound with a Lance by Achilles: who ſeeing his paine to encreaſe dayly, ſied to Apollons Oracle for Counſell, who answered, that nothing could giue him eaſe or cure, but the ſame Lance wherewith hee had bene wounded. A Lance called Pelias of Mount Pelion in the top whereof Chiron gathered it, to preſent to Achilles: ſo as in Telephus accident, the remedy and the cure, came from the ſame Lance, which gaue the wound and did the harme.

A wound giuen
by ſentence, cannot be cured
but by ſen-
tence.

The Plaintiffe with ſome like conſideration, hath reaſon to ſay, that hauing bene by the authority of a ſentence miſerably tormented, and expoſed to the rigour of the racke and torture, by the wilfull ſlander and importune raſhneſſe of a woman, hee hath recoured vnto the ſame Lance of Achilles which did wound him: ſeeing that he doth now appeale vnto the Authority and Juſtice of the ſame Court, which hath heretofore giuen the firſt ſentence of condemnation againſt him, hoping that by the exemplary puniſhment of the raſhneſſe and ſlander of this woman, the ſoueraigne

A ſoueraigne Juſtice of this Parliament guided by the conduct of an Achilles, which doth preſide and hold the chiefe place, ſhall giue cure to his wounds, and bring conſolation to his grieſe.

The eſtate of the caſe that is now in queſtion, and to bee iudged, is not whether the Plaintiffe were falſely and ſlanderoſly accuſed or no: for the accident of two murderers hath aſſuered and diſcovered the ſlander without any doubt. But the queſtion is, if this Defendrefſe (after to falſe and calumnious an accuſation) ſhall paſſe vnpuniſhed: and whether hee pretended excuſes ſhall be receiued and countenanced by Juſtice. For one of the chiefe points which ſhee pleads for her excuſe is, that the criminall Proceſſe hauing paſt through the hands of the moſt famous Iudges of Europe, if they haue bene deceived, (ſaith this woman) if by preſumptions and probable coniectures, they haue found cauſe to condemne this man vnto the racke, if ſo many worthy Iudges haue bene ſurpriſed, will you not excuſe the ſimplicity of a woman, and the extreame ſorrow of an afflicted mother for the death of her ſonne, hauing had no hatred nor malice, in this accuſation. It is a great abſe to meaſure the action of Iudges, with the actions of parties: the purſuit and proceeding of parties is merely voluntary: no man is forced to plead or confeſſe: the Plaintiffe ſhould be well aduiſed before hee begin, and not to draw any man into the danger of a capitall condemnation; if hee bee not firſt aſſured, that he whom hee caſts into queſtion hath done the deed and is Author of the crime: but the charge of a Iudge is tyed to a neceſſary duty, bound to certaine Maximes, and ſubiect C to rules, eſtabliſhed by the Lawes, to condemne neceſſarily vpon preſumptions and prooſes, and vpon the teſtimony of witneſſes, examined at the inſtance of the party. Antiquity doth teach vs, that Tireſias that great Sooth-fayer, foretold things to come by the flying of birds, not that hee did lee the birds, for hee was blind, but (ſay the Poets) hee had alwaies his daughter Manto neere vnto him, who told him in what manner the birds did fly, and thereby hee diuined. Juſtice may rightly be compared to this excellent blinde man, and the compariſon cannot ſeeme bad, ſeeing that the Egyptians thought good to paint their Iudges with their eyes blind-folded: For Iudges cannot rightly ſee nor know what doth paſſe. Juſtice deſtees nothing but according to the report and teſtimonie of parties and witneſſes: If any inconuenience happen in the condemnation, the miſchiefe is to bee imputed to the parties, and not to the Iudges or Juſtice.

Juſtice doth Iudge of that with ap-pearces.

They report that the Greekes hauing put Palamedes to death, his father Nauplius to bee reuenged, obſcured the time when as the Greekes after the ſacke of Troy, returned by ſea, in a great tempeſt. Nauplius being vpon a Roocke in full ſea, held a burning torch in his hand, as if that place had bene a ſafe Port for the deſcent of ſhips: the Greekes abuſed with this light, ranne againſt the Roocke, and ſuffered ſhipwracke. In this miſfortune if there were cauſe to complaine, it was againſt the malicious inuention of Nauplius: but as for the Pilots and ſuch as gouerned the ſhips, they were not to bee blamed, in following the direction of a Lanthorne in a darke night, being viſually ſet at ſafe E Ports. So in accidents like vnto this in queſtion, all the harme, all the complaints, and all the wrong, is to bee imputed to the accuſed, which kindles the fire of ſlander, and from whom proceeds the practices and ſubornation of witneſſes, and the ſearch and diſguiſing of preſumptions and circumſtances. Who doubts but the complaints and malicious teares of this woman were falſe directions, and ſufficient inducements to circumuent the wiſdome of the beſt Iudges, who in the miſdeed of the night, that is to ſay, in the darkneſſe of hidden crimes, haue followed the ordinary formes of Juſtice.

Slander is the cauſe of falſe
iudgements.

It was with reaſon that a Greeke Author diſcourſing of the criminall proceſſe of Oreſtes, who to reuenge the death of his father, ſlew Clitemeſtra his mother: ſaid, that F when hee was brought before the Parliament of Arrispage, Atinerna Goddeſſe of wiſdome was Preſident in Iudgment. The Ancients by ſuch fictions would teach vs, that in the iudgment of criminall cauſes, if a celeſtiall power doth nor aſſiſt, there doth many times inconueniences happen, but the fault muſt then bee imputed to accuſer, who giues the firſt cauſe, by an information framed expreſſly to afflict and condemne an innocent. Appian in his Hiſtory reports of Iulius Caſar, that ſeeing a mutiny in his campe, he commanded the authors thereof to be apprehended. A ſouldier was brought before him as one of these mutines, and yet it was presently auerred that hee was none. Cesar A caused him that brought him to be severely punished, iudging that although hee did it not maliciously, yet hee deserued punishment, for that he had drawne an innocent soldier in danger of his life. We read that Marian having found a dead body in the night, and through piety (which was then greatly recommended among Christians) seeking to bury him, was taken, led before the Iustice, and condemned vpon suspition: but at the same instant, when as they carried him to execution, it chanced happily that the murderer was taken and executed, hauing confessed the fact, to the great happineffe of Marian, who was deliuered, and within few yeeres after chosen Emperor. As also the Ecclesiasticall History doth teach vs, that Saint Athanasius was accused to haue slaine Arsenius, and was ready to be condemned, if by good hap Arsenius had not bene found, being hidden by the enemies of Athanasius. A late writer curious in the search of the singularities of the History of Venice, reports an aduenture somewhat like vnto this: Fuscarius sonne to the Duke of Venice, had a capitall quarrell with another Venetian Gentleman called Hermolao Donati. This Gentleman was found dead, and the Author of this murder not knowne. Fuscarius vpon suspition of their quarrell, was called in question, condemned, and sent into exile, where hee dyed for griefe to see himselfe banished from his Country. Within three moneths after his death, a thiefe was executed, who amongst other crimes, confessed, that it was hee and not Fuscarius, which had slaine that Venetian Gentleman.

ment of false

In such and the like inconueniences, were it reason to giue absolute impunity to him that was the calumniator, be it that malice or indiscretion hath drawne him to this slander? Scipio sayd, that a Generall of an Army must be well aduised what he doth, for in matters of warres three is no meanes to erre twise, the first fault being sufficient to ruine an army. Euen so in Iustice, it must be very exact, when there is any question of a capitall accusation, for seeing that the life depends thereon, there is no meanes to erre twise, the first being irreparable. It is an approved distinction of al those that haue treated of the punishment of false accusations, whether a informer bee induced to accuse slanderously and wickedly, or by indiscretion and without malice.

The one differs from the other, so haue they diuers effects: the one hath some excuse, the other is punished severely: the one ciuilly, the other criminally: for where there is malice and slander, the Law of God doth punish the calumniator with the like paine, Lege Talionis: and at Rome the calumniator in crimes that were not capitall, was beaten with a hot iron, and branded in the fore-head, for a signe and perpetuall marke of his slander. And the Emperour Macrinus did punish those accusers which did faile in their proofes with death. Pliny speaking of such men, called them abominable sacrifices, which should bee offered vp to the publike quiet. And the good Emperour Traian did so detest calumniators, as hee caused them to bee put into a ship without stayle or tackling, abandoning them to the mercy of that merciless element, which would haue no pity of them, no more then they had had of many poore innocents.

But as for the slander which proceeds from indiscretion without malice, the severity in truth should not bee so great, yet is it fit there should be some punishment. No seuerer or capitall punishment, but at the least pecuniary and ciuill, of damages and fine. If hee were not excusable as a mother, forced to accuse by extreme griefe without malice: what racker? what punishment? what torments were sufficient to punish her, which hath drawne an innocent man in question, and in danger to be broken vpon the wheele? The Poets saie, that the Goddesse Ceres by the supposition of Tantalus, did eate Peleus shoulder. This Goddesse finding her owne error, although vnadvisedly, condemned her selfe to make Peleus shoulder of Yuory. You are the cause of the cruell torments which the Plaintiffe hath suffered vpon the racke, but you say it was by indiscretion, and without malice. At the least by an award of damages and fine, make some pecuniary recompence, to releue the misery of this poore man, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of his dayes, languishing after so many torments. And if this woman represents vnto you the pity and griefe of a mother, imagine I pray you the miserable sighes of this innocent, in the midst of the cruelty of most violent tortures, hauing no other feeling but his paine and griefe,

A In one houre a thousand deaths without dying, a body tormented, stretched, halfe torne in peeces, his sinewes dried and strained, his members broken, and his whole body in a pittifull estate, being bound, and miserably racked. And to speake truth, it had bene a great happineffe for this poore man to haue died; for what remains is no more a perfect body, but peeces displaced and disioyned, members broken, lame and feeble, hauing his body reduced to that miserable estate, as hereafter he shall hardly by his labour get a lining for himselfe, his wife and five children. It is the clamor and sighs of these poore young Infants, whose cry pierceth vp to heauen, and their complaints come vnto you, to moue you vnto pity. He in the meane time seeing himselfe miserable in his body, and his family reduced to beggery, liues and dies altogether. It is a paine which still encreaseth, a griefe which euer doubles, and a death which hath neuer end.

B That great Painter Apelles meaning to paint Slander, set him forth in a mourning weed, The picture of Slander. hauing two wiues, one of either side, Ignorance and Suspition: what reason were there to take for payment and available satisfaction the indiscretion of the Defendresse, and the excuse of Ignorance (an ordinary companion to Slander) and to pardon so notable a fault, vnder pretext of an afflicted mothers griefe, for the death of her son: and hereafter when any murder is committed, shall it be lawfull for a Father, a Brother, or a neare kinsman, with all impunity, vnder a pretext of Iustice, to accuse whom he please, and to bring in question of his life, or of some cruell torments, and in the end to be quit, excusing himselfe vpon his griefe or ignorance? The rules of Iustice and Law doe not allow it. Titus Livius said excellently, that the Law was inexorable, deafe, without pity, and without passion. Why doth that worthy Author say, That the Law is deafe, but for that it doth neuer giue eare vnto the vaine discourse of pity and commiseration? The property of Iustice is to be strict and seuerer. The Surgion that is pittifull and doth not lanch deepe, makes the wound incurable. An indulgent and ouer mild father, makes the child incorrigible: So a mercifull Iudge doth nourish and increase vice, and betraies the lawes and maiesty of Iustice.

orable.*

This cause doth therefore import the publike, for examples sake: for although the Plaintiffe hath no other quality but of a simple Bourges and handly-crafts-man, yet to obtaine reason in Iustice, and to hope for reparation of the wrong which hath bene done him, he thinks himselfe great enough, seeing he hath the happineffe to liue vnder the peacefull government of the best King in the world, who hauing heaped all happineffe vpon France, maintaines equally in his protection, and vnder the safeguard of his Maiesty, the life and health of all his subiects, poore and rich, great and small. The Ancients held, that Themis, which is the Goddesse of Iustice, was the daughter of the Sun: and as the Sunne may be seene in a glasse by them which cannot behold his beames, So the Maiesty of our great King, the true and comfortable Sunne of this Monarchy, the eye and heart of France, would giue authority to this famous Parliament, as the true feat of his greatnesse, to the end that therein, as in a Looking-glasse, wee might admire the beauty, light, and beames of his iustice. An Historian saith, That the Emperour Augustus had fiery eies, igneos oculos, inferring thereby, that he had such glistering eies, and such a piercing sight as it was impossible or very hard to looke stedfastly on him.

And we in like sort must content our selues that it is lawfull for vs to admire the beauty of this soueraine Court, and to beleue that our weak sight is not strong enough to enjoy full the presence of our great Prince, sitting in his feat of iustice, nor to endure the glistering beames of the Maiesty of our great French Augustus, whom God hauing led through so many dangers, as it were by the hand, to the height of all greatness, and hauing endued him with the valour of Cesar, the fortune of Alexander, the bounty of Traian, wee can with no more vnto him but the happineffe, the many yeares, and the continuall prosperity of Augustus, to the end that all wee his subiects may liue happy and content vnder the raigne of so great a King, and the assured iustice of this famous Parliament.

So the Plaintiffe hauing recourse to this soueraine Iustice, as to the last Port of health, beseeching the Court to allow of his request, and that hee may be absolved of the slanderous accusation laid against him, that the enrolement of his imprisonment may be razed, and hee discharged of all condemnations which heretofore

haue beene giuen; and moreover, that the defendresse may be condemned to a pecuniary reparation, such as it shall please the Court to decree, and to all charges, dammages, and interest.

Anthony Arnaud for the defendresse, said:

May it please yee,

Afflictions
speake of themselves.

YOU shall vnderstand in this cause, how true it is; That ordinary afflictions speake with indgement, and that extreme calamities doe quench or confound the spirit. The Plaintiff hath represented his griefes vnto you in an eloquent discourse, full of Art and the force of eloquence: and contrariwise of our part, you shall heare nothing but the sobs and sighes of a mother, transported with griefe, and reduced to all sorts of despair. I would to God the torments wherof you speake, and all the cruelties that may be imagined, had beene executed vpon me poore mother, who haue one foot already in the graue: and that the death of my son (and the kind of death more miserable then the death it selfe) had not ministered the mournfull subiect of this miserable cause: so as on what side soeuer you turne, there is nothing to be seene but teares and desolation: But there is this great difference: that the griefe of the aduerser party (if there yet remaines any) may be mollified in time, by a thousand remedies which excellent wits haue inuented during many ages, to ease the discomforts of the body. But contrariwise, the extreme affliction (which findes no words of force to represent it) for the losse of a sonne, of an onely sonne, the only support and comfort of the trembling age of an old mother, hath neuer found consolation in all the most excellent discourses in the world, being the most excellent Physicke of the minde. The griefe is so violent as it exceeds all remedy, and bleeds afresh euery day. The older it grows, the more grievous it is. It doth hourly master the resistance which it found in the beginning, and doth continually vanquish the forces of the body with them of the minde.

It is a strange thing, that my poore sonne hauing beene thus cruelly massacred, you who fee him returne no more into your house, instead of aduertising me thereof, went into his chamber to take his money, you transported it out of your owne house, and hid it in your brother-in-lawes. And which is worse, being examined by the Iustice, you denied it constantly, and often, vntill that your sonne (too young to concale the truth) discovered the place where you had laid it. All this is iustified by the processe, the which remaines in the hands of the Kings Council.

So as it was not in you that these murderers were not vn timerely punished, but the peering eye of diuine Iustice, which neuer sleeps: for a robbery committed two months after hath brought them to the execution. It appeares by the informations, that the very day of the murder, these two murderers went vnto your lodging and brake open my sons cofer, if you had fed vnto Iustice they might haue beene instantly apprehended. Alas! peradventure my poore child was not then fully dead. How many are left for dead which are not so? How many haue beene taken out of the coffin, yea, out of the graue, which haue suruiued their funerals fifty yeeres?

At the least, you cannot deny but you were the cause to moderate their punishment: What know I what they would haue said vpon the wheele? You neuer attempted any thing against mee, but when as they which flue my sonne could no more accuse you? What did then hinder you, why you did not speedily aduertise the Iustices? At the least it was feare to restore the money which you had taken, in committing a domesticke theft, the which was alwaies punished with death: and wherein the lawes of hospitality (the which are holy among all nations) were also violated. Whom should I sooner challenge for the death of my sonne, then him who had his spoiles? Nature hath hidden in the earth both gold, silver, and iron, but the malice of man hath drawn them all forth, that it might want no instruments for murderers, nor reward for Murderers. No man sheds blood to die his hands therein; there must be some other violent passion to thrust him on: Couetousnesse is the most ordinary. All coniectures, all presumptions were and are found true, that my Sonne had beene slaine by some one that desired his money, whora then might I better call in question then him who was found seized thereon?

Desire and covetousnesse the cause of murders.

A If treading vnder foot the murder of my sonne (as some mothers doe) I had onely demanded his goods of you, you could not haue avoided an infamous and rigorous condemnation. But for that I haue sought reuenge of the murder, I am this day in danger to be condemned, what recompence? Caius Antonius was accused for the conspiracy of Catelin; wherof he was found innocent, but his arraignment was intermixt with other thefts, which he had in former times committed in Macedonia, for the which hee was condemned. And yet the one of his accusations had nothing common with the other. In this cause murder and theft haue great affinity. How many be there in this great Citie, which being murdered like to this poore young man, should remain three months vn timerely, if their Host wanting them did not presently aduertise the Iustice. Suffer them to take their money without punishment, that is to say, declare him innocent that hath hidden it, and you shall helpe to hide the murderers.

It is a strange thing, that in the head City of this Realme, and in the face of the Parliament, there should be such furious Tigers found, to murder men as boldly as in the most hideous Forest in the world. The more these wicked spirits are determined to contemne the Lawes, the more must you endeavour to force them to feare them. All that may serue to punish such detestable crimes, must be earnestly embraced, nothing can so much aduance it, as to aduertise the Iustice speedily: whilst it is fresh these wicked spirits are terrified and amazed. If all be like vnto the Plaintiffe, a poore man may be rotten before they know he is dead. There be some that are incident to the suspicion of a crime although they be very innocent, as he that is found neare vnto a man that is newly murdered, he may happily be put to the Racke, this is a meere mischance, or rather (laying aside all fatality obserued in this case by the heathen Lawyers) let vs say with the Doctors of the Church, that it is a secret iudgment of God, the which we must admire, and not curiously search into. The thunder is worshipped euen by them that are stricken with it: punishments ordained by Iustice are the chastisements of Gods hand, whose power is represented here below by the Prince, and his, by his Magistrates. The Philosopher Crator said, That he which suffers ill without desert, is much eased in this accident of fortune: but in this fact which is now in question, the Plaintiffes theft, and not his misfortune, hath with great reason, made this suspicion to fall vpon him. Doe you not consider that the paine which you haue suffered, is the cause you shall bee this day absolved? Without it your theft could not remaine vn timerely punished: your demand of damage and interest, belongs onely to them that are meere innocent: if you be accused of two faults, and are found guilty of one, you must implore the mercy of the Iudge, and not blame his rigor. It was then impossible to free you from the Racke, by all the Maximes of Lawyers and their Interpreters, followed by a decree which needs no other defence then reason. And not to stray from this cause, shall I let you plainly see, that you need not bee so fearefull to come to the Racke. If these Murderers had not beene tortured for the robbery for the which they were executed, they could not haue beene condemned, for E want of prooffe. The one of them confest it vpon the Racke. As the Racke tormented you, so the Racke relieved you, hauing discovered your innocency in regard of the murder. And in easing you, it hath brought before mine eyes my murdered son, who presents himselfe euery night vnto me with stretched out armes, whilst the murderers kill him.

So as one and the selfe same thing hath filled me with heauinesse and with ioy. Content your selfe then with your good fortune, and insult no more ouer my misery: do you not feare that they will lesse pity you, and the paine you haue endured, when they shall see you haue none of me, nor of my distresse. I will not say vnto my Masters, that it is cruell and barbarous, to adde afflictions to the afflicted, why should I say so? seeing that all the condemnations which my aduerser party demands against me, can adde no more calamity, then small brookes doe vnto the sea? It is the onely comfort which remaines in my misery, that it can haue no increase. I will not therefore spend any time to cite the texts of Lawyers, which hold the violent passions of so miserable a mother excusable. They be lawes which are borne with vs, wherof no man can be ignorant, seeing we haue sucked it with our mothers milke, and which we cannot abrogate but in spoiling our humanity. I will not strue to represent vnto you that affliction to the children, or to the Parents, (euen as the losse of good subiects to their Prince) consists not in any mediocrity or temper, but in excessse, that excessse which in other motiues of the minde is vicious, is here in the full of all perfection. Why should I come to these excuses, seeing that if I were to A begin my accusation, I would do no less than I have done? I had rather be condemned to all sorts of damages, interests, and reparations, then to repent me of the pursuit I have made for the death of my sonne.

A goodly pretext for those mothers, which doe every day sell the deare blood of their children, when they shall heare that I have bene condemned, shall they not then have reason to say that they feare damage and interest, if they open their mouths? Dion observes, that they were reduced to that point at Rome, having so much discountenanced accusations, as they were forced to promise impunity to him that should convict another of a greater crime then his own. Calumniators and false accusers are to be feared vnder bad Princes, which enrich themselves with the confiscations of their subjects, and vnder the iust and flourishing government of our great King, which hath erected so many everlasting trophies of his clemency and bounty, equalling at this time by the glorious effects of justice (which shines throughout all this great and mighty Estate) the victories and the stately triumphs of fearful war: shewing by the effects, that the same vertue, and the same magnanimity carries great Princes, and excellent Capitaines into the midst of the most bloody and furious battels, and doth conduct them also to the holy and sacred actions of most happy and blessed peace.

We have then no neede amongst vs of these Talion punishments, the which were as soon as abrogated as they were enacted. If they were in force, not two crimes among an hundred should be punished: at the beginning we must necessarily follow coniectures C and presumptions: if they may lead vs to the certaine knowledge of the truth, they condemne the culpable: if not, they forbear: God onely walks in light, and men in darkness. But I beseech you to consider what power I have had in all this criminal proceeding. The Plaintiffe begins his action against me, because I am the most weak. If he durst challenge the Iudges he would do it much more willingly, all the instructions of the Proccesse comes from the criminal party. It is not I but the Kings Attorney generall. Alas! I brought nothing but my sighs, therein consists my crime. Oh I may well double my teares, seeing it is not lawfull for me to weep: it were more then a second losse of my sonne to lose my teares.

The Plaintiffes intent is, to have a gaine for his damage and interest: the mony which Justice hath forced him to yeeld, I have it not, I have employed it in praying vnto God for my sonne, who was murdered, and had no time to thinke of his soule, which was a double crueltie. Houses shake before they fall. The smoake foretells the fire that will consume vs. A tempest is discountred a farre off, but the murdering hand of man strikes suddenly, when we least thinke of it. If you condemne me in damages and interests, you may judge, that remembering his paines, how rigorously he will entreat me. I have nothing left to pay it: that little which I had was employed in the education of my son, holding it to be the richest and chiefest treasure that I could desire: O deceitfull hope! By vertue of your sentence he will confine me into a prison; but I regard it not, so as he make choise of a darke and an hideous one, that it may soon shorten my miserable life, the which shall neuer finde ease but in death: for I am resolved to passe the remainder of my daies, like vnto those mothers which accompany their children vnto the graue. All that makes me desire liberty, is to the end that I might liue among the Rocks, in deserts, and the most solitary woods, and that I might neuer see mothers that make much of their children. Alas, my son, my poore son! I shall call on thee night and day, although thou answerest me not. If this extreme misery doth not satisfie the Plaintiffe, let him feare and apprehend the wrath of God, and a second punishment. Let him not abuse the grace which he hath done him, in making manifest the truth of this murder. Let him liue happily to see his innocency knowne, and I alwaies vnhappy to have lost my poore child. I conclude, that it would please the Court to absolve me from his request.

After this the Kings Solicitor generall, Master Seruin, did rise to plead and conclude for the Attorney generall, vpon that which the Advocates had delivered for the parties: the opinions of the hearers were in such suspence, as they knew not which way to incline. Hee that had first heard the Plaintiffe, said, that he had reason: but as Iudges must alwaies reserve one eare for the defender, being vnpossible to iudge definitively vpon the discourse of one party: when the second had pleaded, there was such an equality and concurrence

A both a good cause. The Kings Solicitors discourse, was the powder to separate the truth from that which had some appearance of truth: but let vs heare this other Demosphenes of France, whose pleading followeth.

L. Seruin, the Kings Attorney Generall, said thus:

May it please yee,

If it be true, according to the worthy saying of Statius Caecilius (vled by Apuleius) de- B fending himselfe against an accusation of impiety; That innocencie is the true eloquence. It might satisfie the intention of the poore Plaintiffes, and might promise them an honourable issue, for that a poore and vntainted life speaking for them, surmounts in the opinion of good men, the richest eloquence of them that are guilty. For he may well defend, that can purge himselfe from crimes, having done nothing but what he dare publically avow. But if it be more true, that the art of speaking be vertue and wildome, as the Stoicks have defined it: signifying thereby, that the vertuous and wise haue subiect enough to talke. It is most certaine, that God which giueth wildome, and out of whose mouth proceeds all knowledge and vnderstanding, hauing not endued the Plaintiffes with such graces, seeing they haue neither the knowledge nor word, which is drawne out C of the holy Scriptures, nor the perswasive speech of humane wildome, hauing not the refined discourse of reason, they had great need of the assistance of their Advoctate: who as he doth nor yeeld in eloquence and knowledge to any one of his profession, hath made prooff by this present action, how well he can defend the innocent, the which is so much the more commendable, for that Dionysius Halicarnassus (a great Iudge of Orators) did hold Plato worthy to be blamed, for that he had written the Apologie of Socrates in a flat and cold stile.

On the one side, Master Anne Robert hath lively represented vnto you, the miserable estate of the Baker and his wife, lately accused, and now Plaintiffes: how they haue been pursued in the Chasteler, iudged, appealed, and condemned by sentence, the husband put D to the torture: and the Rake presented to the wife and to the maide: and to conclude, all the family in distresse, by the accusation of a horrible murder, pretended to be committed vpon the person of his guest: a crime which God hath made knowne by the reuelation of the murder, that the hearts and hands of these poore people were innocent. By reason whereof they demand reparation of honour, with damage and interest against the accuser. You haue on the other side, heard Master Anthony Arnaud, for the mother of the deceased Iohn Proff, miserably murdered, being before Plaintiffe, and now accused of slander, who may well defend her selfe by the simple colour of piety, which cries and is intercessor for her, for her, I say: A mother whose affliction is such, as there is no tongue but the mothers, or rather the voice of God that can well expresse it: neither E can any Advoctate or Orator how excellent soever, vnlesse he be possessed with a diuine spirit, represent the passions of a mother: witness the Prophet when hee deliuiers what God had said: Can the mother forget her child, but shee must haue pity of the fruit of her wombe: and if she should forget it, I will not forsake him, saith the Lord. It is God, our common father, God, who is charity it selfe: for so he is called by one of his Apostles: God, of whom the Greeke Poet Aratus (honoured by the allegation of S. Paul) said, That we are his offspring. God, of whom the same Apostle doth teach vs, That he is father of heauen and earth. It is he by whom all mothers haue their affection to their Children: it is he by whom the Defendesse (a miserable mother) was encouraged to seeke and pursue reuenge for the blood of her child. Behold persons of diuers qualities in our cause, who F pretend their innocencies by different reasons. The Baker and his wife demand reparation, being ignorant of the murder of Proff: and the mother (of Proff murdered) seeks to be freed from the imputation of slander. But there is yet an encounter in this controuersie: which regards the authority of things iudged, wherein the publike hath an interest. To deliuer what is fit vpon euery one of these qualites, it seemes expedient to obserue what hath past in the accusation and proceeding: the first iudgment in the decree, the execution, and what followed since.

That which appears by the processe judged, is, that the deceased Iohn Proff, sonne to A the Accuser, having beene lodged for a time in the Bakers house: about the beginning of February 1599, Katherine Cordier the wife of the Baker, sent for a Locksmith by her husbands sonne, and caused him to open the chamber of Proff, being absent, the which shee hath confessed after much disguising of the boyes name, whom since she knew to bee her sonne-in-law. After this ouerture, there was another maide in the view of two unknown men, who brought the keyes which the said Proff had given them; the which is a second charge: for these two men entred into the chamber in the presence of the hostesse, and tooke what they pleased of that which Proff had left: and yet afterwards there was a third opening made by the Locksmith, which was brought by the sonne of the Baker, and by his wifes commandement. This being thus aduowed and iustified by the son, the chamber being opened the fourth time by a Commissary of the Chasteler, there was some money found belonging to Proff, but not all, for that the Baker and his wife had taken, and promised some to their maide, if she said nothing. Moreouer, *Proff*s apparell being in his coffer, and among the rest a doubler, the hostesse being examined, said that Proff had none other. In the end, the processe hauing become made perfect by interrogatories and confrontations: One of the chiefe allegations made by the husband and the wife for their iustification, was, that the accuser, although a mother, did not loue Proff her sonne, whereof he had oftentimes complained. By a sentence giuen by the Prouost of Paris, it was decreed, that the Baker, his wife, and seruant should be put to the Racke. They appeale. C There followed a second decree in regard of the Baker: and as for his wife and seruant, it was ordained they should haue the Racke presented vnto them, the which was done. And after the deniall of the Baker, his wife and maide, there followed another sentence, allowing the reception of the ordinary Processe, and yet restrained that in case no greater proofes being found on the ordinary Racke, the accused should preuaile, yet they should haue no charges, damages, nor interest adiudged vnto them. In Iune following, God hauing suffered that two theues, whereof the one called Iohn Bazana had murdered this Proff, were apprehended by the Iustice, and by the testimony of Bazana the act was confessed. So as the Baker and his wife pretend themselves freed by this testimony, and demand an honourable reparation, with some recompence from the mother of him that D was murdered, saying, That the accusation being false, she ought to be iudged a Slanderer. Wherein it seemes, that innocency presents it selfe at the feet of Iustice, and cries out for them, as Dauid in the seuenth Psalm, entituled Siggaion, that is to say: The ignorance of Dauid, the which is his defence against the slanders of Semei, where he exclaimed in denying and forswearing the Impostures of his aduersarie, and in saying, that hee knew not what it was, he spake these words: If I haue committed such a fact, if there be iniquity in my hands, that I may fall before mine enemies. Excellent words, and deliuered in the kinde of an oath. In like case a poore Host Plaintiffe complains, and may say with Agur the Sonne of Iake, Truly I am more brutish then any man whatsoever, I haue no understanding, neither haue I learned any wisdom, nor attained to the knowledge of holy things. The wit of man will maintaine the infirmity thereof, but who will support a grieved mind? E The Accuser at the first seemed iust in her cause, but the Accused come to purge themselves, and haue found out the truth. The words of Slanderers (saith the wise King) are ambushes of blood, but the mouth of truth shall deliuer them. You see an Host and Hostesse accused of inhospitality, of infidelity, and of the murder of their Guest, a crime so farre from the manners and hearts of the French, as if Euripides said among the Grecians:

That it was not for the Achaeans to murder their Guests.

Wee may say with the Plaintiffs, with as much or more reason, That it is not vsuall among the French to murder their guests: for among ciuill people, our Coelticke Nation hath beene most renowned for hospitality, a vertue proper to the French, and recommended by many Strangers; yea by Parthenius a Greeke Author in his booke of the Affections of Loue, where hee saith in the History of Eurippus, that at what time the Gauls made roads into Ionia, the Celtes received their guests willingly, and entertained them courteously. The which is confirmed by Saluianus a Priest of Marzeilles, in his Prott. 30.

A his booke of the providence of God, where among the vertues of our Nation, hee tearmes them Frances hospitaliers. It was therefore a great crime, vnfit for the Plaintiffs: a crime for Barbarians, Pagans, and Infidels, worthy of extraordinary punishment, and so much the more punishable, for that it had beene committed in Paris, the chiefe City of the Realme, the seat of our Kings, the place of Soueraigne Iustice, whereas the most holy and reuerend Senate of the world is resident: the Court of Peeres, and the great Parliament of our great King.

The Husband accused in this Parliament, and not only accused, but iudged and tormented in body and mind, comes this day in Iudgement as a man reuiued againe by his innocency, he brings his wife with him, and saith against the Accuser, I haue which slandereth his neighbour, is like vnto a false witness, which is as a hammer, a sword, and a sharpe arrow. B Although he be borne poore and miserable, yet is he of a pure and innocent life. That his soule and that of his Wives are no lesse precious before God then the richest: that they haue not wronged any man: that they haue liued content in their poverty (Poverty which is a singular gift of God, and vknowne of men) and yet they being poore and innocent haue been afflicted: a thousand feares haue seized on them, and the life both of the husband and wife haue been in danger. The Sonne hath been heard against the Father, all the family defamed, fearing to lose their credit, and to see no more good dayes: to haue no meanes to get their liuing, nor to shew themselves. The troublesome griefe of a murtherfull prison, deprived of light, and cast into an obscure dungeon fit for Murderers: so liue C oftentimes, and to dye as often. The Racke giuen vnto the husband, and presented to the wife: all danger, all griefe: their eyes dried vp, their minds oppressed, apprehension of Nakednesse, Hunger, and death, yea and of an ignominious death. They demand this day, that which the men vniuittly tormented in the Iustice of Athens demanded: that the Altar of mercy might be adorned with a Monument, carrying a declaration of their innocencie. They doe moreover pretend reparation against the Accuser, and this demand is not new nor strange, there are many Presidents of the like, among the which there is one very famous in the Declarations of Marcus Seneca the Rhetorician.

A Father hauing two Sonnes, goes into a farre country with one of them, the sonne D returns alone: his brother accuseth him of Parricide: he is condemned, but by reason of some festiual dayes the execution is deferred: the Father returns, the brother condemned accuseth his brother of false witnesse, obtaines iudgement, causeth him to be bound, and detaines him according vnto the Law, which said, that a false witness should be prisoner to him whom he had falsely accused. The innocent Brother said, that the Accuser was the cause of Parricide in the person of his Father, and had committed one in that of his brother: the Minister of Iustice had giuen notice vnto the condemned Brother of the comming of his Father: the expected punishment was more grievous then death. It was more troublesome for the condemned man to apprehend it, then to endure it: he laid before his eyes all kinds of Death. And what can I lesse doe (said the innocent) then keep him in E my bonds, that might haue taken away my life? In another famous example, we see another contropertie in the same Author. A Father hauing two Sonnes, deliuereth the one into the others hands, vpon suspicion of Parricide, whereof his Mother-in-law accused him. The accused Brother is cast into an vnrig'd ship: God preserues him from danger: he falls into the hands of Pyrats, and is made their Captaine. The Father makes a voyage by sea, he is taken by the Sonne, whom he had so ill intreated, and the Sonne sends him home into his country. Cestius Pius an eloquent man saith for the innocent brother, That innocency is a strong fort, and a faithfull safeguard in danger. The Sea compassed in the ship, the waues tost it, the tempest diuelt it, yet innocency did assure him: O Sea more iust then their Iudgement! O waues more mild then the Father: what a foule haue you cast into the F Port! and you haue not only saved the Son, but you haue deliuered him into the hands of Pyrats: it was diuinely decreed that the Father should undertake a voyage; that the Iudge should be taken to repent him of his iudgement. A Mother-in-law might accuse, yea and cause her husbands sonne to be condemned of Parricide, but shee could not make him a Parricide, no not in condemning him. The Sonne hereupon said vnto the Father: Behold my innocencie, O father in the sea, which you would not know in your house. And then turning vnto the Iudges, he said, I had rather haue mine innocency iustified vnto you, then vnto my Father. Hereupon Aristotle saith, that by the law of Greece they gaue the right side to the accused:

called: and by the Romane lawes, Iudges are taught to be more inclined to absolve, then A to condemne.

If this be requisite in ciuill causes, how much more in criminall? And the mother which was the Accuser, whom the Demanders say was ill-affected to her sonne when he liued, could the without feare of punishment slander the Complainants, charging them with the vncertaine suspicion of a murther committed vpon the person of her Sonne, so much hated, or at the least not much beloued of her: That if the Demanders bee not exempt from faults, whereunto all men are subiect: yet they may iustifie themselves free from the crime imposed vpon them by the Accuser, being this day purged by a testimonie which God hath caused to be given by a man, the which is so much the more credible, for B that he deposed it neare vnto his death, not speaking to discharge himselfe, but accusing himselfe, and confessing the Murther. These (in summe) be the griefes which the Demanders can propound. It being hard, yea impossible in such cases to speake words that may equall the sorrow.

Contrariwise, the Defendresse a poore mother, saith, or cries out in that sort, as it is not well possible to represent her passion: but wee must paint it out, as Timanthes did counterfeite Iphigenia, with her face couered, a low voice, and a languishing speech. We cannot make you vnderstand what the hath suffered, and doth yet suffer. She hath lamented her absent Sonne, euen when as she accused the Complainants: she thought him to be dead: her feare was grounded vpon presumptions, the which not onely the first, but the last Iudges haue held to be pregnant. A voice was heard from an high, the mother weeping for her Sonne, and would not be comforted. Doubtlesse no kinde of affection of commiseration is like vnto that of a Woman; but amongst women, none so great as that of a Mother. So as God hath compared the remembrance which he hath of Man to that of a Mother. And in truth, mothers haue more then a fatherly remembrance.

Our Defendresse in this case is assisted by the suffrages of Nature: she sighs vpon earth, and fils Heauen with her complaints: her lamentable cries, and her abundance of teares, are her onely defences: the which are so much the better, for that they are natural. A mother who knows not whither to goe, who finds no place to rest in, who seeks her child as if he were yet liuing: who would haue endured his wounds, and dies twice for that the dyed not before her sonne: the implores heauen in lamenting her misery, and desires her end: her sighs moue all men to compassion. Griefe hath seized vpon her soule, and her vnderstanding is nothing else but sorrow. Nothing is more constant then the loue of the Father to his child, and especially of Fathers that haue the instinct of Nature. But mothers haue their affections more violent. If any thing happen vnto their children, it breeds a great alteration in them. Witnesse the iudgement of Salomon, seeking betwix two women, to know the right Mother. So you may see the passion of David when he called his Sonne, My sonne Absalon, my sonne: he was much troubled. But mothers are much more, feeling the same paine they suffered at their birth. And that which afflicts the Defendresse much more, is that the Complainants obiekt against her, that shee loued not her child. That without doubt is insupportable to a Mother. The latter times are miserable, foretold by the Prophets: That Inhumanitie, Inciuilitie, Aftorgie (that is to say, want of loue in the Parents vnto their children, and of children vnto their Parents) should enter into the hearts of men. What say I of men, who are no men, seeing they proue inhumane, cruell, brutish, and vnnatural.

But can it be, that two such contrary passions should intpe in our Defendresse? Could she hate her sonne, and not seeing him any more, complain that hee was dead? Could shee accuse his Host and Hostesse, if shee loued him not Isaiah in his first booke of the Iewish warre, reporting the accusation of Herod against his children, saith, that Saturnus would not condemne the accused, saying: That it was not lawfull for him who had no children to giue sentence of death against another mans children. A speech worthy of a graue Romane, but had beene better spoken by one borne in Iudaea: for in former times the Iudges giuen by God vnto the people, were chosen out of the fathers of Families, who had, or had had children, and who by this means knew best the iust affections of fathers loue: The History adds, that an old man at Armes of Herods called Tyron, was so transported seeing a cruell father, as he became almost mad, going from place to place, exclaiming, that Iustice was troden vnder foot. Truth was perished, Nature confounded, and all was full

- A full of iniquitie: with such like speeches as passion made him to vtter. So strange this good old man held this malice, not beleeuing that such neere kinsmen should conspire against their own blood. And therefore it is not to be presumed that our Defendresse being a mother, was otherwise then well affected to her sonne: and what greater proofe of her loue can be giuen, then her accusation against the Complainants? And who can represent the tender affection of Fathers and Mothers, which seale the resemblance of bodies & minds, in the little admirable seale of the Infant, the mothers being much more affectionate to that which proceeds from them then the fathers: What then may be said of the obiection made vnto the Defendresse? Doublelesse false allegations must concur with natural, as l. consilium. 2. de iur. leg. ult.
- B Paulus the Lawyer faith of Confessions: and it is not lawfull for Iudges, especially for such as are Fathers to beleue that a Mother would hate her sonne to the death: especially this poore woman, who making her complaint of the murther, did note one notable circumstance, saying, that her sonne had complained vnto her, that the Demanders were froward Hosts. The which shewes a wit in her complaint, and the loue which she bare to her deare Sonne: remembering the first years of his infancy, being young and the onely child of his Mother. A Sonne whom shee (being his Mother) seeing no more, cried out with the Mother of Lamuel, What my Sonne, what the Sonne of my wombe, what the Sonne of my vnomes? Pro. 28. 25.

This poore mother was perplexed: she sought her sonne, and found him not. A sonne which was but simple, and might easily be wronged, for he went alone: he had money, he left it in his chamber, which was a bait for theeuces, his Host and Hostesse laid hand on it, they suffered men to enter into his Chamber: men whom they knew not. What might the mother thinke of this? Had she not reason to say, that they had slaine him. Truly it was said in the booke of Wilehome, That the iustice of the righteous shall deliuer them. It is also written, That the disloyall shall be taken for their iniustice, and the wicked shall be the ransom of the iust, and the disloyall for the righteous. May not then this poore woman thinke with reason, that you are not to haue any regard to the demanders, vnder colour of their base condition, seeing that for a piece of bread they would haue committed the deed, hauing taken their guests money who trusted them. These be the reasons by the which the poore D Mother may iustifie her selfe, that shee hath not attempted any accusation, for the which she should be charged with slander.

Let vs now come vnto the Iudges. They need no other excuse, nor defence of their Decree, then the authoritie of the soueraigne iudgements: yet we may say, for the truth which they had of the proofes, if not full and cleare as the noone day, yet they were such as the presumptions were vehement. If the accused suffered, it came from themselves, for they obserued not the precept which teacheth man: Above all to keep his heart pure, from whence life proceeds. They haue applied their hearts to desire an other mans goods, resembling those that erre either through want of instruction, or by their great indiscretion, or hating their hearts pierced with the dart of enuieusnesse. And therefore it is no wonder if they E haue not appeared in iudgement with a constant countenance. For blessings are vpon the head of the iust; but extorsions stop the mouth of the guilty. Doe you not see, that God was not with the accused? They were confounded in their owne speeches. Life and death are in the power of the tongue, he that loues it shall eate the fruits thereof. They haue said too much charging the Mother, of hatred to her Sonne. And who will not beleue but the iudges (seeing the Processe) made their prayers vnto God to open their vnderstandings. The doubt which they had of the circumstances of the charge, hath beene fortified by examples, the which are the first encounters that come vnto the minde. In this City, a Woman dwelling neere to Saint Oporsune, was slaine with a hammer, which two theeuces had taken in a Smiths shop. The Smith being condemned, hee was put to the Racke. Afterwards the theeuces were apprehended for other crimes, and freed the Smith who was already executed. Iudges in coniectural causes, erre against their wils: being bound to follow the probable, for that which may happen, or hath happened. Sometimes there are bad Hosts, and murderers. It is dangerous said Phadrus to beleue, but it is more dangerous not to beleue.

There is no reason then to heare the complaints of the accused, against the Iudges. Witnesse that which that wise King hath written, whose words are like vnto deepe springs which cannot be dried, and from whence we draw profit for all affaires, and especially cially for iudgements. To condemne the iust is not good, nor to strike Princes that haue caried themselves iustly. An excellent sentence, agreeing with our cause. Hee called Iudges, Princes: and in another place they are tearmed Gods. That if God making his iustice to shine, hath since discovered the murder, yet hath not the Baker nor his wife any cause to complaine of the Court. The eye of God infuseth his knowledge into the spirits of men, in such measure as he pleaseth, giuing vnto some a nearer light, and as Synecius Bishop of Cyrene said) more approaching vnto things which he doth reueale to others farther off. We take moisture from the water, heate from the Fire: firmesse of the body from the earth, and spirit from the aire: but iustice comes from God, who is the onely fountaine of all good. We haue not this iustice in vs, be it for the good of our selues, or for the perpetuall and constant duty which wee owe vnto our neighbours, to doe euery man right. God onely knoweth all things, and all is hidden from vs, but what hee pleaseth. There is none but he, which knoweth hidden things. It is he whose admirable name is above all other names. It is he whom Daniel calleth a Certaine, (by the word Palmoni;) of whom the admirable name of Iesus the Saviour of the world, was not reuealed, before that hee was made man. That Sunne of Iustice whose glory is incomprehensible. It is hee, who by his light doth open the Iudges eyes when it pleaseth him: to the end they should take care of the innocent, and looke vnto his estate.

Pro. 37. 19.

It is written in the booke of the wise King: That euen as in the water one face is opposite to another, so doth the heart of man vnto man, so as oftentimes the Iudge discouereth the truth of a crime, by the countenance, as well as by the mouth of the accused. And to that purpose the same King saith; That Counsell in the heart of man is like to a deepe water, the which a wise man shall draw forth. But this doth not often happen, but vnto the King: of whom the wise man saith; There is no prophesying but in the Kings lips, and his mouth shall not stray from iustice. God giues this priuiledge to a iust King. There are many thoughts in the heart of man, but the onely Counsell of our Lord God is firme. And therefore Saint Augustine in his booke of the Cite of God in the Chapter which he hath expressly made, touching the errours of humane iudgements, makes a complaint of the perplexities whereunto Iudges are reduced: when to saue an innocent they are forced to condemne the accused vnto the racke, and for an vncertaine fact, they cause him to suffer a certaine paine. The which he executing saith: That a wise Iudge doing not things with a will to hurt, but by necessity to iudge that which he knoweth not, must cry vnto God: deliuer mee from my extremities and cares. The which hee speaks not to blame the racke: for hee knowes it to be necessary. But if it be not (as wee cannot rightly say) done by malice, yet it is a great misery. And doubtlesse if it be a mischiefe, yet is it ordained by good lawes, practised in all countries, whereas iustice is well administred, whereof there are so many Statutes, not onely in this realme, but in the Estates of Italy, and in the neighbour Countries, as in Piedmont, in Sauioy and other parts of Christendom, as there is no reason to doubt thereof. Neither is it lawfull to argue the Iudges of rigor in this cause: for besides the presumptions which might moue them, who knowes whether the accused had committed some other crime, whereof God would suffer this accusation, (whereof they now complaine) should be the punishment: There are some generation which thinke to bee free, and yet they are not cleansed from their filthinesse. And what is he that can say, I haue purged my heart, I am cleansed from my sinne. If thou sayest, we did not know it, hee that weighs the heart shal not be understand it and reward every man according to his works. In another place the wise man saith, that, He which walketh innocently shal be saved, but the peruerse, walking by two wayes, shal fall. Aristotle speaking of the Iudges of Greece, said that they were accustomed before sentence, to swear that they should iudge, by the best aduice they could conceiue. The which Demasthenes in his Oration against Arifocrates hath said by the most iust aduice. In which case although the Areopagites did sometimes iudge against the law, yet could they not bee reprehended to haue gone against the oath taken by them to iudge well, whether it were in the Senate, or in the assembly which they call Helias: no man being able to answer but for his owne conscience. And for this reason by the lawes of Charlemagne, and of Lewis the gentle: It was not lawfull to blaspheme, that is to say, to accuse of false iudgement, and to blame the Earles, (which was the title of Iudges in France) if it did not appeare that they did iudge either by enuy, or by some bad occasion. To conclude, the Iudges which those Princes called Fidels: were held for good, and without blemish, when

Capitulum
lib. 6. cap. penult.

A when they were onely guided by the zeale of true iustice. So the Demanders do not complaine of the Iudges, but of the accuser, against whom if he had framed her accusation maliciously, she were then subiect to that which was decreed by the Capitulary, which saith, That they which haue accused innocents, either before the Prince, or before the Iudge, if they were spiritual men, they are to be degraded, if they be lay-men, they must bee condemned to the like punishment, which they should haue suffered that were accused. But this isto bee vnderstood of accusations wherein there is malice, in which case the false Accusers deserue that which the accused suffered: for the slanderer resembles the wicked, which are represented by the wife man: watching secretly for the innocent, and persecuting him without a cause. In which case such as slander to vex, and to get money, by the Constitutions of the Roman Emperors, were punished with the same punishments.

It is therefore no reason that the Complainants should trouble the defendresse for the accusation, seeing it was not with any intent of slander: but they must take their troubles as an accident sent of God. We must not vsc the inhumanity of Gneus Piso although hee were an vpright man; but hauing not the true rule of reason, he tooke rigour for a resolution of feuerity, who being aduertised that two Souldiers going forth together, the one was returned without his companion, hee condemned him as a murderer of him that was absent: and as the condemned man was in the hands of the Executioner at the place of Iustice, his companion (whom they held to be dead) returned. This rigorous Iudge hearing that the Officer had protracted the execution, he caused him to be apprehended, and to be brought vnto the Scaffold, and with him the companion, taking for a pretext that he was the cause of this mischiefe by his absence, and to him hee added the Officer, iudging him worthy of punishment, for that he had brought backe the first condemned, whom he should haue presently executed according to the sentence. It is not fit in all causes to stand so strictly vpon iudgements, as Alexander the Great did, who had rather pay a fine for Athenodorus then remit it: for sometimes a tempter of humanity is commendable, as in this case: Imitating the example of Prince Titus; the sonne of Vespasian, when hee deliuered Iosephus out of prison, laying vnto the Emperour his father, after that hee had commanded the prisoner to be vnbound: It is reason, O Father, that with his bonds the dishonor should be taken from Iosephus, for he shall bee as in the beginning he had not been bound. But if we vnbinde him, wee must cut the chaine, for so they vse them that are vniuicly bound. A speech of a worthy Prince, witnessed by the History of Iosephus, worthy to be spoken before a great King, and well approoued of by the Emperour: As true lips please Kings, and they loue him that speaks iust things with a pure heart.

And therefore to make an end of the plaintiffs misery with that of Iosephus; the Court if it please, hauing in some sort regard vnto their request, shall let them at Liberty declaring them innocents of the crime of hospitalitie violated, and of the murder whereof they haue beene accused, without adiudging vnto them any Reparation, Charges, Damages, and interest against the Accuser, seeing the hath not, nor cannot be iudged a slanderer. So either party obtaining what they may hope for by reason, things iudged shall remaine in their authoritie, and, *God who holds the Kings heart in his hand as little brookes of running water, inclining to his will, shall make him raigne happily, and his posteritie after him, as all good Frenchmen and true Christians doe wish by a happy mariage, so as our great Henry the fourth, sitting in the throne of Iustice, or represented by the Councillors, maintaining his Countries, shall disperse all danger by his looke: and euery one will say with Salomon, the beloued of God; *That the fear of the King which iudgeth the poore iustly shal be firme for euer.

The sentence of the Court vpon these pleadings pronounced by the first President; on Monday the 17 of Ianuary, was conformable to the conclusion, taken by the Aduocate for the Kings Attourney General. The King and the Duke tooke great pleasure to hear them; Both gaue their opinions on them that had best pleaded, but above all, they commended the equity of the Court, which dismissed the parties free from further suit. The King at the Dukes request granted a pardon to a poore woman an Adulteresse that was condemned to die, whose Adulterer had beene executed for that hee had abused her being a house-hold seruant, and so had the beene in like sort, but that she was found with Child.

This Pardon was granted by the King vnto the Duke, notwithstanding any opposition

tion made by the Court and the Kings Council, shewing the Kings consequence thereof. A His Maieſtie would haue it paſſe of his absolute authoritie: Yet vpon condition that the ſhould liue in perpetuall priſon, and nouſiſht at her husbands charge. All theſe good receptions, all theſe exerciſes, all theſe paſſimes, did not make the Duke forget the care of his affaires, he had ſaid vnto Monſ. de Villery, That hee was not come to yield up the Marquiſate. The King on the other ſide being at Fountainbleau ſaid vnto him, That hee ſhould bee always his friend, but he would haue his Marquiſate. The Duke was aduertified that the King had ſaid priuately in his Cabinet, That the Duke was a brave and a gallant Prince, yet he kept his Marquiſate. Theſe words made him preſume that the report which the Chenahier Breton and Ronces had made vnto him (that the King was deſirous to ſee him, and that they ſhould agree) was not true, for whenſoeuer the Duke ſpake to the King in priuate touching that buſineſſe, hee deſired him to reſerre it to their Councils.

And though this was a very important buſineſſe, yet the King had one which did preſſe him neerer, which was his marriage.

Being aduertified (as we haue formerly ſhewed by Sillery his Ambaſſador at Rome, that the Pope had granted his deſire touching the nullity of his marriage, hee ſent Alineour (gouernour of Pontoise) to thanke him, and to aſke his aduice vpon the alliance hee deſired to contract with the houſe of Florence. Hee came to Lyons, to paſſe to Auignon by the Riuer of Rhodne, and ſo to Antibio whither the ſtate of Genoa ſent him a Galley well appointed to conſult him to their Citie, where hee was received with all the honours, fit for the greatneſſe of the Prince that ſent him, and worthy of the credit and reputation which the name of Villery caries among the friends of this Crowne. They did caſt lots there where he ſhould be lodged, which fell to the Palace of Grimaldy, where he was deſtroyed two dayes at the charges of the State.

The Ambaſſadour of Spaine went to viſit him. Hee went to the Senate, was ſeated in the Dukes place, and ſaw the order they held in their Councils and deliberations, where they granted him libertie for two Gallies Frenchmen, that were in the Gallies of the Seigneury; the one was a Pariſian, and the other a Lionois, which they eſteemed a fit ſauor to gratifie a Prince. He went on his voyage in poſt to Rome, the Ambaſſador met him with a great number of French Gentlemen: hee lodged him in his houſe, D and the ſecond day of his arrival he had audience of the Pope. Hee continued in Rome vntill Eaſter: during his aboad, hee did ſee the Viceroy of Naples make his entry into Rome, coming to doe homage vnto the Pope for the Realme of Naples, preſenting vnto him a white ſteed, for an acknowledgement of the fee, for the ineffectuall of Naples, for that it is one of the Realms which holds in fee and doth homage vnto the Church at Rome, and for that reaſon (beſides the eight thouſand Ounces of gold which they owe yearly) they are bound to take armes for the defence of the Church. They had their part alſo of the fruits of the Holy year, during which time many Frenchmen and others of the religion went to ſee for curioſities ſake, without any feare of the Inquiſition, whoſe iuriſdiction doth ceaſe in the year of lible: many great perſonages from diuers parts E of Europe went to this lible; among the chiefe was the Duke of Bar, who went in a diſguiſed habit, to get abſolution, for that he had bin married againſt the rules of the Church, and without diſpenſation of the degrees of conſanguinitie that were betwixt him and the Kings Siſter; for which cauſe the Biſhop of Lorraine reſuſed him the Holy Sacrament, and held him for excommunicate. The King aſſiſted this Princes humilitie and ſubmiſſion with his Letters of ſauour to diuers Cardinals. The Duke of Sauoy was not pleaſed with the long delays of the Court, hee complained that hee was intreated with too great rigour. The Duke thought to finde a King of Complements: And the King a Duke more eaſie to reſtore that which he held. The Duke couered his diſcontent with ſilence and diſcretion. In the end they agree to treat of their affaires and differences by F Deputies: For the King were named the Conſtable, the Chancelor, the Marſhall Biran, the Marquis Rhoſny and Villery. For the Duke, Bely his Chancelor, the Marquis of Lullins, Jaſon the Earle of Moret, and Alimes. The Kings Deputies demand reſtitution of the Marquiſate of Saluces, in the ſame eſtate it was in when the Duke ſurprized it: The Dukes firſt propoſition was to haue the King renounce the protection of Genueua, the which was not (ſaid they) comprehended in the Treaty of Peace, in ſpeciall words, as other townes. This did much offend the King and his Council. The Duke in- treated

the King and Duke.

A treated the Popes Nuncio to make this propoſition who (hauing his ſoule as free from craft and diſſimulation, as it was full of zeale and integrity) found meanes to ſpeake vnto the King without trouble or alteration. He ſaid that there was a meanes to vaine the extremities of their wils: for the ſame reaſon which required the Duke to reſtore the Marquiſate, did not hinder his Maieſty from the enioying of that which did belong vnto him. It is true (ſaid the King.) There the Nuncio replied: The towne of Genueua belongs to the Duke; and nothing hinders him from ſetting the authority which his Predeceſſors had there, but the power of your protection.

Is it not then reaſon that if you will haue him reſtore the Marquiſate which is yours, B you ſhould ſuffer him to enioy the towne of Genueua which is his: the King to be ſpeedily freed of this argument, answered, That things were different, that hee had not made the protection of Genueua. It was a treaty whereunto he was bound by faith, for the reuerence hee did beare vnto his Predeceſſors, who had made themſelves Protectors of that Common-weale, from whom they had receiued ſervice in their neceſſities. And hee would neuer oppoſe himſelfe againſt the firmeſſe of their promiſes. The Nuncio ſayes preſently vnto the King. As you will not leave the protection of Genueua, for that it was made with your Predeceſſors, in like ſort the Duke is not bound to yeeld you the Marquiſate of Saluces, for that hee tooke it not from you, but from the deſeſted King. Our difference, replied the King, although (for my part) it conſiſts of many points, is reduced onely to that C which concerns the Marquiſate of Saluces: The vſurper muſt reſtore: the Duke of Sauoy hath vſurped my Marquiſate, there is nothing that doth free him from reſtitution. I hold nothing of his, and therefore muſt not reſtore him any thing. I will neuer hinder him from hauing reaſon of Genueua, ſo as he get it without armes: for when he ſhall come thither with force, I will alwaies reſolue of that which I ought. He thinks that if I ſhould abandon that towne, he might force them to acknowledge him: but I ſhould purchaſe in abandoning them much blame, it being againſt the honour of this Crowne, and the firmeſſe of a Kings word.

The Duke had reaſon to affect this place: hee might make a great Bulwarke there of againſt the Suſſes, to recover that which they did hold from the ancient Houſe of Sauoy, D and to make all things difficult for the French, among the Cantons: This propoſition of Genueua was razed out of the Dukes articles, and no more ſpoken of in the Aſſembly of the Deputies. They did preſſe the reſtitution of the Marquiſate, or the exchange of the Countries of Breſſe, Pignerol, and Sauillan, with ſome valles of the paſſage of Piedmont. The Deputies aſſembled but once. The Duke foreſeeing what the iſſue would be, and hauing vnderſtood that the Chancelor ſpeaking of the reſtitution of exchange, had ſaid that they muſt paſſe that way or by the ſword: he let the King vnderſtand, that too many deaſt in the buſineſſe, and that it ſhould be ſooner ended, if but one did faithfully report the intentions of either part. The Patriarke of Conſtantinople was employed therein, but the Duke diſliked thereof.

E He reſolved to free himſelfe of theſe difficulties, and to runne the hazard and ſhame of the reſuſall. Then he preſented his firſt propoſition of the Empire and Duchy of Milan: giuing him very plauſible meanes, if they had beene as eaſie in the execution as in the diſcouſe: ſhewing, that for all the fruit of the conqueſt, he deſired nothing but to hold the Marquiſate of Saluces. Whereunto the King answered: That he was neither of that age, nor his affaires in that eſtate that King Francis his were, when he aſpired to the Empire. That there was not a Duke of Saxony nor a Landgrauce priſoner, to giue him the title of Protector of Germany, and of the Princes priſoners, as vnto King Henry the ſecond. If a King of France ſhould be ambitious of any thing greater then his Crowne, it might be an Empire, but not in the eſtate that it is now: the title of an Emperour being little more then F that of a Duke of Venice, but as it was vnder Augustus when as Rome (which commands but ſeuen hills) had reduced all the world vnder one Empire, or at the leaſt as it was vnder Charlemagne.

As for the Duchy of Milan, the King ſaid that the enterpriſe was tedious, and the iſſue vn certaine, as of all other deſignes, and for the meanes which the Duke diſcouered vnto him, there was nothing ſo eaſie which the King of Spaine might not make difficult, hauing both land and ſea at his command to hinder him. Beſides, it was the nature of a ſtroke of warre, ſtill to produce vnexpected difficulties. You alone (ſaid the King) cannot ſuc-

1600 cour me, I know not how my men will agree with yours. And if things should succeed A according to your desire, I know not what should become of the fruit of the conquest. I have enough to doe in my Realme without thinking of others. The peace is but in the flower, the vent of such a designe would waite it. I will have no warre with the King of Spaine, unless he be weary of peace. Brother, you have no need of my counsell, but affection commands vs sometimes to give it to him that doth not aske it. I would counsell you to live in good termes with him. If there were any troubles betwixt you, I would not meddle but to reconcile you. I have too much care of the honour of my word, to breake a peace so iust and so necessary, without a precedent injury. If I did it, I should make my selfe the argument of all the complaints of Christendome, the discourse of other Princes, B the cause of a foraine warre, and the renewing of infinit calamities. It were an indiscretion for me vpon a vaine and imaginary hope, to lose the assurance to recover mine owne, wherewith I content my selfe without seeking anothers. The desires which are infinit, are unworthy of a iust Prince, they are proper to tyrants, who reigne without law, and live without feare: If I had any will to that which you propound, there should not need so many words, but having no will to it, it is in vaine for me to speake of it.

None of these words could content the Duke, but dissembling his discontent, he answered: If I should reape no other good by my voyage but to have scene so great a Prince whose valour and greatnesse is greater then the report, I should not be grieved. True it is, that the estate of my affaires should not have perswaded me to have come without the assurance of my Ambassador, that I should receive more of your Maiesties free will, then I C could expect of the Popes sentence, and that you would not so much preiudice the restitution, but would be satisfied with a more gentle composition. I have offered you the meanes, which lead to so great and so worthy effects, as the Marquitate of Saluces is nothing in comparison of them. You find difficulties therein. There is no great enterprise, can bee without them, but being well resolved, it is halfe executed. A courage like vnto yours finds nothing difficult, and all Europe admires your actions, having made that which was impossible possible. And seeing that I must attribute it, not vnto the violence of reason, D but to my vnhappyneesse, that I cannot perswade a thing, which in his glory and profit carries his owne perswasion: I beseech your Maiesty to intreat mee, as your most humble servant and kinsman, who desires no greater happinesse for his chieft to bee yours. They are already by the lawes of nature, they are by my will; and shall be more by the fauours of your bounty. For one Marquitate, you bind many Princes, and by the inuincing of one of my children, all the House of Sauoy shall be bound vnto you: your Maiesty will say, that you make not such large gifts: but you must consider if you please, that many vertues are common to men, but this belongs onely to Kings. As it is more royall to give then to take: and they wrong the greatnesse of their courage, if they should not give great things: and to give a thing that is litigious and doubtfull, you shall purchase an immortal right of Soueraignty.

He added many reasons for the execution of the enterprise, with such vehemency, as he B seemed to have some secret to make mountaines remoue and dry vp riuers. The King considered that there was no profit but for the Duke, and that the fruit which (at the least) he promised himselfe in keeping the Marquitate of Saluces, would be more certaine to him, then the conquest of Milan vnto the King. If the Duke of Sauoy could have engaged the King, he knew well how to crosse him in the execution. All the danger hee could apprehend, was the King of Spaines indignation: but hee might as easily returne into fauour without speaking a word, as he came away without bidding him farewell, for what should have hindered him, when as the French had bin farre engaged in Italy, to haue ioynted with the Spaniards to expell them, and to breake the bridge of his assistance, whereby hee had made them to passe.

The Duke seeing that he could not obtaine any thing of the King, but that he must make a double recompence for the Marquitate, he continued a while in doubt of his returne, as hee alwayes repented him of his coming. The King desirous to free him of all cause of distrust and apprehension, that should force his will, to promise that which he would neuer hold, sent him word, that he should not trouble himselfe with the resolution of his Council: for he should neuer be forced but by the right of armes, and that hee should alwayes haue time to thinke of it, and to returne to Turin with his will as free, as when he came

The Duke of Sauoy pleased.

A came to Paris. The Duke not able to see clearly with his owne eyes, nor to distinguish of these difficulties, aduised thereof in his Council. But as the eyes troubled with those diseases the Physicians terme Hypostagma and Ictere, haue the operation of the sight so troubled as they cannot well iudge of colours, all obiects seeming vnto them yellow or red: Euen so when Princes Councils are subject to any passion, they giue counsell accordingly; nothing presenting it selfe vnto them, but through the false sight of opinion and choller, which doth alwayes make the bodies seeme bigger then they are. So in the Council of this Prince, those which desired warre, sayd: That neither the restitution of the Marquitate, nor the exchange of Bresse might be accepted, and that a good warre should bee more honourable.

B But a shamefull composition: others hauing no other passion then peace, aduised him vnto it at what price soeuer, fearing, that if the King should not receive that satisfaction from them which he expected, hee would stay them. The Duke grew into choller, and would haue departed without taking his leaue. The most aduised of his Council told him, that his departure in that sort, would make him a scorn to all the Princes of Italy; Spaine would laugh at him; France would be scandalized, that all Europe would hold him the cause of this warre, and in this war of a world of miseries. That there needed no other Herald to proclaim warre against him; which would be in the midst, and in the toure corners of his Estate, before that he passed the riuier of Rhoeane. That he shewed the greatness of his courage to vanquish all these difficulties, and wisdom to dissemble his contents. That wisdom should make the entry to a business, seeing that repentance is fruitlesse in the end. That if he had not foreseene the end of his voyage, he should by his constancie mitigate the feeling, and represent vnto himselfe, that to come into a goodly plaine all covered with flowers, he was forced to passe over a narrow and vneuen plancke. The Duke answered, I will neuer passe it. Leaving his Council in suspence, that he would make as dishonourable a departure, as his arrival had bene honourable, yet through the prayers and perswasions of some of the Kings good seruants, the Duke resolved to depart as he came. But it was not without complaining that they intreated him with too much rigour: that there was no courtiesie in France for him: that friendships were rare, finding least in them where he thought it did most abound: that they did force him to formes D that were too preiudiciall, and that they had made him to hope for things which they now refused him: and that his Ambassador had deceived him. The King knowing that Cheualier Breton had let the Duke of Sauoy his Master vnderstand that his Maiesty desired he should come vnto him: hee said vnto him, I haue beene mistaken, and that hee did neuer speake it.

True it is, that he had said, that he hoped the Duke should not return, but they should be agreed. The Duke seeing that wisdom must moderate the rigour of necessity, he tooke another course, and resolved, seeing hee could get nothing else, to make his profit of the time, and of his abode: that he might haue meanes to vnitte that which he had disioyned with Spaine. Foreseeing they would soone giue him leaue to bee gone, for already they E sayd in iest in the Anti-chamber, That they must send him away by an Edict. Hee had therefore found a fauourable pretext for his stay. He was (or made shew to bee) in loue with one of the rarest beauties in the Court, and seemed not to care for all other affaires in respect of her. There were two solemne Feasts at Paris, which followed one another, Saint Germaines sayre, and Shrouetide. It was giuen out, that hee would see them before his departure. In the meane time he makes no haste, although hee did not much aduance in his affaires. There were daily new propositions, and the last were more vnpleasing vnto him then the first.

The Kings seruants were of opinion, that they should giue this Prince as little cause as might be to distrust him of his voyage, and to giue him time to consider whether he should consent to the exchange or the restitution: for that it was a thing (as he sayd) which hee could not doe without conference with his Council, and the aduice of his Vassals. The King hauing had the opinion of the Princes of his blood and others, and of the chiefe officers of the Crowne, would no longer forbear to acquaint him with his resolution, commanding Sebastian Zamei (one of his Maiesties confident seruants) to tell it him: the which hee did so artificially, as before he left the Duke, he drew from him a writing of the principal conditions of the Treaty by the which were drawne the Articles of the restitution of the Marquitate, or of the exchange. But to the end that the Duke should not thinke that the

the King should precipitate his Councels, he gave him three months time to choose either of the two conditions of the treaty, either by restitution or the exchange. Whereupon the Duke signed the Articles following.

Articles of the Treaty of Paris.

1. That the Duke of Sauoy should restore the Marquisate of Salusses vnto his Maiefty by the first day of the month of Iune next following, to vie and enioy it as the Kings his Predecessors had done, when it was in their hands, without any delay or difficulty, grounded vpon any colour or pretext whatsoever.

2. And his said Maiefty doth promise and grant vnto the said Duke, not to giue the Charge and Government of that Country, to any one that he shall haue occasion to hold for enemy.

3. In like sort to employ Suisses in the guard of the Townes and Places thereof, except in the Castles where his Maiefty will place French Capitaines and Souldiers, or such as he shall thinke good.

4. Notwithstanding, his Maiefty doth not meane to be bound to continue the Suisses in the said townes, but for the time that the compromise shall continue, made in the person of his Holinesse, hereafter declared and specified.

5. Or else the said Duke shall yeld and deliuer to his Maiefty, for a recompence of the Marquisate of Salusses, by the first day of Iune next ensuing, all the country of Bresse, lying from the riuier of Saone vnto that of Dain, which riuier of Dain shall remaine in common betwixt his Maiefty and the said Duke, either of them to enioy it of his side, comprehending in the said Country the towne and Citadell of Bourg, and other places that depend thereon, Barcelonnette with his Vicariate or Deputiship, vnto Argentiere, the Vale of Sture; that of Perouse, with all that depends thereon; with the towne and castle of Pignerol with his territorie, vpon condition that his Maiefty shall transport vnto him all his right and interest to the said Marquisate, provided notwithstanding, that he suffer the inhabitants of the said Marquisate, which haue serued his Maiefty, or shall serue him hereafter, to enioy their goods freely and safely. And in like sort, those that haue serued, or shall serue the said Duke, shall in like manner enioy their goods, as well in the said Marquisate as in any other places that shall be deliuered to his Maiefty by the said Duke, without any alteration before the said delay nor after, to the preiudice of the one or the other, according to the rule which shall be set downe by his Maiefty and the Duke.

6. Moreover, the towne of Cental, Emont, Rogues, Peruieres, Castle Daulphin, and others held by the said Duke, belonging vnto his Maiefty, and in like manner those which his Maiefty holds in Bresse, Sauoy, Barcelonnette, & others belonging vnto the said Duke, shall respectively be restored, at such time as the Marquisate shall be yielded vp: and in case of exchange, those of Bresse and Barcelonnette shall remaine to his Maiefty, as hath bin said, and the rest shall be restored on either side.

7. All which places shall be restored in the same estate they are at this present, neither his Maiefty nor the said Duke be bound to pay nor satisfie the charges made of either part, in the fortification and repairing of the said places.

8. In like sort the Fort of Beche-Daulphin built by the said Duke during the warres, shall be demantled at the same time.

9. The Inventories duly certified of all the peeces of Artillery, Powder, Bullets, and other munitions of warre, which were in the townes and places of the said Marquisate, when the Duke entered it, shall be faithfully deliuered vnto his Maiefty when as the Duke shall choose the one or the other of the said two offers, whereupon his Maiefty shall declare his will for the restitution thereof, the which shall be performed by the Duke, as well in their kinds, as in money, according to the price, which shall be concluded betwixt his Maiefty and the Duke.

10. All Sutes, Iudgements, and Sentences given in iustice, on either side before this present accord (when the parties haue contested voluntarily) shall stand and take effect, whether restitution be made or an exchange of the Marquisate: yet shall it be lawfull for the parties to relieue themselves by prouision according to the order of the lawes.

11. That no search should be made of any impositions, contributions and leuies of money or vituals in the said Country, against such as had appointed, receited, or disposed thereof on either part, vnto this present Treaty.

12. And to the end that the inhabitants of the townes and country which are to be restored

A stored, may not be over-charged nor vniuently vexed, with leuies of money, during the respite granted vnto the said Duke, to make choice of, and to effect one of the said two offers, vnder colour of payment, as well of arrearages of the said impositions, imposed before, and since, the peace of Veruins, as for the pay and entertainment of Capitaines and men of warre, appointed for the guard of the said Marquisate. It is decreed, that there shall be no leauy of money made vpon the inhabitants of the said townes and countries, conformable to that which was agreed vpon, as well by the treatie of Veruins, as by the orders and accords made since, for the payment of the said arrearages and money by the Deputies of his Maiefty and the said Duke, in the beginning of the yeare, for the ordinary entertainment of garisons, appointed for the guard of the said townes and places, and of officers employed in the estates of the said garisons, without any new impositions of either part. And we declare all that shall be done and attempted to the contrary, subiect to restitution and reparation.

13. And whereas the said Duke hath requested his Maiefty to allow and confirme the feoffment made by him, in the Marquisate, in case he shall choose to restore it: his Maiefty doth declare, that being informed of the quality of the feoffments, he would haue that respect to gratifie the Duke, as his seruice would permit him, without being bound to restore that which had bene paid for the said Feoffments, but as it shall stand with his good pleasure.

14. And for as much as the said Duke hath intreated his Maiefty, to giue him time to confer with his vassals and subiects of both parties, before that he accept of the one or the other, his Maiefty desiring to witness vnto him, as well in this, as in all other occasions his good will: doth grant vnto the said Duke his choice, so as he choose and effect the one or the other of the two offers, by the first day of Iune above-named, without diminishing or altering of any thing, or vsing of any euasion, delay, or difficulty, grounded vpon any colour or occasion whatsoever.

15. Whereunto the said Duke hath bound his faith and word, and his Maiefty doth the like for accomplishment and execution of all things, granted by these present Articles which depend thereon.

16. In like sort it hath bene agreed betwixt his Maiefty and the said Duke, that they shall consent, as they doe at this present, after the restitution shall bee really and fully accomplished. If the said Duke makes choice thereof, that our holy Father Pope Clement the eight shall iudge of all Controuerfies that are betwixt his Maiefty and the said Duke, according to that which hath bene agreed vpon by the Treaty of Veruins, and that within in three yeares.

17. Promising to accomplish and performe, faithfully on either part, whatsoever shall be decreed by his Holinesse within the time prefixed, without any delay or difficulty, for what cause or pretext soeuer, as it is concluded by the Treaty of Veruins.

18. And for the greater assurance of the execution of the Treaty, and every poine and article therein contained, the said King and Duke of Sauoy, humbly beseech his Holinesse that as by his good and fatherly exhortations they are entered into this way of accord, that it would please him as a common father, to continue the care which he hath formerly shewed to nourish peace, and to assure a firme friendship betwixt them, and in all occasions that should be offered to interpose his authority for the full and real execution of things promised of either part, as it is contained in this present Treaty.

Made at Paris, the 27 day of February 1600. Signed Henry and Emanuel, and sealed with his Maiesties seale and the Duke of Sauoyes.

Three or foure dayes after this treaty, the Duke tooke his leaue of the King, who ben followed by all the Court conducted him to Pont Charenton, and gave him the Bis-
B ron of Lux, to attend on him out of the realme, with commandment to the Governours of Champagne and Bourgondy, where he should passe, to receite him as his Maiefty.

Whilst he was nere the King he shewed such outward content, and concealed his griefe so cunningly, as his owne people did iudge that nothing could better please him, but being retired, his countenance bewrayed his discontent and the repurance of his voyage. This further he went from the King, the nearer he approached to Spaine, being belated to reconcile himselfe, and to that end he secretly dispatched his Chancellor, being in Caroff, he said sometimes, that he had bene deceived, that the words which they had 1600 had giuen to periwade him to come into France, were ill interpreted: and that as soone as a h should come to Chabery, he would send to beseech the King to prolong the time, in the which he would make choice of the restitution or the exchange.

The Baron of Lux obserued his discourses, and aduertised the King of the Dukes intention, wholly inclined to warre, rather then to performe any part of the treaty. Being vpon Saint Iulians bridge, the Baron of Lux, hauing commandement from the King not to go any farther, tooke his leaue of the Duke, and assuring himselfe that his words should be pleasing vnto him, as he seemed to haue bene content with his conduct, he beseeched him not to transport his heart out of Frances as he did his body, but to cherish the friendship of so great a King dearly, who loued him as his brother. That hee feared, that such as had shewed so great discontent, for the voyage, which his Highnesse had made into France, would reape the profit which he himselfe might enioy. That he would hold their counsels not onely suspect, but dangerous: as passionate men, whose perswasions were sugred poison: who being more ialous of his greatnesse, then desirous of his quiet, would not cease vntill they had diuerted him from the execution of his promises. That if it pleased him to thinke of what was past, and compare it with the present, hee should find that peace was the inexpugnable rampier of his Estates: and that it was a great misery for a Prince to submit himselfe to anothers discretion, beseeching him to beleue that the counsell which he gaue him, was the same which he would giue him, if it had pleased God that he had bene borne his vassall, or one of his Councell.

I take (answered the Duke) that which you say vnto me as of a worthy Nobleman, and thanke you: I acknowledge my selfe so much bound vnto the King, as I would sacrifice my life in exchange of the duty which I owe him: and doe promise neuer to giue him any occasion, to esteeme me other then his most humble seruant and louing kinsman. Men are knowne by their words, as metall by the sound, and flowers by the smell: but commonly Princes words serue but to disguise their inward conceptions, holding dissimulation for a great vertue. Such was the issue of the Duke of Sauoyes voyage. The yeare shall not passe before he taste the fruits. His presence did procure him the condition of exchange, the which the King would not haue granted to his Ambassadors. But hee continued not long in this opinion to performe the one or the other. Going out of the Citadell at Bourg, they found that sorrow troubled his soule, to leaue a place, esteemed one of the strongest in Europe. His outward shew bewrayed his inward discontent. This Prince who could well couer his passions, could not concale the griefe of this exchange, no more then the discommodity of the restitution. Being arriued at Bourg, he sent one poste vnto the King, to thanke him for the honour he had receiued in his voyage, and for the good entertainment which Pralin had giuen him in Champagne, and the Baron of Lux in Bourgundy. He wrote by the same Poste to the Gouverneur of Lyons, imparting vnto him the contentment which hee receiued by the treaty of Paris, and that he went to Chabery, and soone after the feasts, into Piedmont, there to resolute what the King should expect of him.

But he stayed not long before he gaue eare to their perswasions, who fought to depriue him of all happinesse, which hee might promise vnto himselfe by this voyage, assuring him that the comming of the Cont de Fuentes would giue him meanes to free himselfe from the necessity of the exchange and restitution. He dissembled the discontent of his voyage with great art, yet still he did vent out some vapour which made the most iudicious to beleue, that he would be glad to preiudice the King in any thing with the hazard of his owne.

The Commons of France hauing not yet recovered their ruines growne by ciuill wars, and now growing vnder the heauy burthen of taxes and subsidies, and complaining of the abuse of officers in the collection thereof; they were humble suitors vnto his Maiesty to set downe a generall order concerning the taxes, and to reforme the abuses; whereupon the King made this Edict which follows, for the reliefe of his poore subiects.

HENRY by the grace of God, &c. As soone as it pleased God to settle peace in this Realme: we haue cast our eyes with pittie vpon our people growne poore and almost ruined by the wounds and calamitie of long warre; and haue employed all our care to find out the meane, to abate the taxes, and other impositions which are leauied on them, with an intent to make them enioy the fruits which peace is accustomed to produce vnder a good King, when as warre is ended: being more desirous to purchase the name of Father Edict concerning taxes.

1600 A of the people doing them good, then to leaue any remembrance vnto posterity of other more glorious titles which our perils and dangers might make vs merite: but being not able to effect it so speedily as their miseries required, by reason of the excessive charges of this Estate, which could not be diminished but by little and little; nor the ordinary reuenues to furnish it restored to their value, but in giuing some time to the peace established in the Realme, by the speciall grace and blessing of God, to change the face of this great delolation which warre hath left: we haue vpon the complaints often made vnto vs in our Councell, of the abuses in quality, and exactions, which are committed in the leauy and perception of the said taxes, deputed Commissioners, men of quality and known integrity, to informe and punish the offenders, proceed to the reforming thereof, and to giue vs aduice of the meanes which they shall thinke most fit and conuenient to suppress these disorders hereafter, being by their report informed that our subiects haue suffered much oppression by reason of the said abuses and disorders, namely, that equality had not been obserued by the Elzeuz in the diuision of Parishes: and much lesse by the lessors in the taxes of priuate men, whom they haue gratified, surcharged, or exempted at their pleasures, according to their passions and interest; and also by reason of the many tedious and chargeable suites growing amongst them; and the violences, exactions, and thefts, committed by Sergeants employed for the recovery of the taxes, which desiring to preuent as well by good orders, as diminution of the charges, vntill that God giue vs grace to make them feeble more abundantly of our fatherly bounty.

Whereupon there were many articles set downe by his Maiesty, for the reliefe and ease of his poore subiects vpon these taxations and cessments.

The Lords of Silery and Alincourt by the Popes aduice, and the Kings commandement, went from Rome to Florence, to treat a marriage betwixt the King and the Noble Princeesse Mary of Medicis, the which had bene propounded before. This demand was so pleasing vnto the great Duke, as he made no difficulty. The Articles of which Treaty are as followeth.

First, The great Duke doth promise in the name and faith of mariage of the said Princeesse, with her will and consent, as she hath declared vnto the said most Christian King, who in like manner doth promise by the said Lord of Silery, to take for his loyal Spouse the said Princeesse, as soone as might be, according to the Lawes and holy Constitutions of the Church, and doth presently promise to appoint some man of quality with sufficient authority in his name, and as Proctor to his said Maiesty, to wed by words of present the said Princeesse, vntill by the presence of the parties, the mariage might be confirmed and solemnized in the face of our mother the holy Church. In fauour whereof, the great Duke, as well for the singular affection which he beares to the Princeesse his Neece, as for the greatnesse and dignity of the House into the which she is receiued, doth promise to giue in dowry to the said Princeesse, the summe of fix hundred thousand crownes of gold, eury one being seven Liuers, foure Deniers, of the money of Florence, whereof the said King hath already receiued two hundred and fifty thousand crowns payd into the hands of his Treasurers. And as for the three hundred and fifty thousand Crownes remaining, they shall also be paid in ready money, in the towne of Marseille or Lions, when as the said mariage shall be confirmed and solemnized in the Church, as hath bene declared in the premises.

The said great Duke doth also promise to cause the said Princeesse to bee conducted and honourably accompanied at his owne cost and charges, and as is befitting a Princeesse of that qualitie, honour, and dignity, vnto the towne of Marseille, and moreover to giue her iewels and other precious moueables, fit for the dignitie of the said Princeesse, and the House from which she is descended.

In regard whereof it hath bene accorded, that the said Princeesse shall renounce the succession of her father and mother in the best forme that may bee for the contentment and satisfaction of the said Duke her vncler: and to this end the said Princeesse shall haue authority, and the said renunciation shall be confirmed by the said King, when it shall bee required. And at this present the said Princeesse acknowledging freely, that in regard of the said Dowry and Jewels which shall be giuen her, shee is bountifully satisfied for all that which might belong vnto her for her portion, in the succession of her father and mother, and that of her owne free-will shee doth renounce, to the profit and commodity of the said great Duke, and of his descendants males, or of those which shall have interest by reason of the said great Duke, of what degree or quality soever, to all rights, names, reasons, and actions, which she may have, or in any sort pretend, to the said successions, whereof as much as need shall require, the said Princesses shall make session and transport to the said great Duke and to his descendants.

And to assure the said summe of six hundred thousand crownes given in dowry, bee it in case of restitution or otherwise, it hath bene agreed vpon and confirmed, that certaine lands shall be assigned, granted, and given in mortgage, for the assurance, confirmation, and restitution of the said summe of six hundred thousand crownes, which no obligation shall make void: so as by this means the said money may be delivered vnto the said great Duke, or to them that shall have charge from his Highnesse, to bee restored to the said Princesses or to her heyres, as shall be said hereafter: with the interest after five in the hundred, the which shall begin to haue course, and to stand firme & effectuell from the day that the said money shall be restored.

The said most Christian King shall assigne vnto the said Princesses for her Iointer, twenty thousand crownes by the yeare, which shall be payed out of Lands with iurisdiction, whereof the chiefe place shall haue the title of a Duchy, and the rest next vnto it: which places thus assigned to the said Princesses, shall enioy by herselfe or by her officers, with the said iurisdiction: And she shall haue the gift of all offices falling voyd, as the Queenes of France haue accustomed: alwayes provided, that the said offices bee given to naturall Frenchmen. And the said Princesses shall begin to enter into possession of the said lands, as soone as her dowry or ioynter shall haue place, to enioy it during her life, whether that she remaine within the Realme of France, or retire elsewhere. The said King shall also giue vnto the said Princesses, iewels befitting the dignitie of the Queenes of France, the which shall remaine proper vnto her selfe, as things belonging vnto her, and not otherwise. And for the entertainment of the said Princesses, future Queenes of France, during her mariage with the said King, there shall be officers and seruants appointed for the seruice of the said Princesses, in such number and quality as shall bee convenient: and for her charges there shall be a convenient summe appointed, the which shall be payd every three months out of the treasury, according to the order which hath bene obserued by the Queenes. And in case of the dissolution of the said mariage, by the death of the said Princesses without any children, the said King shall restore vnto the said Duke, or to him that shall haue charge from him, the iewels which haue bene given her, according to an inventory that shall bee made, vnlesse shee hath otherwise disposed thereof: and withall four hundred thousand crownes, which are two third parts of the six hundred thousand crownes given in dowry, vnlesse his Maiesty be desirous to enioy the whole summe during his life: In which case the said summe of six hundred thousand crownes shall be fully restored after his Maiesties death. And if the said Princesses leaue any children, issued of the said mariage, the said children shall succede in all the goods, moueable and immoueable which shall be left by her, and that may belong vnto her, the which shall be diuided according to the vse and custome of France. But in case the dissolution of the mariage bee by the death of the King, the said future Queenes pursuing him, whether she haue children or not of the said mariage, the said Princesses shall haue againe all the money, dowry and iewels brought by her: and moreover, those which shall be given her by the said King, excepting alwayes the iewels of the crown, the which are left as it were in guard with the Queenes of France. And in this case the said future Spouse shall also enioy her dowry, and all about mentioned, whether she remaine in France, or make her residence elsewhere at her pleasure.

All which Articles and Conventions haue bene treated and concluded in the name of the said King, by the said Lord of Silery, and by the said Duke as well in his owne name, as for the said Princesses, the said parties promising faithfully to keepe and obserue them in every point, without any contradiction directly or indirectly: and they haue promised to furnish all letters, prouisions, and expeditions necessary for the accomplishment thereof. And so they signed, Silery and Ferdinand Duke of Tuscany.

A greater portion then that of the Lady Elizabeth married into Spaine, who had but 40000 crowns in dowry. The Queen mother had but 30000 crowns of Lewis D. of Vrbins her

A her father: but her mothers inheritance, among the which was the Earldome of Languois, was valued at a million of gold, and the Pope in consideration of the greatnesse of the House, whereunto she matched, gaue her an hundred thousand crowns, and many iewels. She had for her Ioynter but a thousand pounds a yeare.

The Contract was past in the Palace of Pity, the five and twentieth day of April, in the presence of Charles Anthony Putei Archbishop of Pisa, and Virginie Duke of Bracciano. All Florence shewed great ioy thereat, and the Princesses was presently declared Queene of France. She dined publicly vnder a cloth of Estate, the great Duke sitting far beneath her. The Duke of Bracciano gaue her water, and Silery the Kings Ambassador the towell.

B The rest of the day was spent in all kind of sports. Soone after, Monsieur Allencourt went to cary these good newes vnto the King, with the Queenes picture, which the great Duchesse sent him. The King sent Frontenac to serue the Queene as her chiefe Steward, who presented vnto her his Maiesties first Letter, and withall he sent his Portrait to the great duke. The King refused to effect the promils of mariage, as soone as the Duke of Sauoy had performed his, touching the restitution or the exchange of the Marquisate of Salusses, and to goe to Auignon to receiue the Queene: but the Duke was much perplexed what he should doe.

After the Duke of Sauoyes departure, the King went to passe the Lent at Fontainebleau, where there was a great conference betwixt the Bishop of Eureux, and Philip de Mornay Lord of Pleffis Marly, Gouverneur of Saumur, Intendant of the House and Crowne of Nauarre: in the presence of the King, Princes, & Officers of his Crowne, Councillors of State, Prelates, and other Noblemen of marke. It was touching a booke which Monsieur du Pleffis had published of the Institution of the Lords Supper, and against the Masse, wherein the Bishop did taxe him to haue falsified many authorities. Whereupon du Pleffis presented a Petition vnto the King, that his Maiesty would bee pleased to appoint Commissioners to examine every passage of Scripture cited in his booke.

The King yielded to this conference, that the truth might be made cleere against the darknesse of slander, referring the care thereof to his Chancellors. The Commissioners appointed for the Catholikes, were Augustin Thuanus, President of the Court Parliament at Paris: Pitbon, Aduocate in the Court, and Fevre Schoolemaster to the Prince of Conde, in whose absence came Martin the Kings Physitian. And for the other, the President of Calignon, Chancelor of Nauarre, in whose place entred de Fresnes Caney, President of the Chamber of Languedoc, and Casaubon, his Maiesties reader of the Greeke tongue. All singular men in learning and tongues.

This conference beganne the fourth day of May, in the Hall at Fontainebleau. In the midst thereof was a Table of a reasonable length: at the one end sat the King, on his right hand, the Bishop of Eureux, & on the left, right ouer against him, du Pleffis: Pasquier, Pasquier, and Merier, Secretaries of the conference, were at the lower end of the same Table. Somewhat higher on the Kings right hand, sat the Chancelor and the Commissioners. Behind the King stood the Archbishop of Lions, and the Bishops of Neuers, Beauuais and Chastres. On the Kings left hand were the foure Secretaries of State. Behind them which conferred, were the Dukes of Vaudemont, of Nemours, of Mercure, of Mayenne, of Neuers, of Elbeuf, of Aiguillon and Joinville, the Officers of the Crowne, Councillors of State, and other Noblemen of quality. After that all were commanded to keepe silence, his Maiesty hauing said, That the dispute was not betwixt party and party, but particular betwixt the two conferrers: not for any question of right and doctrine, but for the literal truth of some passages: and that he desired they should treat with all mildnesse and moderation, without any bitterness or passion, but that of the truth. Declaring moreover, that he did not meane that this dispute should in any thing alter or disquiet the peace of his F subiects, as the Chancelor did then declare vnto them at large by the Kings commandement.

My Masters, said he, all things worke to worke good in them that are good, if in the businesse which presents it selfe, wee bring spirits of peace and charity, the Gods of peace and charity, will assist our good intentions with his graces. The question is now, vpon that which Monsieur du Pleffis hath giuen the Bishop of Eureux to vnderstand that he will verifie before the King, and such Commissioners as he shall please to depare, all the passages quoted in his Bookes. Whereunto the said Bishop had answered, That he would

of the Bishop of Eu-reux at the beginning of the conference.

" would bind himselfe to shew five hundred falsehoods in his booke against the Masse: That " his Maiesty hath suffered this conference, which is made betwixt two learned men, not to " enter into disputation touching points which concerne Doctrine and matter of Religion,
" the which his Maiesty would not endure without permission from the Pope; but only
" to make cleare the literal truth or falsehood of the said Allegations. And as it is not meant " that there shall be any question made here touching controuersies of religion; in like " manner his Maiesty declares vnto you his firme and certaine resolution, for the obserua-
" tion of his Edict of Nantes, made for the preferuation of the quiet and publike peace. He " wills and commands that this conference may be made without contention, and with all
" the moderation that is requisite in a matter of so great importance: so as the good vnion B
" and correspondency which is so necessary for the generall good of this Estate, and for " every one of vs in particular, may not be in any thing altered, but rather increased by the " mildnesse and modesty which shall be vied on either part, and that we may finish this dis-
" putation with a good resolution to cary our selues and to liue peaceably together, like
" good brethren, friends, & fellow citizens, as his Maiesty now commands vs by his Edict,
" whereof he hath euen now renewed his commandement vnto vs. These words were confir" med by the King, who commanded the Bishop of Eureux to speake and to begin the con" ference, the which he did in these termes.

" Sir, I present my selfe here to obey your Maiesties commandements, and to appeare at " the assignation which Monsieur du Plessis hath giuen me. The offer which I have made was " to shew him 500 false Allegations in his booke against the Masse. Your Maiesty according " to your singular wisdom hath very well concluded that this offer might well be accep" ted without offending either spiritual or temporal lawes, which forbid all priuate persons " to dispute publicly of Religion. For here the question is not to call in doubt the faith of " the ancient Fathers of the Church, or to examine if they have written well or ill; but " whether Monsieur du Plessis hath cited them truly or not. Heretofore Humeric King of " the Vandales hauing called the Catholikes of Africa to enter into disputation with the Ar-
" rians, Eugenius Archbishop of Carthage answered him, That he might not accept of that " combat without the consent of other Bishops, and namely of the Church of Rome, which " was the head of all the Churches. If I at this day forbear to make the like difficulty, it is " not that I cary lesse respect to the Apostolike Sea than that holy Bishop did, about twelue
" hundred yeares since: But for that the question now is for some priuate passages of Mon" sieur du Plessis booke, and not of the generall doctrine of the Church; whereunto the mo" desty your Maiesty hath pleased to vfe in this action hath imboldened me. For you would " not take the incense as the King of Iuda did, who was stricken with a Leprosie, that is to " say, you seeken not to vspurne any Priestly authority, nor to make your selfe a Iudge, or to " appoint Iudges in Ecclesiasticall causes: But onely to call learned witnesses and worthy of " credit, which may testifie the truth of this conference, and in case of difficulty, vpon the " version of words and edition of examples, giue their aduice: imitating therein the piety of " those good Emperours, Constantine, Valentinian, and Theodosius the first and second, who " would neuer attribute vnto themselves the iudgement of controuersies of the faith, but " alwayes referre the decision to them whom God had appointed Pastors and Rectors of " his Church. And therefore vnder the authority of his commandements, I will enter " cheerfully into this conference, hauing first protested that I am not prickt forward by any " spleene against Monsieur du Plessis, whom I respect and honour for his good parts, neither
" doe I pretend to charge him with any falsehood in his booke, but onely them vpon whose " faith and instructions he relied, as shall appeare by the mildnesse and modesty I promi" sed your Maiesty to vfe towards his person.

Discourse
of Monsieur du Plessis
at the conference.

" De Plessis declared, That he was come thither, seeing it had so pleased his Maiesty, to " answer for his booke, which ambition had not caused him to write, but should rather
" haue diuerted him, to preserve his good fauour: but zeale to serue (during his reigne) for
" a holy reformation in the Church, after which many good men haue so long laboured. If it " might any way serue, he should hold himselfe happy, though it were with his great losse;
" if not, that he would haue burnt it, yea with his owne hand. Yet his hope was, that when " he should be equally examined, all men should find that he had carried himselfe faithfully
" and diligently, although it were not to bee held strange, if in five thousand passages or " more, they haue found some wherein his eye, his memory, or his iudgement hath waue-
" red:

A red: yet so, as they did not impugn the truth of that whereof hee treated.

Oh said he, that the bookes of the Doctors of the Roman Church, which haue written within these hundred yeares, were examined with this rigour, how many should you find that could endure this triall? Finally, he protested with his Maiesties leaue, that this act was particular, and could not prejudice the truth of the doctrine of the reformed Churches of that Realme, which had bene before him, and should be after him. And so they entered into the matter.

After the first dayes conference, Monsieur du Plessis fell very sick, as they could proceed no further. The King did write the same day vnto the Duke of Espernon, what had past in this Conference, and shewed by his letter what his iudgement was. My friend, the Disciple of Enreux hath vanquished that of Saumur. Wherewith Monsieur du Plessis was discontented; so as in a discourse which he (or some of his friends) had printed soone after, touching this conference, he termed this Letter, A sparke of fire, and that the Bishop of Eu-reux Fly was made an Elephant.

Some moneths after this conference at Fontainebleau, Canay, one of the Commissioners, and President in the Chamber of the Edict at Castres, a man learned in Phylosophy and the tongues, and well read in the History of the Church, left his profession of the Reformed Religion, and became a Romish Catholike. Many thought that Casaubon the other Commissioner would haue followed the same course: but he left not the world long in this opinion, hauing written vnto the Synod of Ministers assembled at Gargeau, that hee was not so wretchedly instructed in piety, as for want of knowledge of the truth he should suffer himselfe to be caried away with euery humour of doctrine. As the Synod reioyced at the constancy of Casaubon, they grew in choller against the exchange of Canay, who answering the first Letter, they added this exclamation against the second: Oh miserable man, who hath purchased with the losse of firme felicity, the disguised wretchednesse of this world, the which shall hereafter perish both in his life and fight, vntil hee in the end with a feeling he acknowledge that he hath not with reason lost his iudgment, but rather without reason is become foolish. God of his mercy take pity of him, and giue him grace so to weepe for that which he hath committed, that he commit no more that which he must weep for.

D The King had particular aduice that the Duke of Sauoy was intirely what to doe, and that he had sent vnto the Pope, and to diuers Princes and Common-weales in Italy, to let them vnderstand that he had bene forced to the Treaty of Paris: and how much it did import them if this treaty were effected: but he found not their intentions to iumpe with his, neither had he the answer he expedied. His Maiesty had also intelligence of his deepe dissembling, saying sometimes, That he would not restore the Marquisate but by force; sometimes, That he had rather deliuer Bresse then the Marquisate; and most commonly he would say, That he would restore the Marquisate; and that with a double designe. The one was that the King (thinking he proceeded faithfully) would grant him some delay for the restitution of the Marquisate, during the which, and before that the King should leaue an E army, winter should come, the which would hinder the French from attempting of any thing against him this yeare. The other was, to the end that the King of Spaine and his Council (who apprehended about all, the restitution of the Marquisate, for the neighbourhood of the French to the Duchy of Milan) should grant vnto Bely the Dukes Chancelor and his Ambassador in Spaine (whither he had sent him expressly to pacifie the Spaniards, who were offended with the Dukes voyage into France) succours of men and money, in case the King would force him: or else that he might draw some recompence from the Spaniard for the exchange of Bresse with the Marquisate. Bely complains to the Council of Spaine, of the little time which there remained for the restitution of the Mar-quisate to the French. To whom they answered: That armies were not so soon leauey F in France; that he should assure the Duke his Master, that the Cont Fuentes should bee at Milan by August (whereas two millions of gold attended him) with so many men and other provision, as whosoever should seeke to force him, should haue enough to doe to defend himselfe.

The King being well aduertised of all these practises: the first of Iune, being past, by the which the Duke according to the treaty of Paris should restore the Marquisate, his Ma-iesty came to Lions, where the Duke intreated him by his letters to giue him some dayes of respite, and that he would satisfie him by his Ambassadors. Whereupon the King yielded.

Then the Archbishop of Tarantaise, the Marquis of Lullins and Rencas his Ambassadors A came to Lyons, the sixteenth of July, who said unto the King: That the Duke their master did complaine of the Treaty of Paris; That he durst not refuse any thing to his Maie-
 "ste, when as he was in the chiefe City of his Realme; That he might be more blamed for "holding of the Accord, then in breaking it, for the great interest of himselfe, his children,
 "and his countries: notwithstanding, he was ready to yeeld the Marquise, but hee beseech-
 "ed his Maiefty to grant him the inuestiture thereof for one of his fones.

The King answered them: That the Duke had written many Letters vnto him from
 "Chambery and Thurin, aduertising him that hee was very well pleased with the Accord
 "which he had made at Paris, promising to effect it, as he was bound to doe. As for his de- B
 "mand of the inuestiture of the Marquise for one of his fons, there was no likelihood he "should vse any such bounty, hauing so small cause. To conclude, he was much discontented "with the difficulties which the Duke made vpon their accord, the which if he did not
 "performe by the first day of August, hee should prepare to defend himselfe. Rencas the "Dukes confident seruant returns to his Highnesse, to let him vnderstand the Kings dis"content and resolution, but especially to giue him time to thinke of his affaires. At that "time Fosseuse returning out of Piedmont, assured the King, that he had heard the Duke of "Sauoy sweare, that he would neuer yeeld vp the Marquise, and if the King did attempt "to make warre against him, hee would shew him sport for forty yeares, with such like
 "words which were vnpleasing to the King. Rencas returns speedily, bringing newes that C
 "the Duke was content, seeing the King would haue it so, to restore the Marquise of Sa-
 "lusses, according to the Treaty of Paris. The King seemed well pleased with this resolu"tion, giuing the charge to Brulart and Ianin to treat with the Dukes Ambassadors, how "the restitution of the Marquise should be made. The Articles were agreed vpon, and "being ready to signe them, Rencas said vnto the Ambassadors, that his Master might take it
 "ill if they should signe them before he had seene them: that there were strange humours
 "about his highnesse, and that it would be more easie for him to get him to approve the ar"ticles when they were not signed. Rencas takes vpon him to carie the articles, the King ha-
 "uing giuen him leaue to goe, and know his masters last resolution, shewing that he was de"termined not to suffer himselfe to be entertained any longer with words; but in stead of D
 "returning, he sent backe a Letter whereby they found that the Duke did nothing but dis-
 "semble, and entertaine the King with delays, vntill that the Count Fuentes came out of "Spaine, and that he had assembled his forces and provided for his safety.

But the Archbishop of Tarantaise and Lullins entring againe into conference with the "sayd President Sillery and Ianin, they propounded foure difficulties.

- 1 Vpon the restitution of places in the Marquise by the Duke, and of Pont de Vaux in Bresse by the King at the same time.
- 2 Vpon the restitution of the Bailwicke of Gex.
- 3 Vpon the restitution of the artillery and munition that was within Carmagnola.
- 4 Vpon the nomination of a Gouverneur in the Marquise.

All which being refused, the Dukes Ambassadors beseech the King to giue them time
 "to aduertise their Master thereof: the King answered them, that if by the 16 of August all
 "his places in the Marquise were not restored vnto him, he would seek to recover that by "force which he could not haue by reason. Before the Kings departure from Paris, the de-
 "uill had perswaded a wretched woman called Nicole Mignon, to poison him, who had "some meanes during the forepassed warres, hauing had the fauour to talke priuately with "the King who is as full of bounty, as the liberty of armes, in time of warre, giues such fa-"miliarities: and Princes sometimes frame themselves vnto it. Being kept backe from the "Kings presence, with whom he would needs speake in priuate, being full of indignation,
 "and hauing resolved this cruell attempt against the King, she addresseth her selfe to the Count F
 "Sailson a Prince of the blood & Lord Steward of France, that he might giue her husband
 "some place in the Kings kitchen, and so in going to see her husband, she should haue meanes
 "to effect her damnable enterprise. In the end she had access, and said vnto him, that shee
 "was resolved to doe an act, which should make him the greatest Prince, and her the most "contented woman in the world. He desired to vnderstand of her the meanes in particular,
 "whereat he was much amazed. And for that it was a matter of importance, hee wished
 "her to come againe the next day; for that it deserved to be well considered of.

A The Count of Soissons goes presently vnto the King, and tels him what he had heard
 "of this woman, beseeching him to giue him some confident man, who being shut vp in his "cabiner might heare the same, when as she should come at the time appointed. The King "commanded Lomeny Secretarie of his Cabiner to goe. She returns full of courage and "resolution to effect this wicked designe. She speaks more, and protests to doe worse then
 "she had done the day before. He prest her to tell who had counseled her, and why she at"tempted so dangerous a thing. He could draw nothing from her but that it proceeded from "the diuell, from whom comes all damnable inspirations, and whose actions are murders,
 "sacriledges and impieties. When she had all said, shee was apprehended by the Prouost,
 "and led vnto the Court. Being examined, she denied the accusation and reproached the "accuser as audaciously, as she had shewed her selfe furiously resolute to the execution. *Lo-
 "meny* was produced against her, and her conscience (although very deperately wicked) B
 "could not deny that which she had before time depofed, but confessed the truth, and was "condemned to be burned quicke.

She is burnt alive.

It is miraculous what hath past in diuers conspiracies against the King, and how diuine-
 "ly God hath deliuered him. It was one of the causes, which made the Duke of Sauoy
 "seeme so resolute to hold the accord which hee had made with the King at Paris for the "Marquise of Saluces, hauing vnderstood that the King had bene so often threatened by "the attempts of such murderers, presuming that it was not possible but some one would
 "hit: and about the same time there was one taken, come out of Piedmont to kill the King,
 "whereof there was great rumour and suspition. And three others which had undertaken "to kill him, when as he was in Sauoy, whereof they had certaine intelligence, with their
 "pourtraits, the which were well knowne. And as they would haue taken them, his Maiefty
 "would not suffer them saying: Let these wicked wretches alone, God will punish them without "my doing.

Four enterprises against the king.

The sixteenth of August the King was aduertised, that the Duke had refused the last con"ditions agreed vpon by his Ambassadors, whereupon he countermanded the Count *Faf-
 "sage*, whom he had sent with five hundred men to command in the Marquise of Salu-
 "ses, and to enter the towne and castle of Carmagnoles, which the Duke should yeeld vp
 "the sixteenth of August, according to the last accord. And within the 11 of that month
 "he published a Declaration how he was forced to take Armes against the Duke of Sauoy,
 "to haue reason for the Marquise of Salusses, surprized by him, and vsurped vpon the "Crown of France, in a time of Peace, during the life of the deceased King, Henry the "third, Predecessor to his Maiefty, and a benefactor to the said Dukes father: giuing all men
 "to vnderstand, that he was vnwillingly drawne to this remedy, for the singular desire hee
 "had to raigne in peace, and to liue in loue and friendship with all his neighbours, hauing
 "done as much to auoid it, as his honour, and the duty of a Prince which loues the publike
 "quiet, and the good of his Estate did require: taking into his protection and defence, all
 "Clergy-men, and places, which should not fauour, nor serue for a retreat or assistance vnto
 "the said Dukes armies: and all Inhabitants of townes, which should open their gates vnto
 "his Maiefty and to his seruants: Meaning, that no acts of Hostilitie should be vsed, but

The King finding that all the Dukes temporisings and delays proceeded from a bad in-

De Vic his Ambassador speedily into Suifferland with money, to prevent and disappoint A the Dukes practices, and to assure a leany of Suiffes at need.

The King who knows that in warre, nothing doth so much aduance the execution as the presence of the head: being resolute to assaile the Duke on two parts, by Bresse and Sauoy, he parted from Lyons the same day that he proclaimed warre, and came to Grenoble to goe to the enterprize of Montmelian in Sauoy, and to bee ready at all occasions. The Marshall of Biron vnderooke the surprize and taking of Bourg in Bresse, the which was as soone knowne as conceived. The Marquis of Lullins the Dukes Ambassador being at Lyons, aduertised the Count of Montmaur Gouverneur of Bresse, and Bouvens Capitaine of the Citadell of Bourg of the enterprize, and that they should stand vpon B their guards.

A Gentleman of Bresse which had been amongst the Marshall of Biron's troopes, scene the Petards, and numbred the souldiers in passing the bridge at Macon, went before, to give notice to Bouvens Capitaine of the Citadell, that the Marshall was within a league of him. But neglecting all these aduertisements, and trusting to the force of their walls and gates, they found, that the Marshall of Biron with twelve hundred men onely and two Petards, forced the first and second Port of the towne, and entred it without any resistance, or the losse of one souldier. The troopes entred without disorder, and marched directly to the place before the Citadell, and came not away, till ten of the clocke, whilest that they did capitulate with two hundred Suiffes, which had shut themselves into a Bastion, whom they suffered to depart free with what was theirs: and also to attend if Bouvens would fall out of the Citadell, as he made shew. The Marshall of Biron left the Baron of Lux at Bourg, and went with five Cannons to finish the conquest of all that which lyes on this side the Riuer of Rofne, taking at the same time Pont d'In, Poncin, Saint Denis, Saint Rumbert, Beley and Pierre Chastell. Some yielded at the reputation of his presence, others would see the Cannon. There was no garison in all the country, but at Seizel. A strange humour of an enemy, not onely to make warre vpon bad grounds, and to imbarke himselfe in a rotten ship, but also to refuse peace, and yet to haue no man in his country to make warre. Those which made any resistance, shewed themselves in the end more valiant in tongue then with the sword. So as the King being at Grenoble, received in one day and in lesse then six houres, newes of two memorable exploits: the taking of Bourg with seven ensignes, and one Corner, which the Marshall sent him, and the taking of the towne of Montmelian by Les Digneires. Cregay offered a scalado to the Curtaine of the towne of Montmelian towards the Castle, and the Petard to the Port of Arban with such fury, as the souldiers retired themselves into the Church, and the Inhabitants into the Citadell, leauing their houses to the discretion of all that warre allows in a towne that is either forced, or surprised. The King commanded Grillon to lodge with the Regiment of his guards in the suburbs of Chambery, all which was done, without any great resistance.

The Souldiers did not defend themselves without feare and amazement, and the people were so lulled asleepe with this opinion of peace, as nothing was more hatefull vnto them then the remembrance of warre, holding all care of armes to be vaine and vnprofitable.

The Duke past his time amongst the Ladies at Thurin, attending the pleasing affects which his Diuines had promised him, as we haue said. He is aduertised that the King is in Armes, his Country in prey, the meanes to defend himselfe farre off, and Hannibal at the foot of the Alpes: That onely Montmelian is left him on this side the mountains: That his chiefe towne had acknowledged the King for Soueraigne Lord, and that all his subjects yielded willingly to his obedience. Yet he continued his sports: And esteeming little the losse of all his Estates, so as he might saue Montmelian, hee holds it but losse of time for his enemies; that hee would make them abandon what they had taken, and of their victories they should carie backe nothing but Trophies of straw: to conclude he seemed for a time (as one would say) to consent to any thing which the King did.

But when he came in the end to consider of the abuses and deceits of his Soothsayers, to whom he had given too much credit; that so many proiects laid with the Marshall of Biron tooke no effect; that his Ambassadors had commandement to retire, yet full of griefe that their masters inconstancie had drawne his Estate into apparant ruine, and too much

The Duke of Sauoy troubled in minde.

A much incensed the Kings patience) that his country was in prey, that the great meanes of resistance which were promised him, from beyond the Pirenean mountains were yet farre off: He awakes at the thunder of the Cannon: He casts his eyes and thoughts on all sides, and finds no Mediator capable to repaire that which hee had ruined; no friends to support his quarrell, no neighbours which stirre for him. Euery one blames him, euery one cries out that he is in the wrong, he is the sole instrument and cause of his owne misery, and he alone must seeke the remedy.

The Patriarke of Constantinople is at Turin, a man of a great spirit, and much praised in affaires of this world. The King sees and heares him willingly. Yea, but the Duke had suspected him at the Treaty of Paris. He had commandement from the Pope not to depart from thence, before his Highnesse had performed his promises. He thought that hee was there onely to obserue his intentions, and to presse the effects of his words. Hee had well obserued that the Duke did not shew him so good a countenance, nor did so willingly see him as when he past for the Treaty of Veruans: He is offended at this contempt, and it may be will be reuenged when opportunitie serues. He knowes also that the Duke did not like of them that did conferr with him; and that hee had encouraged the King to continue the course of his victories, and not to trust vnto the deceits of the Sauoyard. What likelihood was there then in so vident a businesse, to imploy a great Prelate incensed, a great spirit offended?

C Yet must hee coniure this French tempest, and by some meanes stay the exploits of so rude an Officer. The Patriarke quality binds him to mediate the reconciliation of Princes diuided in Christendome; and his presence, to bring water and not Oyle to the combustions which deuoured the Dukes Estates. Hee intreats and conuiles him to goe vnto the King. They say that (in despite of the bad reception hee had had at Thurin, or well acquainted with the Dukes intentions) he sent a small note vnto the King, aduising him to continue the course of his Armes, and not to desist for any propositions or offers made by the Duke, who fought but to deceive him, and withall he accepted of the charge.

The Patriarke came vnto Grenoble the fiftenth of August, and spake vnto the King D coming from Euenlong: Hee giues him to vnderstand how much the Pope would be discontented with this warre: hee conuiles him in his name to resolute to a peace, and to returne for that effect to the Treaty of Paris: for that in demanding his owne, both the Pope and all the Potentates would fauour his demand: but in seeking to retaine the ancient inheritance of the D. of Sauoy, hee had no reason to hope for any fauour.

The King answered him, That he was infinitely grieved the Pope should be any way discontented with his taking Armes, the which hee did not vnderstand vntill it was apparant to all the world, that the Duke deluded him. That being the person whom his Maiestie did most honour, and to whom hee acknowledged himselfe so much bound, as he could not deny him any thing, yet hee held him so full of Iustice, as hee would neuer aduise him to any thing that should be against reason, and the dignity of his Crowne: That the Duke having refused to performe the Articles of the Treaty at Paris, hee was not bound to obserue them.

The Patriarke laid before him the miseries which this warre would bring, the ruine and desolation of the people, and the aduantage which the common enemy of Christendome should get by it. The King answered him in this manner. You exhorte me like vnto a great Diuine, and one of the chiefe Prelates of the Church, to desist from this warre, to alledge the mightiest that may fall vpon Christendome. I know not for much Diuinity as you doe, yet am I not ignorant, that I haue a soule to saue, and that one day I must giue an account of my actions, and that God will impure the miseries that shall happen by this warre, vnto that man that giues the occasion. Let the D. of Sauoy lay his hand vpon his heart, and iudge if it be not his obstinacy and couetousnesse to hold that which belongs to another, which is the cause of all the oppression which his poore subjects doe now suffer: He hath presumed with too great contempt of me, to hold that which is mine, by cunning, against my will. Hee that detaines at other mans iniustly, may iustly be deprived of his owne. Hee that deniaies vnto the stronger that which belongs vnto him, abandons vnto him by the same meanes all that he hath: as it is no honour for him to be obstinate to warre, for the desire hee hath to hold an other mans Estate, so shall hee reape no other profit then the ruine of 1600 "of his owne. I cannot conceale it reuerend Patriarke, that although I haue euer found all integrity in your Negotiations, yet am I troubled how I shall cary my selfe with you, touching that which you propound; for in truth I hold you for a very good man, a most vertuous Prelate, and a wise Negotiator.

The Duke demands two Legats

"On the other side I can let you see in writing how the said Duke hath given Authority to Jacob and the President Roche to treat with mee, with a Declaration that neither you nor his Ambassadors, that are within my Realme, are privy to his intentions. He hath made them propound, that I should moue the Pope to depure two Legats; one of them should cause restitution to be made of that which I hold on this side the Mountains, and the other should make him restore that which he detaines from me on that side the Alpes. I finde his manner of proceeding to be very bad. To conclude, reuerend Patriarke, I will beseech the Pope to take my answer in good part, who holds that I cannot be yrge by any reason to lay aside those Armes which the Duke hath forced me to take, having runne headlong without any necessitie into this warre, in the which I am engaged against my will. I meane not to bee irreconcilable to him, but I will tell you that hee hath caried himselfe in such sort towards me, as I will no more rely vpon his words. After so many breaches, he must finde some other means to warrant that he saith, or some others then my selfe to beleue him. His former cariage makes mee iudge what the future may be. It is euident that in a full peace, he vsurped the Marquise of Saluces from the deceased King his benefactor, alledging no other reason, but that hee would keepe it more safely for him, then the Huguenots, who would vsurpe it, promising to doe as hee pleased. I can shew his Letter written vnto the King. But when there is any question to keepe his promise, hee then no more remembers it. Iudge also how I can be assured of the loue of this Prince, who during the miseries of France, sought to vsurpe Dauphine and Provence, where with his friends he hath caused infinite ruines, and where hee pretended no other right but neighbourhood and conueniencie, and to make himselfe great with his neighbours losse, for as his Ambassador in Switzerland in an open dier at Bade (excusing his masters couetousnesse to the thirreene Cantons) said that his children which were many, were issued from Kings and Emperours, and that it was naturall for fathers to seeke all means to make their children great; and to thinke of it in time, seeing that no man knows what time hee hath to thinke of it. The which should giue occasion to all his neighbours, to forecast how they shall keepe their estates vntill his children bee provided for. The warre which I make shall not trouble the quiet of Christendome, I am ready to desist, when hee shall doe mee right, for many iust pretensions which I haue vpon his Estates and Countries, the which he detaines from me, to the preiudice of my Crowne. Let no man doubt of my resolution to obserue the Treaty of Vernins, but it doth not binde mee to quit mine owne. The Patriarke seeing that hee would allow no other reasons then his owne, beseeched the King to grant a cessation of Armes; but his request was not granted, the King being vnwilling his army should rest, vntill it had taken Montmellian and Bourg, being dangerous to remaine in an enemies country, and not to be assured of the chiefe places of strength, the losse whereof strikes terror into the rest. The King sent the Patriarke to Lions, to treat with his Councell more amply of his proposition.

The Spanish Ambassador considered the course of this warre, yet hee made no shew that the King his master desired for all this to alter the publike peace, notwithstanding he could not forbear to say, that besides the naturall affection which he bare to the Duke of Sauoy and to his children: he held it the duty of a mighty Prince, to lend his helping hand to them that were vniustly oppressed, yet hee made no protestation which might make them doubt of the obseruation of the Treaty. The King also said, that hee would cherish the loue of the King of Spaine, so long as he should miske account of his, but he would neuer trouble himselfe with so difficult a thing as to keepe a friend by force. Hee commanded the Marquis of Lullins to retire, for if an Ambassador be alwayes suspected during an assured peace, there is no reason to trust him in time of warre.

The King offers mercy to the inhabitants of Chambery.

The King being resolute not to lose any time in a season which was so precious, parted from Grenoble, dined at Baratz, visited his troopes which were at Montmellian, and from thence went to the Marches, viewed Chambery, and being come vnto the suburbs, he commanded Villery, to speake vnto Jacob, who commanded in the towne, and to lay before

A before him the danger whereinto he thrust himselfe with all the Inhabitantes, if they attended force in so weak a place. That the King desirous to prevent the ruine of so many poore innocent creatures, offered mercy, and sought to vanquish them by mildnesse, before hee employed any other means. Jacob, accompanied with the President Roche, thanked the King, and beseeched his Maiestie to suffer them to aduertise his Highnesse in what Estate they were. The King granted them three dayes to resolute & to send to the Duke, but the people not attending his resolution, being desirous to free themselves from the apprehensions of the misery which follows them that are obstinate, forced him to enter into parley, so as the town was yielded to the Kings obedience. Those within the Castle promised to yield within fix dayes, if they were not succoured with sufficient forces to raise the siege. The King left La Buisse a Gentlemen of Dauphine there for Gouverneur. Having effected so great a matter with so small forces, hee was well pleased to see his army augmented, by the troopes which La Guiche Gouverneur of Lions brought vnto him, being about three hundred horse, of the Nobility of his government, and of his company of men at armes. Being master of the field, he resolved to haue the chiefe fort, he seized vpon the two approaches of Tarentaise and Maurienne.

Chambery yielded the 21 of August.

He parted from Chambery the 26 of August, lodged at Saint Peter d'Albigny, and the next day came to Conflans, where he found that Des Dignieres had by maine force drawn two Cannons to the top of a mountaine, battered a Pabillion, and made a small breach in a curtain. The place was sufficient to haue assured women, but they that were within it shewed not themselves men, being one thousand five hundred in number, amongst the which there were a hundred all armed, and three hundred more which caried Cuirasses. They had scarce made fifty shot but they yielded through feare, and demanded no other composition but their liues, thinking themselves very happy to redeeme their liues with the losse of their armes, horses and baggage, the which the King gaue them out of his bounty, well satisfied with the place, their ensignes; and the promise which they made him, not to carie armes for twelve dayes.

The King comes to Conflans, and batters it.

As Conflans commands the passage of Tarentaise; so Charbonniers holds that of Maurienne, being seated at the entry of the mountaines; which makes the valley ioyning to D Mont-Cenis. This place stands vpon a rocke, at the foot whereof runnes the riuer of Arc, inaccessible of all sides, but only a narrow way to goe vnto the Port; This Tower of Charbonniers serues them as a dungeon and is all that remains of the first fort and retreat of the Earles of Sauoy. Beralde Duke of Saxony, the first Earle of Maunene made it his Palace in time of peace, and his fort for the warre. It is also remarkable for the birth of Thomas sonne to Humbert the third Earle of Sauoy; and Prince of Piedmont. The towne of Aiguebelle is at the foot of this Rocke, the King caused it to be surprised by the Seigneurs of Crequy and Morges, not giuing them of the Castle any leisuere to burne it.

The description of Charbonniers.

His Maiesty knowing that this place was well furnished to resist an army, caused his E troops to march, and then he battered the tower with nine Cannons, and two small pieces, from the breake of day vntill noone. The besieged (having endured fix hundred thirty and seuen Cannon shot, without any hope of succours) did capitulate the 10 of September, to depart with their baggage, and their Matches out: the King lent their ensignes to the Marquess of Vernuel being then at Lions, the which are now in the great Church of S. John, and so they departed to the number of two hundred. The King returned to Grenoble, to purge himselfe by the aduice of his physician, commanding Des Dignieres to passe with the army into Tarentaise, the which hee did, the enemies quitting the passage of Briançon, retiring themselves into a Rocke which was inaccessible of all parts, the which did so bridle the passage, as it might stay any force: Des Dignieres hauing intelligence that the port being but two foot wide, was not well rampared, and that the place was better furnished with Pelants then with fouldiers, hee planted two Cannons against it, the which in six volleys made a breach, the fouldiers graped vp courageously to the top of the Mountaine, to enter in at this hole, the Captaine within it was hurt with a shot, and all the rest were taken prisoners. The army lodged at Montiers the Metropolitan of the whole country, hauing conquered the vallies & mountaines of Maurienne and Tarentaise, where they found nothing so difficult, as the season, being more troubled with the weather, then with men: only Montmellian remained, which was held inpregnable.

The King of Spaines Ambassador in Suisse complains of the King.

The King desirous to haue the causes of this warre knowne to all the world, commanded his Ambassadors to aduertise his friends thereof. The Spanih Ambassador in Switzerland was not mute in this occasion which ministred matter for all the world to talke of. His discourse was, that the French King (hauing taken armes when as euery one thought to enioy the sweetnesse of peace) put all the world in ialousie, bound those that were neerest to runne to quench this fire, and in opposing themselves to the oppression of the Duke, preuent the designs of the feruitude of Italy. That to this end the Count of Fuentes, had commandement from the King of Spaine his Master, to leaue men to assure the Duchy of Milan, and to intreat that valiant Nation of the Swisses to grant him a leaue of six thousand men.

Monseur de Vic the Kings Ambassador in Suisse.

Monseur de Vic the Kings Ambassador, made it knowne in an open assembly of all the Cantons, that the King had had more patience, then the injury done vnto his Crowne did permit, being vnwilling to take armes vntill that all Europe had iudged, that the Duke of Sauoy proceeded not sincerely, and that he vrged his Maiefty to repell by force the injury of the detension of the Marquitate of Saluces; yet could he not keepe the petty Can-tons from granting a leaue vnto the Duke, the which notwithstanding was by him made vnprofitable. We may not here omit a particular accident. Amongst the chiefe Gentlemen which La Guiche Governor of Lions had drawne out of his gouernment to serue the King in his armie of Sauoy, were Chazet and du Bourg, both well known for their valour and experience in armes. The King made good esteeme of them, and gaue a Commission to the last, to raise a regiment of a thousand men. Being gone to make this leaue, Enuy (which doth alwayes oppose it selfe to the merits of vertue, and which is ineuitable in the beginning of prosperitie) was grieved that a Gentleman which had followed the League, should be chosen among so many others to serue the King in this warre, and forged an imposture sufficient to ruine him, if it had encountered a Prince as apt to choller as hee is to Iustice and Clemencie. They cast abroad tickets in the Kings Chamber and withdrawing chamber, that these two Gentlemen, hauing failed in an enterprize vpon his Maiesties person at the passage of the riuer nere vnto Chamoussier, had referred the execution thereof to Morliers, and that his Maiefty should remember that vpon the way to Chamoussier, one of them (his courage fainting) drew back from the King to talke with a Knight which marched on the one side. This was enough to kindle the Kings choller, and to make it passe like vnto a thunder-bolt, which breaks and wounds before wee see the lightning, or heare the cracke. But this Prince (who all his life had followed the precept, which the Emperour Basilius gaue vnto his sonne, not to giue care to slanderous and en-uious reports) found that this billet proceeded from a wicked and malicious passion, for that hee remembred well, that to speake, with du Bourg, he had caused Chazet to change his place, whereof mention was made in the billet. Hee shewed it to La Guiche gouernour of Lions, who presently conceived that it was an imposture: Hee called Chazet vnto him, more to confirme the good opinion hee had of his Loyalty, then to shew him that this note were able to giue him any signe of ialousie or distrust. And for that the brate of this treacherie could not bee kept secrete, he caused a Letter to be written to du Bourg, commanding him not to discontinue the leaue of his regiment, for any thing hee should heare spoken against his Loyalty, whereof hee would haue no other prooffe but his courage, and the execution of that which he commanded him. du Bourg being at Lions, and hearing there were things spoken of him which he neuer thought, hee takes post & comes to the King as hee rose from dinner, being enuioured by all the chiefe Noblemen of his Court. As soone as he perceived him he asked why hee was come. Sir answered du Bourg, it is said at Lions that Eliphafe would kill you, du Bourg brings you his head. The King replied, that hee held him too honest a man to haue such a thought, and that such as had giuen this intelligence where wicked imposters. They did see that I meant to imploy you, as I will alwayes when occasion is offered for my seruice. They could produce no other effects of their enuy but in writing of this Billet, but they haue not found me so tra-cable and credulous as they thought. Princes Courts were neuer without them, but hee hath fewest that doth least beleue them, I doe not as Kings my Predecessors, who kept in minde, while they liued what two or three had told them. No man knows my Realme better then my selfe. I haue found three factions. That of the deceased King hath troubled mee. Of three I haue made one: there is no more any distinction. I am King of the one

imposture.

A one as well as of the other, and hold them all for my subiects. I make no difference among them for their affection to my seruice, but I know how to make choise of them that are capable of charges, and for your regard you shall neuer be forgotten when any is offered. du Bourg hauing thanked the King for the confidence it pleased him to haue of his loyalty, seemed notwithstanding much afflicted for this slander. The King said vnto him, That he had already told Chazet that it pitted him to see him afflicted for a thing which he had neuer beleueed, and which he held incredible: hee asked him if hee suspected any one, assuring him, that if he did name him, hee would of his absolute power put him to the racke; and if any one should accuse them, he would alwaies hold the accusation scandalous, being far from the thought of Gentlemen of their fort; and if he should beleue billets, there were no safety for good men in his Court. But the King adds (to encrease the hearts griefe of these spightfull spirits) goe and raise your Regiment, and beleue me, that if you bring speedily the number of men which you haue promised, you shall punish them more rigorously then iustice would if they were knowne: for there is no such torment to an enemy as to doe well. That which was said of these two was very false, but that which was said of two others, was very true. The King had intelligence that two desperate men, by one motion, and diuers meanes, had an enterprize vpon his person.

Two desperate men sent to kill
the King.

The aduise was accompanied with a description and the portraits of these wretches.
C One of them was knowne, and seene two or three times neare vnto the King. One to whom Villery had giuen a copy of the portraits, to watch and obserue this villaine, seeing him one day neare vnto the King then he should be, wished his Maiefty to take heed.
He contemned this aduice, saying, That his life depended of God, and not of the practices of his enemies. He would not suffer them to apprehend him, saying, Let him alone, he is a wicked man. Such villaines shall not goe unpunished, God will punish them without my doing. The Cattle of Montmelian was held one of the strongest places in Christendome, and those which haue seene the portrait, with the order of the Kings Campe, and the forme of his battery, haue wondered that it did so suddenly yeeld. The King himselfe said it was impregnable. It is seated vpon the top of a mountaine, the ditches be precipices D on euery side, the defences, five great battions well flanked: there is but one passage to it from the towne, but so vncaise as is not to be won, being ditcht, renrencht, and flanked with aduantage: but there is no fortresse that may not be tearmed strong if it bee not affected, and they measure the strength or weaknesse of a place more by the quality of him that doth besiege it, then by her owne forces. The King (whose reputation assured a happy end) resolved to besiege it, being informed of the state of the place, and confirmed in his resolution by Des Diguieres, who said these words vnto him: That he would submit himselfe to pay the charges of the army, if that fort were not taken within one month.

The siege of the Cattle of Montmelian.

It was furnished of munition, and many ruines neglected did blemish that ancient reputation, by the which it was held one of the strongest in Christendome. The Capitaine E and souldiers had equally need of courage. It is better to haue sheepe commanded by a Lion, then Lions commanded by a sheepe. The Earle of Brandis, of the house of the Earles of Montmaior had the gouernment. The execution of a Councell is neuer better performed then by him that giues it. Des Diguieres had been the chiefe author to make the army passe out of Maurienne into Tarentaise. The King therefore iudging that he could not be better serued by any other in his army of Sauoy, he commits the charge vnto him of the execution of that which hee had aduised.

The French army marched to besiege the Cattle of Montmelian, which the Lord of Crequey (commanding in the Towne since the taking thereof) had blockt vp as well as he could. His Maiefty being ariued, he summoned the Count of Brandis to yeeld, and to receiue his commandements, threatening him with the fury of forty Cannons: the Earle answered; That he would neuer yeeld the place but to his Sueraigne Lord the Duke of Sauoy, and if they did besiege him, Montmelian should be the Sepulture of the French. Some thinke that this answer proceeded onely from feare.

The Cattle summoned to yeeld.
The Earle of Brandis answer;

In the meane time the Marquis Kosby, great master of the Artillery, lost no time to plant his batteries, drawing vp seven cannons by the force of mens hands, to command the Cattle, and to batter it at random: then in the same plaine at the foot of the hill, hee caused two batteries to be made by de Bordis (Lieutenant General of the Artillery) as well against the Bastion of Mauvoisin, as other places which they held easiest to be battered, especially that which was before the Bastion Bonillars, the which might also batter an old tower or dongeon, being foure square, and almost ruined; having beene battered in former time by the army of King Francis the first.

The two batteries on the other side of the water, plaied vpon the base Court, and into the portall of the Dongeon at random, vpon those that should issue forth, or offer themselves to defend the breach, the which did more amaze the besieged then any thing else, who being well furnished with artillery and other munition, spared not their shot, the which notwithstanding could not hinder the lodging of the Kings artillery. Whilest they planted the Cannon, the King went to view the passages of the mountaines, by the which the Duke of Sauoy might enter on this side. He was then at Thurin, and did not bouge, seeming carelesse of the ruine of his Estates: yet sometime some of his most trusty seruants would say: The King of France takes Townes in Sauoy, but patience: his Highnesse will take as many in France, and better. These words being reported, made the King suspect some bad designe, considering the aduertisement they had of three murderers, whereof one was come expressly out of Piedmont to murder the King: yet hee feared not them, but rather La Fin, who was very inward with the Marshall of Biron, and that they would seeke to effect the designs which they had plotted at Paris, when as the Duke of Sauoy was there, whereof the King had had some intelligence, but he could not beleue it. His Maiesty, who loued the Marshall of Biron well, wished him to dismis La Fin, that his company was dangerous, and that in the end he would deceiue him. But the Marshall was no more capable of counsell: two great and violent passions, Ambition and Reuenge, had so distempred his iudgement, as hee was no more himselfe, the which grew vpon occasions which fell out in this war of Sauoy. The first was despight and ieaousie, to see all the authority of command, all the honour of enterprises, all the conduct of executions giuen to Des Dignieres, for that he knew the country, and the enemies forces better then any other. Hee was discontented for that hee was not at the siege of Montmelian, as he had beene at the siege of Amiens. The other was the refusal which the King made vnto him, to dispose of the Citadell of Bourg, when it should be taken, which refusal was grounded vpon great considerations. The first, that it was not reasonable to trust a place of that importance to him that was suspected to haue intelligence with his enemy. The second, that Gouvernours of Prouinces which command in chiefe, ought not to haue the guard of places and fortresses. The third was, that the King meant to commit the place (as one of the Keyes of his Realme towards Italy) to one that depended immediatly on his Maiesty. But we must ioyne this discourse to his processe, and to the discouery of his conspiracies, the which he thought to be very secret, for that they were not knowne nor divulged.

All Italy being amazed to see the King at the foot of the Alpes, and the three fortresses which remained in Breffe and Sauoy, so straightly besieged, as they must needs fall into the power of the victorious French, said: That the Marquisate was the pretext, but Naples and Milan was the cause of the war. The Duke of Sessa, the King of Spaines Ambassador at Rome, represented vnto the Pope the infinite ruines and desolations which would follow by the continuance of this war, & the victorious successes which the Turke had vpon the frontiers of Austria, being ready to make a great breach vpon the Christians, whilest the Princes which he feared most were at war, and the most warlike people of Europe killed one another. He therefore beseecheth him to send his Nephew vnto the King, to stay the course of his armes, and to resume the execution of the treaty of Paris. The Pope (to whom the diuision of Christian Princes hath alwaies beene displeasing, desiring more then any of his predecessors to assure the publike quiet) grants this famous Ambassage of Cardinal Adobrandino his Nephew, who young of age, but not of wildome and iudgment, would not depart out of Rome before the Duke of Sessa had giuen his word vnto the Pope, that he would cause the King of Spaine to approue, and the Duke to obserue whatsoever he should treat with this assurance he past to Milan, getting the like promise from the Count of Fuentes vnder his hand, being there ready with the King of Spaines forces to succour the Duke of Sauoy, to whom he said: That hee made this voyage for the onely respect of the King of Spaine, and if the Duke of Sauoy onely had beene interested, he would not haue absented himselfe so long

Cardinal Adobrandino sent Legate vnto the French King.

A long from the Consistory, he was not therefore refused to proceed any further, if hee did not assure him to make the Duke obserue all that hee did great, and to retire his forces if he made any difficulty. The Count who sought but to saue that which was on the other side of the Alpes, to serue as a rampier for Milan, promised him, So as a passage might be reformed for the Spaniards to goe into Flanders. It was a great wildome in this young Cardinal not to treat of so important a business, but vpon good cautions. The Cardinal being thus assured, leaues his traine at Alexandria, and comes to Thurin, faining his intention to be, to finish his pilgrimage to our Lady at Mont Deuis, and to see him in passing. The Duke enters into complaint of the losse of his Estates, and swears to seeke all means to haue his reuenge. The Legate seemes cold, he represents vnto him the necessity of Peace, and the good of Concord, and he lets him know that hee should desire to keepe his friends which are the true Scepters of Princes. He adds, moreover, that he was sory for the bad estate of his affaires, the which if he might repaire, he would willingly goe to Chambery. The Duke intreats him to take the paine, giues him a blanke, and assures him, that he will neuer haue any will nor resolution to contradict that which he should conclude in this negotiation: with this promise (and an assurance that he should not attempt any thing more then the succouring of Montmelian) he passed the Alpes. And for that he feared the King in his great aduantage would not hearken to a peace, and much lesse grant any truce, and that this inequality would make all reasons vnequall: he would not aduise the Duke to send his Ambassadors vntill he first knew the Kings minde. Hee therefore commands Hermio his Secretary to aduertise him of his coming, and of the desire he had to serue his Maiesty, not for the continuance of the war, but for a confirmation of a peace. The King vpon this aduise staies at Annesly, to giue audience to Hermio, who was presented vnto him by the Patriake, who said vnto him, that the Legate his Master was sent by the Pope to quench the fire of war. The King excused himselfe vpon the disadvantage he should receiue, and the prejudice it would bring to his affaires, in retiring when he should aduance, and to neglect the commodities and occasions which were offered vnto him in this enterprise. By the consideration of time and place. But he assured him that the Cardinal should be very welcome, for the respect of his Holinesse, for the particular of his person, and for the subiect of his Legation, although his enemies had giuen it out, that it was made in the Dukes fauour. That hee did a tribute all to piety, wildome, and a fatherly care in his Holinesse; who should alwaies finde as much will in him to maintaine peace, as hee had bin grieued to come to arms, refusing neuer any treaty, so as it might be with honour and safety, being resolute, neuer to endure any injury from the Duke of Sauoy, nor his adherents. Hermio made some other propositions, the answer whereof the King referred vnto Chambery, whither the King appointed to come within foure or fuge daies: The King went from Annesly to Beaufort, to view the passage of the mountain, by the which the Duke might come: he sent the Duke Biron to discouer that of our Lady of Gorge, and others altogether inaccessable, but only for Beares and Camels. The King went vpon the mountain, as far as the pace of Cornet, where he dined vnter a Rocke, to defend himselfe from snow; after he had viewed the passage which may serue the enemy, he parted from Beaufort, and took his lodging at Gilly neare to Constance, where he was informed of the true estate of the besieged, who had no hope but in themselves, being impossible for the Duke of Sauoy to succour them. But what doth the Duke whilest the King rules in his Countie, and that Des Dignieres spoiles all the Vallies of Morienne and Tarentaise? Hee which had been the Kings Agent with the Duke, hauing taken his leaue, came to his Maiesty at Grenoble, telling him that the Duke talked of nothing but fighting, he answered that he should finde him ready to shew him sport. The Spaniards, who would make him apprehend the voyage of Paris, said, That they might not break the body of their troops, nor diuide their forces appointed for the voyage of Piedmont. The Duke would haue sent three thousand Spaniards to defend the Valley of Tarentaise, but they would not march, not for feare, but by order of their Commander, which kept them backe. D'Albignis had much adoe to make them stay at the Fort of little Saint Bernard, on that side of the Valley of Aest, which if they had done, the Duke might haue attempted something in Prouence and Dauphine to haue diuerted the Kings forces.

But it hath bin alwaies obserued, that such as haue trusted to the succours of Spain, haue tried to their griefe, that they desire rather to entertaine the disease, then to aduance the cure. It is a militarie Maxime among them, to make one body of an army, but especially, not to doe any thing without direction, so as oftentimes great opportunities are lost in attending: for, if the Councells be far off, they come alwaies after the effects. The King hauing provided for the passages, returnes to Montmelian, he sent word to the Earl of Brandis, That if he would forbear to shoot that day, he would also cause his battery to cease. They told the King, that the Earle granted it as willingly, as if he had no resolution to refuse any thing to so great a Prince. The King was not ignorant of the estate of the besieged, for besides that at the taking of the towne, hee had taken Notes and Inventories of the munition that was in the Castle, there alwaies escaped some one out by the wall which brought newes, and described the place in as miserable an estate as they could, as well to excuse their flight, as to tell the truth. A Cannon shot from one of the Kings batteries pierced the wall within a foot of the Cause whereas all the powder and munition of war did lye, the which had ended the battery, if it had gone a little further. The Earl of Brandis seeing that nothing came from without that might entertaine hope, and iudging that nothing was lesse beleeving a Capitaine then rashnesse, did not contemne the persuasions which necessity and the aduice of his friends gaue him to thinke of the souldiers health, seeing that of the place was desperate. The King summons him againe not to be obstinate: they found him so well disposed thereunto, as presently they did iudge whereunto things would tend. The Earl calls together the Captaines and Gentlemen that were with him, to determine of some wholesome expedient, not to offend the seruice of their Prince, nor to incense the power of a great King, and to provide for the common health of them all. If he were resolute to hold it out, he should not aske counsell but of such as were of the same resolution, being easie to iudge, that amazement will alwaies cary them to opinions contrary to duty, and that from a fearefull man you shall neuer draw good counsell. Every thing is vnpleasant to a man that feares. Being therefore assembled, he spake vnto them after this manner: "My masters, when I consider that we hold this place for our Prince, to defend it for him with the price and perill of our liues, I doe not finde, that either feare of danger, or despair of succours, or rigor of afflictions can discharge vs: But when I consider the state wherein we are, the extremities which presse vs, the great distance of our hopes, and the weakenesse of our force, I say, that in the end we must submit our wills to that which may bee, and that it should be an ouer-weening, to will that which is impossible. It is not the custome of a Governour in a place besieged, to publish the wants he finds, for commonly a good shew couers defects, to the end that his waivering daunt not the courage of his souldiers. In like manner I haue concealed as much as I could the necessities which enuirovn vs: but seeing you see them and feele them no lesse then my selfe, iudge what the issue of this siege may be. I coniure you by the duty which binds you to his Highnesse, by your loyalties, honours, and consciences, you consider the choice of two things, wherof if it were possible, I would desire neither the one nor the other, which is; Either to endure all the attempts of the Kings Army, and to yeeld vp our liues with the place; or to capitulate to yeeld it vpon the longest time we can obtaine. If we follow the first, we cannot auoid our owne ruines, nor the losse of the place: if necessity suffers vs to make vse of the second, we may giue his Highnesse leisure to doe his businesse, or to succour vs. Thinke not that any base apprehension of danger makes me to vse these words. I shall neuer in all my life finde a more glorious death. All that may be done out of this place to saue a mans life, I will doe it to finde death, and in euery thing else that shall be vnfortunate. I will euer remember, that it is not the duty of a Commander to haue care of his own safety, but of the preservation of his souldiers.

"Take therefore this proposition as I giue it you, and expecting your resolution, I shew vnto your companions neither feare in your courages, nor despair in your words, and in all your resolutions cast your eyes, not so much vpon that which you desire, as vpon necessity, which must giue a law vnto your desires, remembering, that they pittie such as fall into accidents not fore-seene, and mocke at those which fall into apparent dangers.

This proposition was not applauded of them all: some representing, that there is no crime more horrible and detestable, then to yeeld vp a strong place, without extreme and

A and most apparant violence, remembering, That his Highnesse had honoured them with the guard of the only bulwarke of his Estates: they should rather all die therein, then yeeld the place to the French King, and that the apparant danger might bee auoided by some favourable accident. Others of the contrary side maintained, That accidents were doubtfull, that it were better according to the time, to take an assured and easie party. That euery one knew that the most Christian King was well informed of the estate of that place: That they had suffered to the extremity. That they were battered with forty Cannons: That they had receiued many disgraces, and losse of men, burnt by fire which had taken their powder. That since two moneths they had receiued no newes from his Highnesse. B That they wanted all kind of victuall but corne, which with good husbandry could not last to the end of Nouember: That it were better to enter into composition, seeing the King offered it, and take a reasonable rearmeto yeeld vp the place, whilste that his Highnesse should giue order to succour them, or to treat of a peace. The most resolute were shaken at these words, and in the end all concluded to make their peace in time, whereunto in the end they had bene forced. The Earle made an act, the which was signed by all the Captaines and Officers of the Garrison, by the which hee demanded a truce of the King for five daies; at the end whereof he did capitulate, to depart, he and his company with liues and goods, Ensignes displayed, Drums founding, bullet in the mouth, Harguebuzes charged, their marches light, and furnished with what munition of warre they could cary, without search, if the Duke did not succour them within one moneth: the which was granted, and moreover, they had leaue to send a Capitaine to the Duke to aduertise him thereof. The Cheualier Bricheras had the charge to cary these newes vnto the Duke, with letters containing this in substance: That hee and his had suffered and did suffer all that humane flesh could endure, besides an infinite number of disgraces, and losse of many men burnt euen by fire which fell among the powder. That the King being informed of the estate of this place, had summonsed it three or four times by letters of his owne hands, to yeeld it vp vnto him, being come in person foure times into the towne of Montmelian to heare his answer, the which hee had forborne vntill he had seene nine batteries planted about the Castle, consisting of forty Cannons.

D That his highnesse must consider he was besieged by a Royall army, in the which were three Generals, the Duke of Espernon, the Marshall of Biron, and Des Dignieres, with many Princes and Noblemen. That hauing receiued no newes from his Highnesse since his Letter of the fifteenth of August, he had lost all hope of succours, and had propounded vnto all the Captaines, to try if they could get a sufficient time to giue his Highnesse means either to succour them, or to treat of a peace.

That holding a delay of more aduantage then such a sudden losse, he had entred into Treaty, hauing demanded a much longer time then they had granted him, notwithstanding that all prouision of victualls wanted, except corne and Rice, the which with very good husbandry could not last till the end of Nouember.

E That he was much grieved to yeeld the place to any other then to him to whom it did belong, and if he could as well dispose of all them that were with him, as of himself, and of other chiefe Officers, to die when as the place should change his Master, he would rather take that resolution, then present himselfe before his Highnesse after so great a losse, in comparison whereof his owne fortunes and safety seemed nothing vnto him.

That if his Highnesse did not succour them within the moneth, the place was lost, the King hauing giuen it out, That he would not yeeld it againe, notwithstanding any peace.

The same day the Capitulation of Montmelian was made, the King sent the Secretary Herminio to goe and meet the Cardinall Aldobrandino his Master, with charge to assure him of his Maiesties willingness to peace, & of the desire hee had to see him to open his heart, and to represent vnto him the iustice of his Armes, and to let him know that hee had not vnder-taken them to trouble Italy or Christendome, as his enemies had maliciously giuen out, after that they had forced him to protract his marriage, and to take the way of Sauoy, the which was not greatly pleasing vnto him in this season, intreating him to take it in good part, if he did not answer to the particular propositions, propounded ded vnto him by Herminio vntill his actual aduising himselfe, that hee would come with sufficient power, to conclude a good accord, without any more trouble of doing it twice. But his Maiesty excused himselfe from any succeeding armes. It being vnreasonable to liue idly in an enemies Country, whereas the entertainment of his army cost him two thousand Crowns a moneth, and that he should attend the winter, and give the enemy leysure to prepare himselfe. The Duke held this Treaty of Montmelian to be sudden and rash; some braue spirits about him imputed it to cowardinesse, rather then to treason. He made answer by Bricheras, & allured the besieged to succor them; and presently after, he sent another letter in these termes: "Monsieur de Brandis, for the execution of that which I have signified vnto you, by the Cheualier Bricheras, behold, I am on horse-backe ready to passe the Alpes with so mighty an army, as if you will give me some little time, more then is specified in the capitulation, you shall see the sport, and bind me, mine, and all Sauoy for euer, to acknowledge you for the most faithfull, the most profitable, and the worstchief subiect in my Estates; you shall be noted throughout all Christendome, which now attends your resolution, and you shall free your selfe from the ignominy and reproch which you should incur by your Capitulation. Shew your selfe (I pray you) a Knight worthy of the house from whence you are defended, and of the loue I haue borne you: regard herein your honor chiefly, and the consequence which shall grow by your resolution, it is but for a few daies, if I come not by the time limited, and the Cardinall Aldebrandino, who is generally your ward, effects not what he doth expect, you must not respect your hostages, it is not likely they shall miscarry, and if the worst happen, they cannot import so much as the losse of that place. Write vnto me (if it be possible). In my hope from you, depends all that I am to doe with these goodly forces. If I were not assured to succor you speedily, I would not persewade you to breake the Capitulation. But this assurance makes me say vnto you, that you ought not to doubt, for these reasons and infinite others which you should lay before you. The Duke hath added in the end of his letter, these words with his own hand. "I thinke that Bricheras is already come vnto you, shew mee now the prooffe of so many promises which you haue made mee, and give mee the time that I haue set downe, and you shall see the sport where you are."

By this letter it seemed the Duke cared not much for the life of his Hostages: The Duke of Elspemont went by the Kings commandment and acquainted the Earle of Brandis with this Letter, who answered, I am ready to say vnto his Maiesty, that I will keep my word, in the assurance whereof I hold my life and honour. The King tooke a new assurance in writing, signed by him and the other Captaines, which had signed the Capitulation. Five daies after this confirmation, the Cardinall Aldebrandino signed by Montmelian, the army standing in battell, where hee was saluted by the Kings artillery, and that of the Castle. The Duke of Elspemont met him first vpon the bridge of Montmelian, and then all the Princes and Noblemen encountered him vpon the way, and accompanied him to Chambery, whereas the King received him with great honour; who in his first audience at the Capuchins, said vnto him: "That he doubted not of the iustice of his armes, and of the advantage which his valour had gotten him ouer the D. of Sauoy, but hee held him for a Prince so full of affection to the good and quiet of Christendome, as he would neuer vse the fruits of his victory to the ruine of the peace and publik tranquillity, but would suffer the Popes earnest motion vnto him to desire peace, to be of more force then the persuasions of such as invited him to continue this war: a war which was neither worthy the greatnesse of his courage, nor the fruits of his armes; for if it were made to enlarge his Empire, the Estate of Sauoy is a small thing, and if it were for the reuenge of some wrong, he should consider, that the reuenge which is not betwixt equal parties is alwaies vnjust, and hath no sparke of generosity in it. That war is vncertaine, and the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning; and there was no Prince that for the most assured opinions of victory, was to be commended in refusing the conditions of an honourable peace. A peace which the Pope desired for the good of Christendome: for the consolation of those which trembled at the Turkes approaches: who feared that this diuision would engage France in the fore passed miseries. A peace which the D. of Sauoy desired, and for the which he promised to yeild himselfe more tractable then euer he had beene. A peace which would bring forth meanes to succour the Christians affaires in Hungary, to root the memory of the Turke out of the world, and free Europe from his fury. The King answered him, That hee had alwaies held it for a rule of conscience to content himselfe with his own, as well as not to suffer an usurpation. But he could not hope for any reason from the D. of Sauoy but by arms, the which he was forced

A to vse to reuenge the vsurpation of his Marquise, seeing neither the feeling of his owne conscience, nor the iudgement of his Holinesse, nor the assurance of his promises made at Paris, could moue him to doe that which he ought. That if his army did passe the Alpes, he should find good seruants in Piedmont, and that the soile was as fertile as cuer it was to plant the Flower-de-luce there, and make it flourish, but when he should haue gotten all that the Duke holds on this and the other side of the mountains, hee would alwaies leave it in yeelding vnto his Marquise. The effect of this Ambassage was, that Herminio went to informe the Duke, that the Cardinall his master had disposed the King to a peace; the Duke received these news with ioy, and made choice of the Count d'Arconas, and the B. Siegnor d'Almes for this negotiation, commanding them to doe all the Legat should command touching the peace. The King notwithstanding sayd, that hee would not thinke of any peace vntill that Montmelian were yielded. And that his Councell was not neere him, the Constable and Chancellor being sent to Marfeilles to receiue the Queene. And the Duke was not so much inclined to a peace, but he did his endeavour to succour Montmelian. The twelfth of Nouember he came to the valley of Aost, with ten thousand foot, foure thousand Hargebuziers on horse-backe, and eight hundred men at armes: hauing past the Mount Saint Bernard, hee lodged at Ema being himselfe in person.

The King commanded the Count Saiffons to goe to Mouliters, where as Des Diguieres attended the enemy, and his Maiesty went from Chambery to Montmelian, to expect the yeelding vnto the place, the which was deliuered vnto the sixteenth of Nouember according to the capitulation by the Count Brandis, with great store of artillery, bullets, and powder to shoot aboue a thousand Cannon shot: the Marquis of Rhofny, and Creguy (who was appointed Gouernor by the King) entred into it with 500 men. His Maiesty hauing giuen order for Montmelian, departed the next day (without entring into the Castell) to visit his army.

He had his thoughts turned to peace, not so much for his owne inclination, nor for the consideration of his affaires, as for the reuerence he bare vnto the Popes aduice: his zeale to the publike good, and knowledge hee had of the disloyalty of his chiefe seruants. D But hee was sorry the Duke of Sauoy should take the paines to come so neare him and not see him, for hee lay still at Ema, at the foot of the Mount Saint Bernard, two leagues only distant from Mouliters, whither hee had sent the Earle of Saiffons and Des Diguieres. He came thither himselfe in person to view the seat of the Dukes lodging, and the countenance of his army, vnto a village called Vilette, and caused a skirmish to be giuen to five hundred men which were there for the guard of a bridge which they must passe to goe to Ema, it was so faintly defended, as they thought they would stand vpon their aduantage, and not abandon the river which serued them as a trench and ditch. The King returned the same day to Mouliters, and went to lodge at Villars neere to the Towne of Beaufort, whereas the Dukes of Montpenfier and Elspemont were lodged. Hee E commanded Nesleran to goe and discouer the passage of Cornet, and to see if there were any meanes to enter that way into the enemies lodging, the which hee performed happily, for he charged and defeated a Corps-de-guard of Milanois, which the Duke had placed vpon the descent of the passage, and presented some prisoners vnto the King. Hercupon his Maiesty resolved to charge the enemy by two wayes at one instant, meaning to enter by the passage of Cornet, and commanding the Earle of Saiffons to charge by that of Tarentaise: but there are accidents, though naturall and ordinarie, which cannot bee foreseene, and yet stay great executions: for the same night the Dukes army was so barricaded with snow, as there was no meanes nor deuice possible to approach.

F The King staid three dayes to see if the weather would alter, and make the passages accessible, but it fell out otherwile, for the snow increased. Hee returned to Chambery, from whence he sent the Earle of Saiffons to S. Katherines Fort, with an intent to follow him speedily, hauing caused two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, to passe along the Marquise of Saluces by the valley of Maire, vnder the conduct of Danriac, who tooke the Fort of Affail by Petard.

His Maiesty coming to Chambery, the Cardinall Aldebrandino presented vnto him Arconas and D'Almes, the Dukes Deputies for the Peace, to whom he sayd; Tout Ma ster hath nothing but words, and I shew the effects: I sayd unto you at Paris (speaking to Allies) that you were welcome, so I say now, but I meant not to treat, but with this Reverend personage, speaking of the Legate. Two dayes after this, the King went to take horse (having referred the Treaty of peace to the returne of his Chancelor and Councell from Marfeilles) and went with the rest of his army to assise S. Katherines Fort, whither in the beginning he had sent the Lord of Sancy, to raise a Regiment of foot in the Country, to keepe in the Garison of the Fort, and afterwards Monsieur de Vitry with the Regiments of the Cheuallier of Montmorency, Ceres and other troopes. Saint Katherines Fort is built vpon an high hill, which ouer-looks all the Country: it consists of five Bastions which are not walled, yet it is ditched and furnished with all things necessary: It lyes two Leagues from Geneva, defended by fixe hundred men, whereof two parts were Suisses. Some few dayes before the Kings arrival, one of the Captaines of the besieged, went forth with his Maiesties leaue to the Duke of Nemours, who with the Kings good leaue was retired to his House of Annic, that he might be freed from this warre, and not hurt or preiudice his Cousin the Duke of Sauoy, the King sent presently one of his Guard to bring him to Lduisel, where he was lodged, a quarter of a League from the Fort: hauing let him vnderstand the resolution of his designe, the greatnesse of his forces, and the small hope they should haue of the Duke: he prevailed so, as soone after his returne to his Companions, they did capitulate to depart with their baggage and armes, their drums founding, and Ensignes displayed, carrying away with them a third part of the Artillery, if they were not succored within ten dayes. The King left the Count Soissons to attend the effect of this capitulation, & went to Lyons to meet the Queen, as we shall shew hereafter.

The Duke of Sauoy having failed at Montmelian, gaue it out, that hee would succour Saint Katherines Fort. He had a goodly army, and those that were about him thought there were but too many to chafe the French out of Sauoy. Moreover, hee thought to haue passage by Valais, either willingly or by force: hee had also good friends among the petty Cantons of the Suisses, being distast with the seruice of this Crowne, for that they were not payed what was due vnto them. De Sic the Kings Ambassador, made all their friendship fruitlesse, employing himselfe worthily against all his practices: he assisted in all their assemblies, hauing good words to content some, and patience to digest the indiscretion of others, and courageous answers against the threats and braueries of the most difficult, yet he could not hinder the leauy of 4000 men, granted to the King of Spaine, by foure or five Cantons, for the defence of Milan, with charge not to enter vpon the Kings Dominions, vpon paine of death: but hee kept them from marching so soone as the enemy desired, which stay made them not onely vnprofitable, but also burthfull, by his great expences. The fixe dayes being expired, the Governor of S. Katherines Fort came forth with fixe hundred men, according to the Capitulation.

All the Captaines of the duke of Sauoys places excused their yeelding vpon necessitie, to accuse their Prince of indiscretion, who had reason to complaine of their valours, for they might haue done better. The Count Soissons aduertised, after the yeelding of Saint Katherines Fort, that the Duke comming by the Tarentaise, aduanced with his whole army, to succor the besieged, he assembled his troopes, and resolved to meet and fight with him if hee durst hazard the day. But hee was sooner aduertised of his retreat, then of his marching. The Duke had layd at Paris, and to the Siegneur of Fosleauille at Turin, that whosoever would make warre against him, hee would shew him sport for forty yeares space, but hee lost all Sauoy in lesse then forty daies, and there remained nothing in Bresse but the Citadell of Bourg. The Baron of Lux had reduced them within it to despair of all succours and constancy, and although they had great advantages ouer him, yet they got nothing but blowes in all their Sallies. They were more in number in the Citadell then in the Towne: There were no retrenchments to hinder their sallies, & yet Wit and Vigilance prescribed a Law to force a number. There was a conuey ready in the French County, prepared to put into the Citadell: the entry was easie by a way which the Baron of Lux had discovered. They fought to corrupt him: but he was so farre from giuing ear vnto this Charme, as he fortified this place with a good and vigilant guard: so as hauing reiected the enemies offers, he hindered the execution of their designs.

S. Katherines
Fort yeilded.

Hee was aduertised that Yanulier making shew to retire himselfe into the Franche Country, and to lay downe Armes, for that hee would not oppose himselfe against the Neutrality,

1601

A Neutrality, had seized vpon a Castell neere vnto Bourg, called Vernay, where there was great store of victuals, and plenty of prouision appointed for the Citadell. Hee sent speedily thither, and hindered Yanulier for drawing any thing out of that lodging, but his person and traine. After the Marshall of Biron returne from the Kings army, the Baron of Lux went to giue an account of the siege, whereupon the King tooke the subiect of this letter which he sent vnto Bouvens, commanding at the Citadell of Bourg.

"Monsieur de Bouvens hauing now more reason then euer, to hope for speedy Reduction of the place, I will let you vnderstand what esteeme I make of those which resemble you in Verreue and Valor, and testifie vnto you my bounty, by inuiting you to treat with me of a thing which in time cannot elcape mee, whether the warre bee continued, or the peace be made. For if your Duke could not succor the Castell of Montmelian, to whom in the Capitulation I had giuen a moneths respite to doe it, how shall hee now free you from the extremity whereunto you are reduced, being to fight with Reason, the length and discommoditie of wayes, the advantages which the occupation of Countreies, and passages of Riuers haue giuen me ouer him with my army, which is as strong and as well led as his? And thus much concerning warre. In respect of Peace, with the brute thereof the said Duke doth comfort and entertaine them that serue him, it is not a worke that can be finished in few daies; It may be you shall come to the extremity of your victuals before it be any thing aduanced. I haue demanded reason of the said Duke for many pretensions well grounded, which the Crowne of France hath vpon his Countreies, the which will not be loone enough ended to draw you out of paine. Moreover, if I should bee contented to treat onely for the Marquillate of Saluces, the said Duke offers already to leaue mee Bresse, with the place you hold for part of a recompence: So as it reflecth onely in mee to haue it either by warre or peace. Which being, you shall much better your condition, if you treat presently with me, and satisfie mee, for I will giue you occasion to commend my bounty.

The Kings letter to the Governor of Bourg.

You haue hitherto performed as much as a Gentleman of Resolution and Honour might doe, to defend that place, hauing in this dutie exceeded all others in the like charge, that I haue assayed. No man is bound to doe things impossible. It is the necessity of victuals and other things which oppresse and presse you, and which prescribe you a Law, with the small apparence there is now to hope for any succours of what kinde soeuer.

Resolue then to doe that which you cannot auoyde: You are aduised thereunto and inuited by a Prince, which makes profession of Glory, and to loue and esteeme men of Honor. If you consider the priuate estate in which you are, and whereunto the publike affaires are reduced, you would not lose this opportunity to assure your reputation, your person, family, and goods, being certaine, that if you reiect it, you cannot auoyd to make tryall of the rigours of Warre, which they deserue that attend the last extremity should reduce them to their enemies mercy and compassion. Let me then vnderstand your resolution by the returne of this Trumpet, whom I haue sent expressly herewith, and if you desire any further satisfaction of my intention concerning this Subiect, my Cousin the Duke of Biron will giue you content, being very well informed thereof, and on whom I doe greatly rely, &c.

This Letter was brought by a Trumpet vnto the Marshall of Biron, who sent it vnto Bouvens, and did accompany it with one of his owne, exhorting him to resolve according vnto necessitie, and not according vnto the affection which hee bare vnto his Prince, nor that which his courage did suggest: for Constancy must bee measured according vnto Reason; and it is rather Obstinacy and Wisfulness, when it resolves to things either impossible or vnreasonable. Bouvens answered not discreetly, but courageously, so as hee seemed to bee grieved, the French did not know his courage and vndanteded valour.

The Duke of Biron's letter to Bouvens.

Sir, when this place was put into my hand by the duke of Sauoy, my Lord and Master, I resolved to burie my selfe in it, and to performe the duty of an honest man. I grieve at nothing but that your Maiestie will not make tryall thereof by violence and force. Yet I hope to win as much glory in surmounting the necessities wherein your Maiestie thinks I am, as in resisting your attempts. And so I beseech you to beleue that I will always remaine your Maiesties most humble, most loyall and faithfull seruant, &c.

Monsieur de Beauvent.

He wrote in like manner to the Marshall of Biron, that hee held him to bee so great a Souldier, and making profession to loue men of worth, as he would allow of his Resolution, which was to keepe the place for him that had giuen it him in guard, vnto his last gaspe, holding it the greatest honor that could happen vnto him, to giue a testimonie vnto his Prince of that whereunto he was borne. His constancie was commended by the King, recompensed by the Duke, and propounded for an example to others.

But the Duke exhorted them by Letters to hold it good vntill the Treaty of Peace, whereof he assured them: the which was the onely meane (as wee shall shew) to free the besieged from the necessity whereunto they were reduced, and without the which they must needs haue false vnder his Maiesties subiection. Behold, all which passed of greatest import in the conquest of Sauoy and Bresse by the most Christian King. But this warre did not hinder him from thinking of his marriage; hee had bene contracted at Florence the five and twentieth day of August, Monsieur de Bellegarde, Master of the Kings horse, carried the procurement to the great Duke of Tuscany. The Duke of Mantua came to Florence the second of October, and the next day arrived the Ambassadour of Venice. The Pope would gladly haue had the Queene receiue this blessing of her marriage at his hands, and to haue done the like honour, as hee did to the Queene of Spaine at Ferrara, the which for certaine reasons could not be effected, and therefore hee sent the Cardinall Aldobrandino, his Holinesse Legate and Nephew, in whose hands the words of present Marriage were made.

The fourth of October, the Cardinall Aldobrandino entred into Florence with great pompe and magnificence, riding vnder a Canopie, and the Duke on his left hand, and so was conducted to the Dukes Palace. After Supper, in the presence of the great Duke of Tuscany, the Dukes of Mantua and Bracciano, the Princes Iohn and Anthony of Medici, together with the Lord of Bello-garde the Kings Ambassadour, hee delivered vnto the Queene the contentment which the Pope had of this Marriage, with a sweet kinde of Grauitie and Modestie: and a Discourse full of pleasing words: hee conceiued great hopes of great good to come, by the meane of this happy coniunction, not only for the houses of the Kings of France and the Dukes of Tuscany, but also for all Christendome: and not onely for Christian Kingdomes, but for all the whole world; so as the Queene moued with ioy and great hope, thanked his Holinesse, for this salutation, and said: That God hauing so decreed it, shee assured her selfe, that the blessing of the holy Father would bring the grace of God with it, whereof she would endeavour to make herselfe worthy and capable, recommending herselfe most humbly to the prayers of his Holinesse, and of the Church. Which words were deliuered after so Maiestically a manner, as if the Princesse had vsed alwaies to command absolutely: and so that day was spent. The 5 of October the marriage was celebrated after a Royall manner, the Legat said Masse, the which being ended the great Duke had a sonne christened, the Signeury of Venice giuing it the name. The Queene parted from Florence the 16 of October, and came to Lioorne the 17, where she imbarked in the great Dukes generall Gallie, being assisted by fise of the Popes Gallies, fise of Malta, and fixe more of the said Dukes. The King hauing intelligence of her imbarking, provided for her reception at Marseilles, and gaue the charge of his Will to the Duke of Guise, his Maiesties Lieutenant generall in Prouence: he also sent his Constable & Chancellor with the Dukes of Nemours, Guise, and Ventador to receiue her. The Cardinals of Joyeuz, Gondi, Guiry, and Sourdy, with many Bishops and Noblemen of the Council. The nauigation was dangerous in many places, and fearefull straights betwixt Genoua and Marseilles: yet with a resolute and chearfull countenance shee seemed to scorne the tempests of the sea. The 3 of Nouember sheooke port at Marseilles, being accompanied by the great Duchesse of Florence, the Duchesse of Mantua her sister, D. Anthony her brother, and the Duke of Bracciano. At their coming to land, there was a great question who should haue the right hand: The Knights of Malta would fight for it with fise Gallies, against the Florentines who had seuen. Without it they had the ranke which they desired, and with their valour had maintained since they were planted at Rhodes, there were no prayers nor coniurings could make them quite it, no nor for a moment. The great Prior of Champagne vnderooke the answer, and said: A head struck off can neuer be set on, and thus their Generall brought his owne in danger, if he allowed any precedence for a lesse time.

The

A The Queene leauing her Gallie, entred vpon a Theater made of two great boats: whereunto ioyned a bridge, which went vnto her Palace. The Constable receiued her, the Chancellor deliuered the Kings pleasure, foure Consuls of Marseilles presented her the keyes of the City, and a Canopy of cloth of siluer, vnder which shee was conducted to the Palace. One of the most remarkable actions during her abode there, was the protestation of obedience, which was made vnto her by the Court Parliament of Prouence, in the great Hall of the Palace, Monsieur de Vair making a most eloquent Oration.

“Madam, seeing your Maiesty to arise in this Prouince, and with you the felicity of France, we haue abandoned the seat of Iustice, where we haue the honour to sit, to come and prostrate our selues at your feet, to yeeld you the noblest and most worthy Homages which are due vnto the Crowne that doth now enuiron your head, and withall to pronounce our selues bound for all the vowes which wee haue at any tyme made for the good of this Estat. For assuredly we beleue that this day we are heard, and thinke that so many wonders, which God hath wrought for the restoring of this Realme, are fully accomplished, and that our good fortunes which seemed to be waivering, are now settled vpon a firme and irremouable foundation.”

God hath giuen vs a King excellent in vertue, admirable in bounty, and incomparable in valour, who by his labours hath giuen vs quiet; by his perils safetie; and by his victories, glorie: So as in a manner wee termed our selues happy, if this mournfull thought had not often troubled the course of our ioy: This care I say, which represented vnto vs, that Nature hath limited the life of all men, that Solitarie and Liberty made our Princes life lesse pleasing, and did diminish his care to cherish and gouerne it. For the which our wishes did euerie day seeke remedy, and knew not where to hope for them, vntill that the beames of your Royall countenance had pierced through the clouds of our cares, and lightened our eyes with a liuely hope, to see our happinesse as durable as it is admirable.

For seeing in you so many graces wherewith Nature hath endowed you, admiring that rare beauty wherewith the hath adorned you, considering that naturall sweetness wherewith she hath tempered your Royall grauitie, and hearing with our eares the voyce renowned by Fame, which proclaimes the quicknesse of your spirit, the soundnesse of your Iudgment, the Elegancie of your discourse, and that which doth exceed all the incomparable commendation of your holy and religious disposition: Wee perswade our selues that you are shee whom the Heauens had appointed by your pleasing company, to mollifie the life of our King, to prolong his dayes by his content, and to make his Raigne perpetuall by the continuance of a great and happy posteritie.

Wee beleue, that you onely are shee vpon earth, worthy to make the life of the most triumphant King vpon earth, to rest in your chaste bosome; and that hee aboute all others, did merit to embrace the most vertuous and pleasing Princesse in his victorious armes.

Whereby we preface, that wee shall soone see a number of goodly Children carying on their Fore-heads their fathers Valour, their mother Vertue, the greatnesse and nobilitie of the House of France, whereunto you are allyed, the happinesse and power of that of Austria, from whence you are issued, and the wisdom of that of Florence in the which you were borne.

To the beleeve of this preface, all things seeme to inuite vs: but chiefly the Heauen and Sea, for that wee see plainly at the very arriall of your Maiesty, the Sea full of torments is growne calme, and the Heauen ouercast with Clouds is cleare, as if they would with a pleasing Skie celebrate with vs the magnificence of your happy reception.

In good time then, O great Queene, are you come vnto our coasts, long may you liue happily in France, and for France: That the age which wee begin may see you in the end a happy Wife to our King: And future ages may terme you a happy Mother of Kings. But to heape vp the measure of your glorie, remember and remember againe, that as you are a great Queene, for that you are married to a great King, euen so you be come a charitable mother of children, whose true Father he is.

And therefore begin to take your share of this Royall care, and seeing that the Sub-

the loue and affection which this great King doth naturally beare to the good and ease of his people, to the end they may feel you as a new Star shining ouer them, carying them a happy and auspicious influence of all good and plentifull prosperitie.

"And we which seeke no other happinesse in this world but in his seruice, nor honour but in his obedience, and seeing you advanced with him in his Throne, we consecrate vnto you all the remainder of our liues, as we doe presently our hearts and affections to re-maine for euer your most humble, most faithfull, and most obedient seruants.

"This discourse was pleasing vnto the Queene, who by her attention and answer did witness how much she was pleased therewith. The Princes and Princesses did commend it, and learned men did admire it.

He made the like at Aix, whither the Queene went the seuenteenth of Nouember, from whence she parted the next day with aboute two thousand horse, and made her entry on the nineteenth into Auignon, where she was receiued with greater pompe and magnificence then in any other place: she stayed but three dayes at Auignon, and passed to Valence, Rouffillon, and Vienne, and came on the Saturday, being the second of December, to Guiliotiére.

The next day approaching neere vnto Lyons, there was met by Monsieur de la Guiche
the Gouernour, with the Nobility of the Towne and Countrey, who hauing done their obedience in the open field, went to horse-backe and conducted her to her lodging. C
There Roguelaur brought her newes of the King, and presented her in his Maiesties name with the great Royall Collar of inestimable value, which did beautifie her other ornaments: The next day after, she entred into the Towne. They had erected a Theater at La Motte couered with rich Tapistry, in the midst whereof was a throne for the Queene, where she receiued the honors, and heard the vowes and prayers of all the Orders of the Towne. The Chancelor was in this action the townes Interpreter, the which is as much honoured by his birth, as Athens was by the Phocians, and Rome by the Carates. The Clergie spake standing, all the rest kneeled, except those which spake for the Germanes, Imperiall Townes, Suisses, and Grilons. The Chancelor willed them to doe as the rest, and telling them that in this action, Strangers had no priuilege, and that they should do as the Princes subiects did, vnder whole lawes they liued. They gaue him to vnderstand, that they were in possession to speak standing: that at the entry of King Henry the second, they were no otherwise presented, and that the like difficultie happing at the entry of the King now reigning, in the same Towne, his Maiesty tooke it not ill they should stand vppon these termes. The Constable, who thought that an action of that consequence, should not lightly be passed ouer, nor the truth carelessly and irrespectively examined, as it hapned often in like accidents, hee would bee informed, if at other entries the Suisses and Germanes had beene presented vnto the King in other manner and fashion then the French. The Gouernour of Lyons reported the truth, wherewith they were satisfied and contented.

The whole Body of the Towne protested their obedience and affection at the Queenes feet. Balthazar of Villars President of Lyons won much honor, for the grace, grauity, and eloquence of his Oration. He spake for the Court of Iustice in this manner.

"Madam, the wonders which God would haue the world see in the birth and progress of the life and actions of our King, haue bene the effects of his diuine Iustice, to preferre vnto our Soueraigne Prince the lawfull inheritance of Saint Lewis: but that which wee now behold with admiration of this great Alliance, is an assured and infallible testimonie of his diuine bounty, and of that which he hath decreed for the good of the whole Realme. Time by his accustomed inconstancy, did threaten our happinesse with a great fall, wee did not enioy our quiet, but with feare to lose it: Our prosperities were but Leauens, and our Peace as a Flower. The wofull and lamentable History of our fore-passed disorders and tumults, did set before our eyes a fearfull image of future miseries: Our goodly dayes were troubled with nights of care, which a violent imagination presented vnto vs. It was the will of God, that for a full resolution of the happinesse of France, there should haue a second recourse to the most famous Race of the Me-dicis, to make our Flower-de-luce not only flourishing, but fruitfull & abounding in Roy-sire, it is the worthy subiect of all good and faithfull-hearted French-mens vowes. Your Maiestie hath bene referred by Heauen, to continue the sacred Stemme of our Kings, and to make their succession equall to the continuance of the world. Nature hath infused into your Maiestie all her greatest and richest gifts, to make you the ornament of France, which is the ornament of Europe. Yong Eagles are exposed to the Sunne-beames, to try their naturall generositie, and your Maiestie being issued from the Eagle by the mothers side, hath bene found capable to gaze vpon the Sunne, who with the beames of his Royall vertues, doth not onely lighten France, but all the world. All other eyes haue bene dazzled with the aspect of so great a light, onely yours will endure this shining, and by a sweeter reflection, the shadow of your Royall countenance, will raise our hopes to the highest heauen of felicitie, and shall make vs see in our dayes, the most firme assurance of our peace and quiet. Receiue, Madame, if you please, the homage which wee yeeld vnto your Maiestie, to whom we offer our hearts as pleasing sacrifices of our most humble obedience.

She stayed eight daies at Lyons before she could see the King, demanding euer when he would come, and in this expectation the houres seemes yeares vnto her. The King after the capitulation of S. Katherine fort, tooke post and came the 9. of December to Lyons.
C The Chancelor aduertised her that he would come that day, being at supper a Gentleman came to tell her, that the King was within a quarter of a league of the city, and that within lesse then an houre she should see him. The ioy of this good newes had taken away her appetite to any meat. The King was already entred disguised, and was gotten into the prelle among certain Gentle-men, where he might see and not be seen. After supper the retired into her chamber, and the King entred presently after: the Queene cast her selfe at his Maiesties feet, and heooke her vp and embraced her, where after many kinde embrac-ings of mutuall loue and respect, the King went to supper. During the which, the King sent the Queene word by the Duchesse of Nemours, that he was come without a bed, hopping that hee would afford him part of hers, which should be common vnto them, from that time: To whom the Queene answered, that he was come to please and obey his Mai-esties will, as his most humble seruant. This being deliuered vnto the King, hee vnclouthed himselfe and entred into the Queenes chamber, whom he found in bed, and then the Ladies retired. The Cardinall Aldebrandino, the Popes Legate, being at Chambery, the King sent to inuite him to his marriage, and to come to Lyons, with the Duke of Sauoy Deputies, where they should treat more commodiously then at Chambery. He made his entry the 16. of the month, where hee was receiued with honours fit for so great a dignitie: the Prince Conty and the Duke Montpensier conducted him, going vnder a canopie carried by the Burgesies of the towne, the streets were hanged; the Inhabitants were in armes, and the Clergy went singing before him: and in this sort he was conducted to Saint Johns Church. And although the marriage were perfect (the King hauing ratified it by procuracion, and by words of the present which the said Legate had receiued, so as there needed no other solemnity) yet would he make his subiects partakers of this publike ioy, appointing the Ceremony the Sunday following, the which was celebrated before the Great Altar of S. Johns Church, whereas the nuptial blessing was given by the Legate to the married couple. After the which a Largesse of pieces of gold and siluer, marked with a speciall deuice were cast vnto the people. All which performed, they went to the Royall feast in the Archbishops Great Hall.

We haue said, that in the end of the last yeare, the Cardinall Aldebrandino, Legate of his Holinesse, made his entry into Lyons to treat a Peace betwixt the King and the Duke of Sauoy: Presently after the Ceremony and Confirmation of the Nuptial blessing of their Maiesties, they began the Treaty of this Peace: the Proposition had beene made at Chambery, but the conclusion was referred and ended at Lyons. The King had made choise among all his Councell of the President Sillery and Lanis, to deliuer his intentions vnto the Legate, who acquainted Arcenas and Almyes therewith: First the Dukes Deputies demanded peace of the King, in yeelding vp vnto him the Marquisate of Saluzzo.
The King answered, I haue loue a warre, but he had neuer refused peace to them, that had demanded it: that seeing the Duke desired Peace, and his Holinesse perswaded him, it is, for the quiet of Christendome, that he was content to grant it, so as the Duke did yeeld him his Marquisate, and pay him eight hundred thousand crowns which he had disbursed for the wars of Saouy. The Legate found well by this demand that the Peace was not so facile to be made as hee expected: he spake vnto the King and told him, That the Duke could not yeeld the Marquisate, and so great a summe of money, but he would give him all Bresse in exchange: and for all the changes and other his Maiesties pretensions, he would give him moreover Saouy, Verromay, and other Lands vnto the river of Rhosne. This Proposition was accepted by the Kings Deputies, so as they yeelded vp the Castles of Centall, Mont and Roque-palmier, which did not belong to the Marquisate, but to the Prouinces of Daulphine and Prouence. The Deputies said, that what they offered was for all pretensions: to whom they answered, That nothing could then be concluded.

These things were so wisely handled by the Kings Deputies, as the Dukes Deputies offered besides a part of the Baylywicke of Gex, a hundred thousand Crownes, so as the King did yeeld vp what he led in Saouy, especially the Castle of Montmelian and Saint Katherine's fort, in the same Estate they were.

Saint Katherine's fort named by the Geneuoiis.

As they were vpon these termes, newes comes, that they of Geneua had ruined S. Katherine's fort, and that with such animosity and diligence, as within two dayes after you could scarce discern the forme of it, for this fort was built but of earth. The Legate was wonderfully discontented thereat, and complained, saying, That he would returne to Rome, without doing any thing, seeing they kept not their word with him, that he cranked his reputation this demolition as an affront done vnto him. The Kings Deputies answered him, That the King had no need of a Peace with the Duke, but for that his Holinesse perswaded him thereto: that it was a small cause to breake the Treaty of Peace, seeing it was but a piece of earth: that the foundation should remaine vnto the Duke, the which he might repaire when he pleased. The King tooke the Legats words for a renuing of the warre, and gaue leaue to his armie to do all acts of Hostilitie, charging the Commanders to stand vpon their guard, to defend and offend, as occasions and meanes should be presented. Whereupon all despayring of peace, made new enterprises; judging, that the King would not rest, hauing so great advantages, they talked of nothing but of founting of Armes, preparing of horses, seeking of money, and to make them ready for a new warre.

The Kings answer to the Ambassadors
of Spaine.

Taxis the King of Spaines Ambassador came vnto the King, to let him vnderstand, That if a Peace were not concluded, his Master should be forced to enter into this warre, to preserve his Nephews Estate. To whom the King answered, That hee would live in peace with them that loued peace; but whosoever should seek to support the Duke in this vnjust warre, hee would make them repent it. That hee would make warre like a Lion against them that played the Foxes with him, and would strike them, that should make but shew to threaten him.

The Dukes Deputies (thinking that the Kings victory was neither absolute, nor perfect, so long as Bourg held good) did still temporize, not caring to presse the conclusion of this Peace, no further than the extremities of this place did presse them, and in the meane time the Duke should haue leisure to attempt something vpon his owne or vpon that which was the Kings. And in truth if Bourg had bene relieved, or the conuoy which was in the Franche Countie had entred, the Peace had bene broken. Besides the wants and impatience of the besieged, they without vsed a policy which made them almost desperate: some men chosen for the purpose gaue them to vnderstand, that the Dukes Deputies did prolong things; vpon assurance that the Citadell might hold good a moneth, and that they cared not to finish the Treaty, nor to supply the necessities of the besieged, so as this temporizing, at what price and perill soeuer, might giue the Duke time to doe his businesse. This did pierce so deeply and wrought such an impression in the besieged, as (despighted with the tediousnesse of the Treaty, and wearied with the languishing of the besieged) they resolved not to suffer any more, seeing the Deputies did not consider what they suffered, but how much and how long they might suffer. Vpon this vaine reitour they write vnto the Deputies in these termes, "My Lords, your protractiōs and delays kill vs, the temporizing of your Treaty, is prejudiciall to the honor of our Master, and the health of his seruants that are in this place: make hast then to finish the Peace, for wee cannot hold about two dayes: it is the prefixed time of our resistance. Declare the better, who will acquaint you with the rest of our extreme necessity. Attend no other

A other Letters from vs, fare ye well, &c. Yet they were not so ill as they said, but in matter of siege, all failes when as they want patience. This Letter with the full report of the horrors and inhumanities which extreame famine caused in the Citadell of Bourg; awaked the Ambassadors from the slumber, which the ruining of S. Katherine's fort had held them in.

Vpon these newes they goe vnto the Cardinal, they beseech him, that the ruine of one place (whose foundation remained to the Duke) might not hinder the perfecting of this great building of peace, the which notwithstanding could not be but necessary, and profitable. The Cardinal who knew that the Duke was much discontented with this demolition, and that the Count Fuentes army was much increased, and their minds more inclined to warre then peace, and yet being loth to repasse the Alpes, without the glory to haue quenched this fire, he said vnto the Ambassadors, that he could not re-enter into the treatie of peace, if they did not give it him in writing vnder their hands, that it was their aduice, and that they intreated him to doe it, as profitable for the Duke, and necessarie for his Estate. The Ambassadors being too much amazed with the newes of the extreame wants of the Citadell of Bourg, fearing it would be lost before the peace was concluded, the which would impair the bargain, they willingly past this promise.

The Treaty
renewed.

The Cardinal was still in choller that the demolition of Saint Katherine's fort, should send him backe to Rome, and not carie the Pope that contentment of his Legation which he expected. The King would gladly, the Pope should haue remained satisfied with the sinceritie of his actions, but neither his honour nor his humour would suffer him to intreat. He therefore thinks it dishonorable to perswade him to peace that hath more need of it then himselfe. Hee is therefore resolved to warre; and seeing that the Legate continued still in his complaints, hee commanded the Marquis of Rhosny to goe to Paris to take order for munitions of warre. Being ready to take horse for the execution of the Kings commandement, hee goes to take his leaue of the Legate, and toucheth some things of the cause of his voyage, saying, "That it was the Kings resolution to make warre, seeing they could not hold themselves to a peace. That for his part hee was forrie, that so great a personage as himselfe should take the paines to passe the mountaines and bring them so neere vnto the Temple of peace, and not to enter into it: the Legate answered, That he was much grieved that his Legation and the paine hee had taken proved fruitlesse: that he knew well the King in shew desired peace, but in effect warre was his delight."

Rhosny replied, that if peace were good before the demolition of the fort, it was now also good, that this accident did nothing import, seeing the ground was the Dukes, to doe withall what he pleased, and that for fifty thousand crownes he might build another fort. The Dukes Ambassadors gaue the same reasons, conuincing him not to abandon the ship in this tempest, seeing he had taken the helme in hand in a calme season. Hereupon the Legate asked Rhosny if he thought the King would be pleased to recompence this demolition with money. Rhosny answered him, that he knew nothing, but being a thing reasonable, and the King a Prince of reason, he presumed that if hee should promise it in his Maiesties name, he would not faile of his promise. The Legate intreated him to acquaint him with it, saying that he was forie he had dealt no sooner in the businesse. Rhosny tels the King thereof, and returns his Maiesties intension vnto the Legate, and so with a little moderation they finish this worke of peace. The Articles were drawne and agreed vpon, and the Ambassadors of Saouy sent for to signe them, they come and tell the Legate, in his care that their Master had forbidden them to signe, before that he had talked with the Count of Fuentes.

Rhosny did show the money of the Peace.

The Legate who would not haue his word giuen vnto the King to remaine vnpromisable, nor send backe the Kings Deputies, or referre the assembly to another time, intreats them not to make any shew of this charge, but to signe. They answer him that their hands and tongues were bound. The Legate doth presse them, & they intreat him to giue them leaue to conferre with Taxis the Spanish Ambassador, to the end that their doings might be countenanced by his counsell. They repaire vnto the Oraele, they consult of two Letters, the first of the eight of Ianuary, which commanded them to signe the peace, the second of the eleventh which did forbid them. Taxis (who vnderstood the iurisdiction of the Councell of Spaine, who knowes that a Peace is desired, so as the Marquisate might be con-

continue on the other side of the Alpes, and that there might bee a passage on this side to A. goe into Flanders; who weighed the conditions of peace, not by the difficulties of reasons, but by the prosperity of euent; not by the pieces, but by the whole, wherein hee findes what his Master desired; and wether them. That seeing his Highnesse hath commanded you to signe the peace four dayes since, I see nothing happened since, that may bee sufficient or available to reuoke this commandement, nor the word which hee had giuen you to effect it. It is true that I thinke by this last Letter, you are bound to stay the time which he demands to conferre with the Count Fuentes.

Hereupon arised the Patriarke of Constantinople, great in perswasions, found in reasons, profound in Councell, & subtil in inuentions. He sheweth them the importance of B this breach, the wrong done vnto the King, and the Legats word engaged. That the Duke writing this Letter had not considered that the first was effected, that the Estate of the businesse allowed no countermand, that that which was yesterday voluntarie, is this day fastened with nayles of Diamonds to an ineuitable necessitie: That the wings of the dukes hopes were glued with the wax of his opinions; that irresolution the mother of great inconveniencies, which had begonne his ruine, would finish it: That God was offended with them who reiected and contemned the conditions of Peace that were iust and honorable: That it was a great indiscretion to engage himselfe in the perpetuall inconveniencies of this warre, vpon foundations that were neither firme nor perpetuall, and to continue a great warre against a mighty enemy, vpon succours which could not be certaine, seeing C it depended vpon the will of another: That a Prince assailed by one more mighty, cannot erre more grossly in his carriage, nor commit a greater fault then to refuse peace, which cannot be but honourable, seeing it stayes the Conquerors victory.

The Dukes Ambassadors who feared more to erre by disobedience, then by obstinacy, stand firme vpon the necessity of the Dukes command: for the order which a Prince prescribeth to his Ambassador may not be altered. The Patriarke assures them that the Legat, who had authoritie from their Master to command them, and they bound to obey him in all that he should iudge profitable for his affaires, should warrant them vnder his hand from all blame which they apprehended; that he would take the paines to goe vnto his Highnesse to Thurin, to let him vnderstand that they had done nothing but what hee should haue done himselfe, and that he would employ all the power his vnclie had, both D in heauen, and in earth, to free them from danger. The Ambassadors (who seemed not to will that which they most desired, with such impatience, as the houres seemed yeares vnto them) were content with this assurance signed by the Legat, and a moneths respite for the Duke to ratifie what they had signed.

So the Peace was concluded and proclaimed at Lions the seuenteenth day of Ianuary, in the year 1601, the substance whereof was; That the Duke should yeeld vp and trans- E port wholly vnto the King, and to his successors Kings of France, all the country and Seigneuries of Bresse, Beaugency and Veromey, and generally all that belongs vnto him, vnto the riuier of Rhosne, so as all the riuier from Geneva should belong to the Crowne of France; the which should remaine vnto the King and his successors with all the Soueraignty, iurisdiction and rights which the said Duke might haue ouer the said coun- tries, reseruing nothing but the bridge of Grefin for the commoditie of the passage: the which is vpon the riuier of Rhosne, betwixt Ecluse and the bridge of Arlay, which by this present Treaty belongs vnto the King: and on the other side of the riuier of Rhosne, the duke should enjoy the parishes of Ella, Luyuent, & Cizerre with all the Ham- lets and Territories which belong vnto them, betwixt the riuier of Varenne, and the moun- taine called the Grand Credo, vnto the Village called La Riuere, whereas the riuier of Va- renne doth passe, with Maigrecombe, vnto the neereft entry into the County of Bour- gogne, vpon condition that the Duke should not leaue any impositions vpon the goods F and Merchandise, nor any toll vpon the riuier at Pont de Grefin; or any other places be- fore mentioned. Moreover, the Duke might not build any fort vpon any place that was reserued for the passage, but should remaine free as well for the Kings subjects, as for all that would goe or come into France, and the soldiers which shall passe through the Kings country, for the Dukes seruite, or any other Prince, by the sufferance of his Gouvernours Lieutenants generall, shal no way annoy his Maiesties subjects. And for the effecting of that above-mentioned, the Duke should deliuer vnto the King (or to any one depured by him) the

A the Citadell of Bourg, as it then was, without any demolition, and all the Artillery, Pow- der, Bullets and munition of warre, which shall bee in the place at the yeelding thereof. Moreover, the Duke did passe ouer vnto the King, on the other side of the Riuier of Rhosne, the places and villages of Aux, Choufly, Volley, Pont D' Arley, Cessell, Chancy and Pi- erre Chastel, with all the foueraignty and iurisdiction hee might haue ouer those places, and the Inhabitants thereof. The said Duke did also transport and resigne vnto the King, the Barony and Baylywick of Getz, with all the appurtenances, as the Duke and his Predecessors had formerly enjoyed it, without any retention. All which places and things yeilded and resigned, should remaine vnted and incorporated to the Crowne of France, B and should be reputed the patrimony of the Crowne, and might not be separated for any cause whatsoeuer. Also it was agreed that the said Duke should truly and effectually re- store vnto the King, or to any one depured by his Maiesty, the place, towne and Chastel- leny of Castle Daulphin, with the Tower of Pont, and all that had been held by the Duke, or any of his, depending of Daulphine, in the same estate they then were in, without any demolition or ruine, leauing in the said places, all the Artillery, Powder, Bullets and munition of warre which were then in the said places, the fouldiers carrying away such goods as belonged vnto them, without exacting any thing of the Inhabitants. It was also agreed that the said Duke should demantle the fort of Beche Daulphin, the which was built during warre, and should pay for the passage reserued, a hundred thousand crownes in the cite of C Lions, fifty thousand ready downe, when as the fort of Charbonniers should be yeilded vp, and other fifty thousand within six moneths after.

And in regard of the said cession and resignation, the King should be contented (for the good of peace) to quit and resigne vnto the Duke, his heires and successors, all the rights and pretensions which he or the Daulphins of France had, or might haue to the Marquis- sat of Saluces, and all the dependances, with the townes of Cental, Mons and Roque- spervier, without retaining any thing: leauing vnto the Duke all the Artillery, Powder, Bullets and munition of warre, which were in the said places, in the year 1598. The King did also promise to restore vnto the Duke (or to any one that should be depured by him) all places that had bene taken since the year of our Lord 1588 from the said Duke, and D now held by his Maiesty or his seruants, all in the same estate they then were, and without any demolition, and in restoring of the said places, the King might transport all the Artil- lery, Powder, Bullets and munition of warre that was in them, and all the goods that be- longed vnto the fouldiers, not exacting any thing of the Inhabitants.

These were the chiefe points of the Treaty of Peace, the which was signed by the Legat and the Duke, and thanks giuen vnto God. The King holding his abode at Lions (after this conclusion) to be vnprofitable, takes post and goes to Paris. The Legate goes to Auignon by the Riuier of Rhosne. The King left the Constable, Villeroi and the Deputies at Lions for performance of the Treaty. At the same time Herminio was dispatched to carie newes vnto the Pope, and in passing to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count Fuentes, E he found them both at Some vpon Po to consult of the meanes which the Duke of Biron propounded vnto them, to resolute vpon warre rather then peace. The Duke receiues it as the most ruinous effect of all his aduentures, swearing that hee would cut off his Am- bassadors heads that had signed it.

The Count Fuentes said that he had not to doe with this peace, hauing so many iust oc- casions and such good meanes to make warre, that hee would not let forty thousand men, and forty peeces of Cannon remaine idle. Both seemed discontented, the one for that the King, or the King of Spaine had all the benefit of the peace, and the other for that him- selfe should haue neede of him by the warre, and hee should keepe Piedmont in awe.

The Duke complained that the Councell of Spaine had kindled a warre to consume F him, they had thrust him into a storme, to make profit of his shipwracke, and had drawne him to a preiudiciall exchange, reaping no benefit, for that the French were out of Ita- ly, hauing their nearer neighbours in another place, nor that Milan should be covered, or that Italy should haue the Alpes to guard it from the inundations which it had receiued in former times by the forces of France, seeing this rampart was made with the wea- ning of his Estates.

The Count of Fuentes fore-seeing wherunto these complaints did tend, gaue the Duke to vnderstand, That the King of Spaine his Master, had reason to complaine of this great and fruitlesse charge, being a troublesome thing to entertaine great forces to no effect: that this mighty and fearefull army was not raised nor entertained, but to restore him to his Estate: that the fault was in himselfe, if it were not employed: and withall, he added the mutinies and murmuring of the Spaniards, who complained, that they deprived them of the fruits of a victory which they did limit with no lesse then the taking of Lions. In this contention they resolute, not to signe any thing without the K. of Spaines commandement, and to keepe the armie still ready to march, to make himselfe to be more feared, and to be more assured. The Kings Deputies being advertised that the Duke made no care to confirme what had been concluded, they advertised the King thereof, and sent a post vnto the Legat, being at Auignon, to know his opinion thereof. The King commands them to attend the Dukes resolution, without impatience, being indifferent vnto him which he made choise of, but he should shew a weak judgement, if hee should accept of any but of peace: for that he should not of a long time recouer that by warre, which peace should now presently bring him.

The Legate was so moued with this alarm, as he presently tooke post to goe vnto the Duke, sending Count Orazio Taziani to the King, to advertise him of his voyage; and to beseech him not to enter into any distrust of the Treaty, being so greatly interested in the obseruation thereof, as he could no longer endure this brute and suspence with patience: and that he would be pleased to grant a prolongation of the truce & a suspension of Armes for fiftene dayes, besides the time limited for the ratification: Such as knew not the negotiation betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count Fuertes, and the Marshall Biron, could not beleue that the D. of Sauoy would make any difficulty to signe the Treaty, but that he made some shew of it to haue it seeme the better. For those that were interested with him in the Treaty, did not promise to returne any more vnto the warre.

It is true, that if the Duke of Biron would haue taken the Citadell of Bourg, as the Duke would haue deliuered it vnto him, the King must haue returned with as great speed to Lions as he departed. In the meane time the Legate past all passages by post in a troublesome time, and came to Genoa, from whence hee sent to the Duke and Count Fuertes, to keepe their word with him.

The Duke of Biron refuseth the Citadell of Bourg, being vnassured of victuall and Munition.

The Duke hearing of his arrival at Alexandria, parts from Nice, and goes to Thurin, D and both of them excuse themselves. The Count made his refusal, to take from the Duke all subiect of complaint, that they had abandoned him, and that hee had meanes to recouer his Estates, if they had assisted him. The Duke would be recompenced for this vnequall exchange before he signed by the King of Spaine. So the Legate receiues nothing from the one but complaints, and from the other but respects, and from both words of contempt against the Treaty. Hee met with the Count Fuertes at Tortoul, and from thence went to Milan, where he past the Shroue-tide: The Count Fuertes omitting no kinde of recreation to driue away melancholy, attending the Duke of Sauoys resolution, who sent to excuse himselfe by the indisposition of his children, and promised to come to Milan, but committing not the Legat and the Earle went to Pavia, with an opinion that the Duke would not come thither. The Legate sends Taziani vnto him, who returns with excuses of his sonnes sickness, and his complaints of the vnjust and preiudiciall conditions wherunto he was bound.

The Legate sends backe Taziani to the Count Fuertes, giuing him to vnderstand that hee knew well that his legation had not beene vnderaken, but for the seruice of the King of Spaine, at the intreaty of the Duke of Sciffa his Ambassador: that he was not come, for the Duke of Sauoy who mockt him, and considered not that he had done more for him then father or mother; that hee cared not for his ratification, and much lesse to see him, or to thanke him for his paines: that hee excused his affection in the infirmities of his soome, but if he thought that he would attend to proceed vntill that hee were cured, hee was deceiued. The Count Fuertes answers that the effect of the Treaty depends not vpon his signing, and that he must not send vnto him to effect it. The Legat to cut off these temporising and delays, and to discouer where the fault was, that the peace was not signed, aduised himselfe of a subtilty, worthy of a Romane, and of a Cardinall. He commands the Count Taziani to say vnto the Count Fuertes, that hee was advertised from the Duke, that all the difficulties in this businesse were framed by the Count; who restrained the Dukes liberly, in the signing and execution of the Treaty.

The Legat discontented with the D. of Sauoy

The Count Fuertes excule.

He

A He had scarce entred into this discourse, when as the Count Fuertes (full of choller that all the blame should be laid vpon him) went to horse, and came vnto the Legat, to whom hee discouered all the secret betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and him. Many dayes are spent in going and coming. In the end, the King of Spaine, who desired to begin his raigne by warre, would haue no peace, but vanquished by the perswasions of the Duke of Lerma, who thought peace to be more profitable for his condition, hoping to gouerne his Master more freely in the delights of peace, then in troubles of warre, sent vnto the Count Fuertes, that seeing they restored vnto the Duke of Sauoy his Country, and that he might keepe the Marquisate of Saluces, he would employ his forces elswhere, and confirme the Treaty of Lions. The Duke is forced to follow this course, there is no more armie for him. There was one complement yet remaining. The Duke was desirous to see the Legate: the paines which he had taken deferred this view and thanks. The Legate meant to goe speedily to Rome.

The Duke imbarques vpon the Riuer of Po, to goe visit him, and sends a Post to advertise him of his imbarking. Here was an accident that had almost spoiled all. This messenger reports vnto the Duke that he had met the Legat, and the Count Fuertes in Carosse together vpon the way, who returned when as he advertised them of his coming. The Duke discontented with this returne, sends them word that hee was gone backe. The Legate enters presently into a small barke, follows after, and ouertakes him, whereas the riuer of Tefin enters into Po. The Duke being advertised, turnes head and ioynes with him. They strue who shal enter into the others boat, but the Duke escapes into the Legats, and sits downe by him: they spent some words in complements, before they entered into the Treaty of Peace.

The Legat and the Duke of Sauoy meet.

The Legate protested that in all this negotation, hee had nothing else in his thought, but the good of his Highnesse estate, but he was incountred with so many difficulties, and necessities, which ouer-ruled his affection, as he was forced to preferre profitable and necessarie things, before that which was goodly in shew. The Duke thanked him for the paines he had taken, but so coldly, as the Legat found wel, that he held not himselfe beholding vnto him. The one tooke his way to Thurin, and the other to Pavia, and so to passe to Rome. The Duke had signed, but he was not yet well resolved to obserue the peace. The feare left Bourg should be lost before the conclusion of the Treaty, made his Ambassadors to resolute: the Assurance which Bouvens now gaue the Duke, that he would incounter all extremities, both of famine and force, made him vnwilling to performe the Treaty, sending Bely his Chancellor to Rome, to make his excuse, that hee signed it not. The Pope tooke it ill, that a Chancellor, a man of peace, should intreat him to vndo that which the Legat his Nephew had done, and sent him backe with his answer.

The Dukes irresolution.

He sends Bely his Chancellor to Rome.

But for all this the Duke seeks to smother this peace in the Cradle, and grounds his last hope vpon Bouvens, to whom hee sends the countersigne, without the which hee was bound not to yeeld it.

A countersigne carried to Bouvens.

E This token was but counterfeit. D' Hostel played another part, he made this his colour to haue meanes to enter into the Citadell, and to giue this countersigne to Bouvens for his warrant; and thereby to assure him that if hee had meanes to hold good a moneth, hee should disclaime the signing of the ratification, and make a shew of disobedience, and hee should be relieved. D' Hostel went into the Citadell, and found that misery would not suffer them to want of resistance as they had done, that things were no more in the estate that Bouvens had represented them; and that their necessities were so extreme, as there was no meanes to suffer them any longer, being prest without by the Kings armie, and within by cold and hunger, which made the Duke more tractable to yeeld that which he could not hold, sending the ratification in the beginning of March, and at the same time to the Citadell was deliuered into the Kings power.

The generall censures of this peace were diuers. The King was pleased that the profit was apparant, and assured for his Estates: hauing for one Marquisate, more Earles and Marquises; then there are Gentlemen in the Marquisate of Saluces, enlarging his frontiers about thirty leagues, and so restrained the Dukes estate on this side the mountains: as he hath left two third parts, lost eight hundred Gentlemen, and a fort which he himselfe writing vnto Bouvens esteemed more then all the Marquisate, with Provinces in Strals. any be in France. It is true that the Honour to keep that which was the cause of the warre remained remained to the Duke, and by this means of a peace he hath no more need of Spaniards, A nor of the Count of Fuentes, who did him always some Spanish affront, and is free from all feare of the French, who kept Piedmont in awe while they had a retreat there. The Duke, who neuer went out of the gates of Thurin without six companies of horse for his guard, and entertained Garisons which cost him more then the reuenues of the countries exchanged, may now sleepe, and goe and come in safety. This moneth of March Louyse of Lorraine, Dowager of France, Widow to Henry the third, King of France, died: her death was better knowne by the losse of such a light, then by the mourning of her heyres, or the honour of her funerals; for the Duke of Mercure her brother, to whom she left her goods, and the execution of her will, was then in Hungary. The Duchesse of Mercure attended on her vntill she died, and laid her body in the Couent of Saint Clare, vntill shee might be entered with greater pompe. She desired to be layd in one Tombe with the King, whose body attends vntill that the piety of the liuing may remember the condition of the dead, the which giues cause of amazement, that the earth which neuer failes for the life of Princes, should now want for their interment.

The desire of this Princesse was not performed, although the will of the dead ought to be religiously obserued, the best part of her life had bene a troublesome carriere of affliction, more fertill in thornes then in roses: but it is the way of heauen, which hath bene beaten by all the happy, and there is no reason to make a new for them that came last, how great and mighty fouer they be. King Henry the third going into Poland saw her so faire, as at his returne when as death had made him forget the Princesse of Conde, in whose remembrance he did sometimes forget the greauous and grauity of a King, he remembered her, and by the aduice of the Duchesse of Lorraine his Sister, who said that there was not any woman in the world more fit for his humour then this Princesse: hee demanded her, and had her to wife. Cast was sent vnto her, and found her coming from Saint Nicholas, whither she had gone in pilgrimage on foot. The Queene of Nauarre did much disdaine this alliance, apprehending to march after a daughter to the Earle of Vaudemour: for this cause the King would not haue her goe one day after her who should thinke her selfe honored the next day to be the first after her: so as there was no difference betwene her coming, making sure, and marriage.

Six weekes after her marriage they found her to be with child; but soone after she had a mischance, and had a false birth, being a sonne. This caused her to haue a Iaudlife for a time, and an indisposition for euer, which made the King and Realme out of hope to see her a mother. This barrenesse made the Queenes life barren of all content. It is true that the three or foure first yeares were spent in all delights. The King made no voyage without her, no feast where she was not; he could not be to any other, being wholly to her, his delights were vnto her desires. Before his marriage he had loued Chastelaine-neuf, one of the Queene-mothers Mayds, the fire had bene so violent, as the ashes were yet hot, and had bene sufficient to kindle a new flame, if the Queenes wisedome had not caused them to be cast into the wind, when this great beauty appeared the rest lost much of their light. The Queene was somewhat troubled: but when as the Queene-mother told her that she had endured much more, her griefe was somewhat asswaged, though not altogether taken away. She dissembled vntill that she saw this virgin come one day to dance attired by emulation, like her self, at what time she told the Queene-mother that she could endure it no longer: the who loued her dearly, wrought so as this Star was eclipsed, & appeared no more; she left the Kings heart as well as the Court, and in despite married at her owne will. This Princesse who had neuer bin bred vp but in her fathers court, grew suddenly very skillfull in all the complements of Court. The King instructed her himselfe in all the perfitions which the world admires. Neuer Queene before her did better vnderstand what did belong to Queenes. She had past through all the honours which are due to Kings wiues. She was crowned Queene: she had set twice in the Assembly of the Estates of the Realme: she received all sorts of Ambassadors, with lesse or more respect, according vnto the dignity of the Prince from whence they were sent, and shewed in her discourse wisedome, government, and much iudgement. She wonne the Queene-mothers heart so absolutely, as none but shee could please it; there was such a conformity betwixt them, as what pleased the one could not displease the other. There was also a great intelligence betwixt her and the duke of Alençon, who honoured her as much as if he had bene farre inferiour vnto her: it was thought

A thought that if the King had died vpon a disease in his eare, whereof the Physicians were in some doubt, he would haue married her, vnlesse the Pope had denied a dispensation. Also, when he was dead, it seemed she would no more vie her eyes but to weepe. They held her to be very disdainfull, neither did she regard the Princes and Princesses of the blood as she ought, louing none but them of her owne House. The Kings great heat of loue beganne to grow cold. His heart was like a tree planted on the high way, whose fruit is free for all passengers. He committed much excesse, and gaue himselfe to the pleasures of the Court, which did then abound: he was not pleased to see her richly attired, nor to see her in companies. He made two voyages to Lions without her, his nature still affecting new things. Shee who loued the Princes of her House, was grieved to see them sequestered from the Kings fauours, which the Dukes of Joyeuse and Elsporn did wholly enioy. They were all in Court, and did possesse the Kings heart absolutely. Then she began to take the course of piety and deuotion, which she had rather discontinued then forgotten, hauing sucked deuotion from the bosome of piety. The King on the other side began to frequent reformed Cloysters. Shee was rather seene in the Churches then at the Loure.

This Sphere of deuotion did alwayes turne, neither could any occasion either within or without the Court stay the course thereof. She began to neglect that great beauty, which at her coming had made her amiable, and admirable, and gaue her the prize of all the beauties of the West. The Roses and the Lillies of her liuely hiew were withered, more through the rigour of affliction then for age. And though the Kings affections were much diminished, yet they had neuer but one bed, neither did they lye asunder but fix or seuen months, by the aduice of the Physicians, vpon an infirmity of the Kings which was contagious. Shee was much afflicted for the death of the Duke of Guise, from which time afflictions neuer left her, for presently after followed that great insurrection of all the towns in France, the which wasted the Kings treasure, and reduced him to necessities that were vnknowne and incredible, she was forced to send all her Maids of Honor to their houses, she remained alone with foure Ladies, with the which shee retired in Chenonceau after the Kings departure from Tours to besiege Paris. There she had newes that a Monke had hurt the King of Saint Cloud, and refused to goe and see him; but shee was caried backe to Chenonceau whereas the Earle of Fiesque and then Dinet her Preacher told her that the King was dead, the newes of his wounding had already prepared her to this accident, for as soone as the King was hurt, hee wrote these few words vnto her with a trembling and dying hand. My friend you haue heard how I haue bene miserably hurt, I hope it will be nothing pray to God for me, farewell my friend.

Notwithstanding vpon the newes of his Death she fell downe in a sound, and then began to dye in this death. She caused foure of her maids of Honor to returne, who found a wonderfull alteration betwixt the visage of the Loure, and that of Chenonceau: for the necessities were so extreme, as most of them liued of their owne purses. Shee had no dowry, and the liberaltie shee received from the King was lesse then her necessitie: hee was much wronged by her during the raigne of the deceased King. She could not dissemble the hatred shee bare him when hee was at Tours, where she shewed him so cold a countenance, and gaue him so bad a reception, as foreseeing the mildnesse of his nature, he said that hee would thinke of it, and that she should repent it. But being King of France he would not reuenge the wrongs done vnto the King of Nauarre, no more then Lewis the twelfth would those of the Duke of Orleans; for he relieved her necessities as much as his affaires would permit him, and gaue her after the death of Queene Elizabeth the Dowry, which she enioyed, and had giuen her more but for the Duchesse of Beaufort, who loued her not, for that they had reported some words of contempt which she had vttered on her. Shee bore a singular affection to the Princes of her House. And although that friendship grounded vpon vertue, are better then those which grow from nature, as being more voluntary, yet shee did not esteeme any friendship, but that of her owne blood: which made them say that shee had intelligence with the Princes of her house against the King: but she shewed that her actions were free from it, refusing to see any of them after the death of the King her Husband, for the which shee was so afflicted, as the violence of her heartes griefe did ruine the vigour of her body, by a continual desoluxion vpon her lights, and coldnesse of her braine. Shee could neuer vie the soueraigne remedy of the most inueterate vices of the minde, forgetfulness: shee alwayes represented vnto herselfe, how she could possibly live, seeing the spirit of her life was dead; for even then she began to die, all the rest of her life was but torment and languishing. Shee went to the King to Mantes, where after shee had implored iustice; always assisting at the Throne of God, shee cast her selfe at the Kings feet to haue a iust and lawfull reuenge for the death of the King her Lord. Du Buissin of the chiefe of her Councell made a learned and eloquent speech touching the iust affliction of this Princeesse. La Guelfe the Kings Proctor made another, able to moue the hearts of the most barbarous Scythians. After the end of the Kings Masse, when as this Princeesse heard the Palme which the deceased King did vially cause to be sung, her grieffe renewed with such violence as they held her for dead. The King ran to helpe her, and kneeled downe to lift her vp: All the time of her widowhood which was spent at Chenonceau, & at Molins, was rather the life of a priuate Lady, then of a Queene; or of a religious woman, then of a widow. The best part of the day was employed in prayer, and that which remained after the houres of eating, and of Businesse, were spent for some workes for the decoration of altars, there being few churches in France, where she hath not sent of her worke. And although she were often visited by Princes, Princeesses and great Noblemen, yet she neuer neglected one minute of her deuotion. To conclude, she was a sweet vessell of piety, and as a violl full of excellent Balme, or some Odoriferous liquor, whilst it is whole it giues no sent but to them that are neare it, but being broken, it delights them that are farre off. So this vessell of most Odoriferous vertue, being broken by death, hath powred forth her sweet sentes ouer all the Earth.

Princeesse of Conde.

Princeesse of Conde dies.
The Duchesse
of Elguillon
dies.

The same yeare also, Madam Francis of Orlance, Princeesse of Conde, Mother to the Count of Soissons, died in her house of Grenelles at Paris, the Funerall Pompee was celebrated in the Abbey of Saint Germain de pres. About the end of this yeare the Princeesse of Cony dyed of a great and languishing sicknesse, as she went to her house at Bonnefable in Perche, to change the aire by the aduice of her Physicians, but she changed her life, leaving one onely Daughter, the which the Count of Soissons married.

Afterwards the Duchesse of Elguillon dyed, being daughter to the Duke of Neuers deceased, who left great cause of mourning to the Duke of Elguillon, eldest Sonne to the Duke of Maine, and the rather, for that she dyed in child-bed, and the child also with her. The King in forty dayes had conquered all Sauiy, within forty daies after he married, treated of a Peace, made the Queene in case to be a Mother, went in post from Lyons, and came to Paris, who bare his long absence impatiently. His returne gaue the world to vnderstand how quiet and constant the affaires of France were, that a King which went a hundred Leagues with twelue onely in his traine, was wel assured of his subiects, and feared not his neighbours.

The Queene followed by small iourneys, and came to Fountainbleau, where she staid not long, but came to Paris about Saint Germaines fayre, her first lodging was at Gardies house her first Gentleman of Honour, being in the suburbs of Saint Germain. The next was at Zamets, superintendant of her house, and then she came to the Louure. The Parsons prepared themselves and besought the King to giue them leave to make her a stately entry: but his Maiestie would haue the charges of this entry referred for a more durable worke. All the Princes of the blood, with the chiefe Ladies of the Court and City presented themselves to kisse her hands, and to doe their duties vnto her Maiestie. Shee made much of all them that the King favored, and refused to loue what he loued, framing her will in such sort vnto his, as she held his will for an vnwritten Law.

This yeare the Pope granted a table and Pardons to all the French that should goe visit the Church of Saint Croix in Orlance, doing the workes of Christian charitie. An infinite number of people went thither from all parts of France; the King and Queene went thither with the first, and gaue meanes to helpe to build this Church, which had bin ruined during the fury of the first ciuill warres. The King laid the first stone of this building. An act worthy of a Christian King, the true successor of the piety of Saint Lewis his Predecessor. But whilst he gaine Pardons, his enemies watch to surpris the best places of his Realme. He was disarmed vnder the assurance of the Peace. The armie of strangers was still whole together, and became fearfull to all Italy. All the Princes were troubled thereat, and although they be not well vnited together, yet when there is any question of danger, they haue good correspondency. At Rome they said it was for Geneva, and that

A the Marquis of Aia was gone to intreate the Pope to fauour him with his blessing, and to fortifie him with his meanes. Many other discourses were made touching this army, but time discovered that it was entertained for Marselles. There is nothing so holy, but money will violate, nor so strong but it will force. The Count of Fuenes vpon promise of great recompence, had practised an enterprize very ealie to execute, if the bargain had held. It was adding during the treaty of Peace with the Duke of Sauiy, who sent Don Sanchis de Salina to Milan to the Count of Fuenes, with two of them which made this match, whereof the one gaue aduice to the President Du Fair. Hee which had promised to deliuer the Tower of the Port for an entry vnto the enemy, discovered himself to the D.

B of Guise: La Goye (a Gentleman of Prouence) was sent vnto the King, to beseech him to giue him leaue to encounter them with this like practice. The King who desires not to gain by trechery, said that hee was content to keepe his owne; and to let the world know who did first trouble the peace. At that time another enterprize was discovered vpon the towne of Metz. The King sent the President Savin thither, the accused were brought to the prison of the Palace of Paris. The proofes being weak, some were enlarged; vpon condition they should appeare when they were called for, his Maiesty commanding they should inform more amply against the rest, banishing two from the towne of Metz, Thoul and Verdun. This great army finding no employment in France, made worke for the hangman in Italy, by the discovery of many conspiracies.

C Rocheport being Ambassador in Spaine, certaine French Gentlemen (among the which his Nephew was) had a quarrell with some Spaniards, who did iniure them, and cast their clothes into the water, they being a swimming. The Spaniards had the worst, and some were hurt and slaine. Their kinsmen demanded iustice of the King, (who commanded his officers to doe it) but the Ambassadors lodging was forced, and the Gentlemen drawn forth to prison, notwithstanding any thing that he could say or doe to maintaine the liber-ty of his place; the which is inuolable even among enemies. The King was so offended with this iniury, as he commanded his Ambassador to returne, giuing the King of Spaine to vnderstand, that he assured him selfe, that he would do him reason, when hee had well considered what cause he had to complaine. Whereupon all traffike was forbidden be-D twixt these two Realmes. The Pope fearing that this violence done vnto the Ambassador of France, could not passe without some feeling, and that this Coale might kinde the fire of Warre betwixt these two great Kings: hee sent into Spaine to haue the prisoners, the which were sent vnto him: and the Pope deliuered them presently vnto the Lord of Be-tunes the Kings Ambassador at Rome; and so the Peace was continued.

The Ambassadors of Venice were better intreated in France. That great and wise Senate holding themselves bound by the lawes of friendship, to deplore the misfortune, and to reioyce at the prosperity of their friends, hauing been long troubled for the afflictions of France, they send a great and solemne Ambassage to congratulate the fruit of the Kings victories, and the beginning of his marriage. The Ambassadors were chosen out of E the Procurators of Saint Marke, and of the chiefe men of the State. They came to Paris, the King sent the Marquis of Rohony to conduct them to Fontainebleau; and to intreat them, so be contented with their reception in that place whereas the Queene was, seeing their Ambassage was common to both, and that for the indisposition of her greatnesse, it could not be at Paris, which occasion did renew the ioyes of the Court, the which was in so great tranquillity, as it seemed neuer to haue bene in trouble.

The Great Turke sent Bartholomew de Cheneu his Physitian vnto the King, to acquaint him with the Estate of his affaires, and to intreat him to mediate a truce in Hungary. When as this man spake of the Turkes power, hee did so extoll it, as if hee had beene able to vanquish all the Princes of Christendome; not excepting Pope nor Emperor, so as the F King of France did not meddle in it. Hee presented a Dagger and a Cymiter vnto the Kings Maiesty, whereof the Hilt and Scabbars were of Gold, garnished with Rubies, and a Plume of Herons feathers. The King related vnto him what hee had done in Sauiy, and complained that (to the prejudice of ancient Capitulations) not onely the English were distressed from the Banner of France; (vnder whose guard and protection they were bound to traffike) but also the Flemings, Hollanders, and Zelanders were apprehended vnder the Banner of England. To this complaint he added another, against the crueltie and violence of the Durs of Algier, and the coast of Barbary, saying that if the

the Iustice of the great Turke did not cause these Piracies to cease, hee should have no reason to beleue his friendship.

The Order of Recolets.

At this time there sprung vp religious men in France, who said they were true-observers of the Order of Saint Francis, and that the Franciscans and Capuchins did not maintain it so exactly, but they needed reformation. The king gave them a Couent at Beaufort, and by the example of this piety, many other places desired it. They would lodge at Balmetre neere vnto Angers, the which had bene founded by rene King of Sicilia. The Franciscans (who could not endure to be dispossessed by these Recolets) besieged them, offered to force their gates, & to scale their walls. The besieged defended not themselves with words and exorcismes, but with stones, and in such choller, as if the people had not come the scandall had not ended without murder. The Princiuall seeing that the Recolets would not receiue him, and that the Bishop would not suffer him to vse force, appealed, as from an abuse of their establishment. The Recolets shew vnto the Court, that they are the true Children and Disciples of Saint Francis, liuing according to the rule and discipline that was obserued in Italy, from whence the good precepts of the reformation of Regulars were drawne, that if those of the Family of Obseruance, and of Capuchins, were tolerated and honoured in France, they should be of no worse condition. This cause was the argument of a famous pleading in the Court Parliament, in the which Seruin the Kings Aduocate said, That a Reformation was necessary not onely in the Order of the Franciscans or Gray-Friars, but also in all others; but they must be careful, not to transforme by nouelties, in stead of reforming by censures, alledging many reasons against the bringing in of new Orders.

A great pleading in the Court of Parliament.

Whereupon the Court pronounced that there was abuse, and restored the ancient Religious to the Couent of Balmetre, forbidding all religious men of the Order of Gray-Friars to goe out of the Realme, without licence from the King or their Superiours. Tealous and distrustfull heads gave it out, that the Peace was in weak change, when as after the injury done vnto Rochepot in Spaine, and the forbidding of traffique, they see the King gone suddenly to Calais, and that from thence he had sent the Duke Biron into England.

The King goes to Calais.

The Count Serra sent vnto the King.

The Arch-Dukes tooke a sudden alarme, and to that end sent the Count Serra vnto the King, to deliuer vnto him the state of the siege of Ostend, and to beseech him not to suffer that their enemies should think that these approaches should be to their advantage, and that their rebellion should be fauoured by an example so hatefull to all Princes. The King sent the Duke of l'Elguillon to visit them, and to assure them that his intention was not to trouble the peace, but onely to visit his Frontier, and to provide for the fortifications. They did not generally beleue this, for although hee made his voyage in poste, many thought that he would embrace this occasion of the siege of Ostend, and all the Court followed him as to some great exploit. And for that he would not haue the world in suspence of his designs, he gaue the Governours of his Prouinces to vnderstand, that the cause of his going to Calais, was but to visit his frontier, and to provide for that which should be necessary to assure it, not from present dangers, but from those that might happen. He declared also that he had no other designe then the preservation of peace with all his neighbours, to enjoy that which God had giuen him. But there were other practices which could not be dispersed but by the Kings presence.

The Duke of Biron sent into England.

The Queene of England sent Sir Thomas Edmunds to visit the King, and the King returned her the like by the Duke of Biron. He went accompanied with an hundred and fiftie Gentlemen. The Count of Auvergne was there as ynkowne, but his quality discovered him. There was nothing omitted that might be for the reception of an Ambassador, and somewhat more. Being at London, many Noblemen receiued him, and accompanied him to Basing, where he rested a day or two before he did see the Queene, who made him know that she was honoured by her Subiects above other Princes. A Prince should lose no occasion to let strangers see the greatness of his Estate, to giue them cause to admire him, and to maintain his Subiects in the duty which they owe him. The Queene of England, who hath made good proofe that women may reigne, as well and as happily as men, obserues this better then any Prince of her age, making all them that followed the Duke of Biron in this Legation, to giue the like iudgement.

His entry to the Queene.

The Queene being set in State, all the French Gentlemen entered first, but when as the discoursed the Duke of Biron, whom she knew by the description they had made of his face face

A Face and stature, the spake with a loud voyce: "Ha, Monseigneur de Biron, how haue you taken the pain to come and see a poore old Woman, who hath nothing more liuing in her, then the affection shee beares vnto the King, and her perfect iudgement to know his good seruants, and to esteeme Knights of your fort. As she spake this, the Duke made a low reuerence, and the Queene rose from her Chaire to embrace him, to whom hee deliuered the charge hee had from the King, and withall his Maiesties Letters, the which shee read. Shee thanked the King for his remembrance of her: but she said shee could not conceale, that as there was nothing vnto a heart (like vnto hers) full of affection and desire more pleasing, then to see and heare what it desired, so could shee not but fee an extreame torment, to see herselfe deprived of the sight and presence of the object which shee had most desired, whose actions shee esteemed not onely immortal but diuine, being ignorant whether shee should more enuy his Fortune, then loue his Vertue, and admire his Merits: so much the one and the other, did exceed the greatest maruailes in the world. That she could not say that a courage which feared nothing but the falling of the Pillers of Heauen, should feare the Sea, or not trust vnto it for a passage of seuen or eight houres, blaming them rather which had not instructed him as well to contemne the Waves of the Sea, as the designs of his enemies vpon the Land. From these speeches, shee fell into some bitterness of Complaints, which shee deliuered with a little vehemency, saying: that after shee had succoured this Prince with her Forces, Purse, and meanes, and if she could haue done it with her owne blood, and had as much desired the happy successe of his affaires as himselfe, and the ruine of his enemies more then himselfe, they made no account of her, forcing her to thinke that the loue they bare her was but for the hope of commodities they might draw from her, the which being dried vp, all affection was cold. That they had sought her in the torment to forget her when the time was calme. That they preferred new friendship before the old, wildome before Iustice, and profit before reason. And for a signe of inhumanity, they refused her her owne. Then taking the Duke of Biron shee led him to a window where he continued her discourse in softer and milder termes. There shee gaue her hand vnto all the Gentlemen which the Duke of Biron presented vnto her: among them all shee noted Creguy to bee sonne in Law to L'Esguignieres. Shee commanded him to approach neere vnto her when all had done, to whom shee declared what esteeme the world made of him for his sake, whom shee held to bee without Peere, saying: That if there were two L'Esguignieres in France, shee would demand one of them of the King her brother. Creguy answered, That he would thinke himselfe happy, if by the Kings commandement any occasion were offered worthy of her seruice, to witness vnto her Majesty that hee did partake in the desire which his Father in law had alwaies had, to giue her some proofe of his affection, and that hee would alwayes cary himselfe so in effect, seeing hee could not bee present but in desire, the Kings seruice binding him to remaine elsewhere. To whom the Queene said: That shee did accept of his good will, and wished him to remember. The Duke of Biron receiued all the honours of the Queene and State, that might be giuen to so great a personage, the particularities whereof I omit for breuities sake.

The
speech.

Having finished his Legation, he tooke his leaue of the Queene, to whom shee gaue a great Present, and so dismissed him with very gracious speeches. He found not the King at Calais at his returne, who was gone backe to Fontainebleau against the Queenes lying downe, where hee had left her, and the Duchesse of Bar with her. All France attended the Fruit of this birth, as the full of their Felicitates, assuring themselves, that by the birth of a Dauphin, they should find all that which forepassed ages, and that which was to come could desire. Ten daies before his birth, the Earth quaked in many parts of Europe. The great Duchesse who desired greatly to be neere the Queene, sent her a rich Cradle, exquisitely made at Florence, hoping it should serue for a Dauphin (for she would not haue giuen it with so good a will for an other Sexe) intreating the Gouernor of Lions, by her Letters, to fauor the passage, and his diligence that had charge of it, to the end that shee might arise at time, and not to suffer any to open the Coffers.

The Duke of Biron returned out of England in the beginning of October.

A Cradle sent to the Queene.

The Princes of the blood may be in the Queens chamber when the is in trauell to maintain the Saluque Law.

The Queene fell in labour on Thursday at night, the seuen and twentieth of September. The King and the Princes of his blood, were in the Chamber, according to the ancient law of the Ceremonies of the Crown, to the end that the interested in the succession, may not pretend there was any supposition. The Queene was held for a while in great danger, for she had given herselfe such liberty in eating of fruits, as she felt it, and repented it in her travell, but in the end, about eleven of the clocke, shee was delivered of a sonne. The King blessing him put a Sword in his hand, to vie it to the glory of God, and the defence of his Crowne and people. All the Princes and Noblemen flocked to reioyce at this new Grace. The ioy was so great, and the King was so prest with the Congratulations of them that came about him, as going to the Church to give God thanks for this favour, he lost his hat in the throng. The Secretaries of State, made dispatches presently into all Provinces, to make them partakers of this great ioy. The first was brought to Paris by Verennes about foure of the clocke, to the Chancellor, the Court of Parliament, and the Towne-house, presently thanks were given to God, and bone-fires made throughout all the Realme, the people holding this latter grace, as an assurance of the fruit of all the precedent. Sourray was chosen for his Governour. The Pope sent presently vnto the King and Queene to congratulate with them of this birth, and to carry vnto the young Prince swaddling bands, bearing clothes, and other things, blessed by his Holinesse. All Princes allied to this Crowne, sent to congratulate this happy occasion.

The Queene of Spaine delivered of a daughter.

The Queene of Spaine was brought in bed about the same time of a Daughter. The Spaniards were no lesse content then the French, saying that they had rather the Queen should begin with a daughter then with a sonne, lest they should fall into the accidents, which Iealousie and Ambition doe breed, when the Children appeare so soone to succede them to bee gone; when as their ages are confounded, that the one is in the flower, the other in the season of fruits, the which is most capable to command and rule, and that the desire to succeed may not give occasion to trouble the order of Nature, and maketh the one repent that they are Fathers, and declares the other unworthy to bee Children.

The Duke of Biron returns out of England to Court.

The Duke of Biron came to Fontainebleau, whereas the King, Queene and Dauphin remained, he gaue an account of his Ambassage into England, and delivered the Queenes Letter vnto his Maiesty. He continued in Court vntill the end of the year, and presented vnto him the three Estates of Bresse, Beaugy, Veromey and Gex, whom the King received as graciously, as if they had beene Frenchmen by birth and affection; he confirmed their Priviledges, and made them feeble the fruits of this change. Hee erected a Prebendiall Court at Bourg, depending vpon the Parliament at Dijon, notwithstanding any opposition made by that of Grenoble, pretending that the Countries exchanged should hold the place of the Marquitate of Saluces, and be incorporate vnto Dauphine. Here-leesed the Countries exchanged, in their impositions and Taxes, and with such moderation, as the most miserable, promised vnto themselves happinesse, vnder his sweet subiection. Among other speeches, which the King vied vnto the Deputies, these were noted, it is reasonable (said he) seeing you speake French naturally, that you should bee subject to a King of France: I am well pleased that the Spanish tongue should remaine to the Spaniard, and the Germane tongue to the Germane, but all the French must belong to me. The Dauphin made his first entry into Paris the 30 day after his birth: the Port was beautified with Armes. The pompe was of a Cradle in a litter, whereas the Lady of Monglas sat with the Nurce. The Prouost of Merchants and Sheriffes went out of the City to meet him. The Gouverneisse made answer to the Oration. His first lodging was at Zamets house. Two dayes after he was caried backe to S. Germane in Lay, and to the end the people might see him passing through the City, the nurce held him at her brest. The King had determined to conduct the Queene to Blois, but the desire he had to instruct the Duchesse of Bar his sister in his Religion, stayed them all at Paris, whither he had sent for the most learned Prelates and Divines, to satisfie her in the presence of such Ministers as she had brought with her. But they conuired her not to yeeld vnto this change, nor to dismember her selfe from the Body and society of the Children of God, to bow her knees vnto Idolatry. She continued so constant in her beleefe, as shee made a protestation, that if her Religion were preiudiciall to the Estates of the Duke of Lorraine, shee was ready to returne into Bearn, beseeching the King to suffer her to end her life as shee had begun it. So as the conferences vpon this subiect remained vnprofitable, and were of no more effect, then that which was made at Ratisbonne at the same time, and for the same cause. The King hauing fetled as happy a peace in France as could bee desired, hee sought to

The Dauphine first entry into Paris the 30 of October 1601.

A Conference to instruct the Kings sister.

A redresse the disorders which could not be cured during the violence of the warre, hee did two things to reforme the disorders of the Treasure, in the one he cut off a great number of Officers belonging to the Treasure, and in the other hee caused a great and seuer search to bee made of their abuses. The more Officers the King hath for the managing of his Treasure, the lesse profit comes vnto his Coffers, for that a great part is spent in their entertainments. So as it was resolved at the Estates held at Rouen, to suppress the Offices of the treasurers of the generalities of France by death without hoping of reuiving.

Many of the Treasury did charged.

As for the abuses of Treasurers, their couetousnesse was so great, and their abuses so countenanced, as no man liued happily but they. Such as rob the Poore dye in Prisons are hangd, but they that steale from the King and the publicke, are at their ease. When as Rhusny was called to be Superintendent of the Treasure, they were out of hope to doe their businesse as they had wont. By his aduice the King commanded a strict search to bee made of their Abuses in the Treasure, and to that end, hee erected a Chamber (or Court) which hee would haue called Royale, consisting of Iudges chosen out of his Soueraine Courts: of one of the Presidents of the Court of Parliament: two Masters of Requests of his Household: two Councillors of his Court of Parliament: of one President of his Chamber of Accompts: three Councillors of the Court of Aydes: of one of the Advocates generall of his Court of Parliament: and of one of the Substitutes.

A Chamber Royall erected.

And for that they had giuen the King to vnderstand, that nothing did so much impoverish his Realme, as the transport of gold and siluer, the which was vsuall by the sufferance of Officers, hee therefore reuiued the ancient Lawes for the transporting of gold and siluer, or bullion out of the Realme, adding paine of death thereunto, and losse of all their goods that should doe to the contrary, the third whereof should goe vnto the Informer. He commanded all Governours to haue a care of the obseruation of these prohibitions, and not to grant any passports to the contrary, vpon paine to be declared partakers of these transports, and for their Secretaries that should counterfeigne them, confiscation of their goods and perpetual banishment. But the forbidding of the transportation of gold and siluer is not the onely means to make a Realme abound therewith, if the vife of it within be not well ordered. And therefore the King did forbid the superfluous vife of gold and siluer in lace or otherwise vpon garments. This Edict did greatly trouble the Ladies in Court, yet it was obserued, for that it was generall and excepted none: the King himselfe did frowne of a Prince of his House, who had not yet thought of this reformation. The King continuing the same care to settle all things in good estate, seeing that foraigne Coynes went at a higher rate in his Realme then where they were coyned, hee commanded that the vife of foraigne Coynes should bee forbidden, after a certaine time giuen to the people to put it away, restoring gold to his iust value. This commandement was iust, but it was a great ruine to the people, for the Strangers seeing that their Coynes were not current among vs, discontinued the traffike, and liued without that, without the which we thought they could not liue. Those which were wont to come to Lions went to Geneva, where the Duckats were raised as much as wee had abated them. The King by all these Edicts had nothing releued the necessities of the Nobility, if he had not provided for vsuries, which haue ruined many good and ancient houses, filled Townes with vnprofitable persons, and the Country with miseries and inhumanities. Hee found that Rents constituted after ten or eight in the hundred did ruine many good families, hindred the traffike and commerce of Merchandise, and made Tillage and Handicrafts to bee neglected, many desiring through the easinesse of a deceitfull gain, to liue idly in good Townes of their Rents, rather then to giue themselves with any paine to liberal Arts, or to Till and Husband their inheritances. For this reason (meaning to inuite his Subjects to enrich themselves with more iust gain, to content themselves with more moderate profit, and to giue the Nobility means to pay their debts,) hee did forbid all vsury or constitution of Rents at a higher rate then six pounds five shillings for the Hundred. The Edict was verified in the Court of Parliament, which considered that it was alwaies preiudiciall to the Common-weale to giue money to vsury: for it is a serpent whose biting is not apparant, and yet it is so sensible as it peirceth the very heart of the best Families.

Ambassadors
chosen to send to foreigne Princes.

The affaires of the Realme being in so great tranquillity, as the King had no care but to enjoy the fruits of a Peace; He made choice of Ambassadors to send to foraigne Princes that were in League with him. Barranx was named for Spaine, Betunes for Rome, the Count Beaumont was chosen for England, and the President Fresnes Canay to goe to Venice, who had a particular aduice giuen him, the which for that it is of consequence and serues for instruction to others in the like charges, deserves to be noted. It hath alwaies bene obserued at Venice, betwixt the Popes Nuncio and Princes Ambassadors that remaine there, that the last come is alwaies first visited by the others before hee returns them the like. It happened that Huraud de Mette the Kings Ambassador at Venice, hauing bene twice or thrice sent backe thither by his Maiesty, and no other Ambassador: at his last returne the Popes Nuncio refused to visit him, saying, that hee was not a new Ambassador, and that it was in him to visit him first, the which hee did, as well for that they could not take his returne for the beginning of a new Ambassage: from this complement of courtesie, the Popes Nuncio would draw a consequence of dutie, and would challenge a right to be visited first. So as the Ambassador of Spaine hauing made difficultie to visit the Nuncio, attending it first from him, according to the ancient order, they stood so long vpon this Ceremony, as they passed all the time of their Legation without visiting one another. And therefore the King foreseeing that it de Fresnes Canay were not informed of these particularities, he might haue bene surprisid in this Complement of visiting. In this discourse of Ambassadors let vs see the issue of two important Ambassages, the one for the King at Thurin, the other for the Duke of Sauoy at Paris, and both for the twearing of the peace. James Mitres of Arjolans Lord of Saint Chaumont, Knight of both the Kings Orders, was commanded to goe to Thurin to receiue the Dukes oath. Hee went well accompanied with Gentlemen, and neuer Ambassador was better receiued then hee was in Sauoy and Piedmont. D'Albigny Gouverneur of Sauoy feasted him at Chambery like a Prince, the Duke commanding him to entertaine him in all places as himselfe.

The Duke of Sauoy, exceeds all the Princes of his quality in such Ceremonies: There is not any Court where they are performed with more order and pompe. The Ambassador coming within a League of Thurin, hee was intreated by the Duke to stay his entry one day, for that the Duke of Nemours did feare him at a house of his, and that the chiefe men of his Court being also invited, desired to be there, and not to lose the opportunity to meet with him, nor the Ladies to see his reception. He sent for him, and for all the chiefe men of his traine horse richly furnished, with footmen in very good order to enter into Thurin. Two leagues from the Towne he was met by his Companies of men at armes. The commanders hauing presented themselues vnto him, the Companies opened and made them way to passe through the midst of them, hauing passed a little farther, he was encountered by the Marquis of Lan, in the head of the chiefe Noblemen of the Dukes Court, to accompany him into the Towne, at the ports whereof there were twenty Staffieres or footmen, euery one with two torches of white wax in his hand to light him to his lodging, whither presently the Duke sent the Earle of Crenie the first Gentleman of his Chamber, to let him vnderstand how much he was pleased with his coming, and desired that he should not see him vntill the next day: At the houre appointed word was brought that the Duke desired to see him, where at the first encounter hee vsed him with more then ordinary words, and great declarations of ioy which the Duke receiued of his arrival, and of the contentment he promised vnto himselfe by the effects of his legation. The Ambassador did the Kings commendations vnto him, and told him that hee had commandement from his Maiesty to represent many things vnto him touching the treatie of peace. The Duke answered, that they must not talke of affaires, intreating him to forbear eight dayes. The Kings Ambassador was well aduertised, that he would gaine time on the one side, as hee lost on the other, attending a Post from Spaine touching the oath which he was to make: his good shewes could not hide his harts griefe for the losse of part of his Estates, the possession whereof had neuer bene so pleasing, as the priuation was troublesome.

Cheurieres visited the Princes & the Infants according to the Kings commandement. The Ambassador of Spaine went in Pilgrimage to our Lady of Mont de Vic, because he would not be at the Assembly. The Ceremonie was like vnto the precedent at Chambery

A bery for the treaty of Veruins, after which the Ambassador dined with the Duke, where there was nothing forgotten that might giue him contentment. The Duke told the Ambassador that he would sup with him, but alwaies at his owne charge, whether hee caused many Ladies to be invited: during the heat of these illities the Duke tooke no taste in affaires, he so much desired to content the Kings Ambassador and those that were with him. Yet he did not leaue to satisfie him in that which he had propounded, touching the rights and pretensions of the Lady of Lucy, and for many demands which they of Geneua had made vnto the King, vpon the execution of the treaty. For the first, they answer that hee will giue the King contentment; and for the second, that his Maiesty would neuer iudge reasonable that he should bind himselfe in his owne Estates, to conditions, which they of Geneua would not allow in theirs. The Ceremonies being performed, the Ambassador tooke his leaue, and his departure was not lesse honored then his coming, where hee did not forget to giue them great Presents. Some said that after to great an expence in his voyage to Paris, and that hauing wasted his Treasurie, and ruined his Countries with warre, those which did accompany Cheurieres should not haue like Presents to them that were with Boubeau when as the Duke sware the peace of Veruins. But hee did the contrary, shewing, that the last of the vertues which should die in him should bee liberality, and that he knew, to whom, how much, when, and how he should giue, and that in such occasions sparing was hurtfull. He gaue vnto the Ambassador a Iewell of 4000 Crownes, and to all the Gentlemen horses. The Marquis of Lullins came into France to take the Kings oath. The Ceremonie was done at the Celestins in Paris, according to the accustomed manner and forme vsed in the like treaties, and in the presence of many Princes of the blood, Noblemen, & Councillors of State, the act being signed by the King, by Villeroy and Forget Secretary of State. The Siegneurie of Geneua intreated the King to giue them the Bawlicke of Gex, as a necessary thing for the safetie of their Estate. The King answered, that being concluded by the treaty, which he had made with the duke of Sauoy, that the lands exchanged for the Marquisate of Saluces, should remaine vntied and incorporated to the Crowne, he requested them to rest satisfied with this condition, and not to hope for any alteration, for this consideration, these Countries being of one condition with the other Prouinces of the Realm, they would not admit any diuersity in their lawes, he therefore established the exercise of the Romish religion, and sent the Baron of Lux to put the Bishop of Geneua in possession of the Churches of his Diocesse, causing Masse to be said in the Churches of Gex. They of Geneua made fasts, and publike prayer to the end (sayd they,) to keepe the Idols from their wals.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Court being quiet, and dreaming of nothing but of feasts and dancing, and the whole State in such tranquillity, as nothing might seeme to interrupt it. The King had but one business without the Realme, whereon depended the contentment which hee might giue to the Suisses, in confirming the promise which his Ambassador had made of the renewing of their alliances. There had bene many Assemblies held to that end at Bade and Soleure, but all vncertaine, as they be commonly. Their resolutions were inconstant and variable, with new demands, which did cut off nothing of the necessity of the first. These diuers agitations sprang from Milan and Sauoy, who could not endure to see the Flower-de Luce flourish in the rocks and Alpes, and were grieued to haue spent so many double Ducats in vaine, to choke the seeds of their affection to this Crowne. De Vic disposed things in as good sort as the King could desire, Burliart was sent to make the worke perfect. He gaue them to vnderstand the Kings last resolutions, with so great wisdom and dexterity, as they were allowed by the greatest part of the Cantons. After that, the partisans of Spaine and Sauoy found that all their crosses brought more aduancement then difficulty to the Kings affaires, and that the most obstinate became temperate, and were forced to yeeld, and that they could not hinder, but that the light of vertue and the Kings fortune would shine through the Chasme of their practices. Sillery finding that their wills were well prepared, and disposed to entertaine and accept of the Kings intentions, he made the proposition of renewing of the League at Soleure in September, after this manner:

The alliance
with the Suisses
renewed.

in Suisse.

A Diet at So-
leure the 11.
of September.

Oration of Monsieur Sillery
to the Suisses.

"My most honored Lords, I haue bene sent into this Country by the most Christian King my master, your best friend, ally, and confederate, with charge to deliuer vnto you his louing recommendations, with the letters which his Maiesty hath written vnto you, by the which you may conceiue his intention vpon the cause of my voyage, according to the which his Maieſty hath alſo expreſly commanded mee, to aſſure you of his loue and affection, and of the eſteeme which hee had made of your Nation, for that hee had made better triall of their courage and valor then all other Princes, hauing bene ſo often with them in battell and other exploits of warre; and to tell you that he deſires to continue with you the ancient frienſhip, alliance, and good correſpondency which hath lo long and happily continued, betwixt the Kings of France, his Maieſties predeceſſors of happy memory, to the common good of the one and the other. After that hee had receiued your friendly anſwer dated the 15 of May, in the yeare 1600, touching that which had bene propounded vnto you on his behalfe by the deſealed Monſieur de Morifontaine his Ambaſſador concerning the renewing of the League, his Maieſtie did preſently appoint his Deputies to come and treat with you, the which had bene duly effected, if the vnepected warre of Sauoy, contrary to his Maieſties intention, had not ſtayed the voyage of his ſaid Deputies, the which ſince hath not bene deferred, but to ſend by the ſame means greater prouiſion of money which cannot be ſo ſoon gathered together as was requiſite, for the poerty of the people, who are yet afflicted for the wars and calamities paſt, which haue ſo long continued, and is the onely cauſe which hath ſtayed your payments, to the great griefe of his Maieſty, and of all good Frenchmen, who were ſorry to ſee you vnaccommodated and could not helpe it. This excuſe my Noble Lords, is not only true, but worthy of compaſſion, if it pleaſe you to remember the true and firſt cauſe of this ſtay, and the great miſeries and wrongs which all France, and ſo many poore Innocents haue ſince ſuffered.

And although that by the happy peace which it hath pleaſed God to giue vs, there be occaſion to hope for all proſperity, and that the miſchiefe decreaſing, and commodities increaſing, as we ſee dayly, by the grace of God there will be means, to giue his Maieſties good friends and ſeruants ſatisfaction. Yet this cannot be ſo ſuddenly, but it is neceſſary to haue ſometime to reape the fruits, notwithstanding it is moſt aſſured, and the harueſt and fruition is neere, which will recompence the long expectation.

I thinke my Lords it were ſuperfluous to ſhew how profitable this alliance hath bene heretofore to the one & to the other, for that it is notorious to all the world, being made maniſeſt by effects, and hath no need of prooffe. We acknowledge freely and willingly, that the aſſiſtance and ſuccors of your ſouldiers, which at ſundry times, and in many occaſions, haue bene employed both within and without the Realme, haue bene very profitable for the ſuccouring of the Kings and Crowne of France. I aſſure my ſelfe alſo, that for your parts you will acknowledge how much the Alliance and frienſhip of France hath bene fauourable and helpfull vnto you, ſince the which you haue not bene only reſpected of Princes and Potentates, which are neereſt vnto you, but haue alſo been fought vnto by them that are fartheſt off: you haue not bene moleſted, nor ſet vpon by any, and by this means you haue increaſed in wealth, power and authority, and your Eſtate is become one of the moſt happy and moſt flouriſhing that euer was. So your wife Predeceſſors haue thought that no other alliance could be more commodious vnto you for many reaſons beſt knowne vnto your ſelues: we demand nothing one of another, there are certaine conuentiones betwixt your Nation and Ours, whereby they agree better then any other. We deſire your battaillions to fortiſie our Armies, which may bee alſo ſaid that you did neuer truſt, nor agree ſo well with any, as with our French foot and horſe.

My Lords they which ſaine imaginary rights and pretenſions to any part of your Eſtates, deſire not your good nor vnion, and if according to your wiſdomes it pleaſe you to examine ſtriſtly the Counſels and proceedings of ſome, who vnder a diſguiſed heu of ſome preſent profit, ſeeme to affect your frienſhip, you ſhall finde that their chiefe end is to ſeparate you one from another, to weaken and diuide the force and bodies of your Leagues, and by that means to open & make the way eaſie to execute their old deſignes, which they haue long proteſted, being needfull to vſe great foreſight to preuent them, and not to ſuffer your ſelues to be abuſed with their policies.

You muſt thinke my Noble Lords, that you haue none ſo dangerous enemies, as thoſe which ſecke to ſow diuiſion among you in your Counſels, for it is directly contrary to your greatneſſe and quiet. The Kings of France, pretend not any thing of you but your frienſhip, they deſire your vnion and proſperity, for the loue and affection which they beare

A beare you, but to the end that no man may be in doubt, I ſay, they ought to deſire for their owne intereſt, that you ſhould bee alwaies vnitd and fortified, to the end that your aſſiſtance may be vnto them a ſpeedy, powerfull, and aſſured ſuccour, they which may not fail them when ſoeuer they ſhall haue need. The Kings of France and their miniſters haue alwaies employed themſelues to perſwade and maintaine a peace and vnion betwixt you. And it may bee truly ſaid, That the alliance of France is the moſt proper and firme bond of your coniunction and frienſhip, to maintaine you powerfull and happy together by this common intelligence, the which cannot be when you ſhall be diuided. King Lewis the eleuenth employed himſelfe to compound the controuerſies which were betwixt your famous Predeceſſors, and the Houſe of Auſtria; and by his authority and mediation, the Treaty was concluded of the hereditary League, with the Archduke Sigifmond in the yeare 1474, the which hath bene ſince confirmed by his ſucceſſors, and continued vnto this day.

In the yeare of our Lord 1531, the ſix Cantons hauing ſome diſſention with them of Zurich, were forced to contract with Ferdinand the King of Romans, and ſince Emperor, brother to the Emperor Charles the fifth. The fruits of this new frienſhip were the cauſe of a ciuill war betwixt the ſaid Cantons. This war was pacified by the care and diligence of King Francis, who made both the one and the other capable of that which was neceſſary for their owne good and preſeruation. A peace was concluded, but it was expreſly agreed, that the letters and ſeales of this new alliance ſhould be reſtored, as if it had bene held the chiefe cauſe of this trouble. In the yeare of our Lord 1582, the deſealed King Henry ſhewed no leſſe affection and care to prevent the beginning of a war, which was apprehended betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and my Maſters of Berne, aſſiſted by ſome other Cantons; there are many yet liuing which can witneſſe the good endeauours of Monſieur de Mandelot, and Hauſfort, to ſmother this trouble in the breeding, as in all other occaſions the Kings of France and their miniſters haue giuen prooffe of their affections to the good and quiet of the Cantons.

My Lords, with the alliance of France you may aſſure your good and proſperity without any feare, and free your ſelues from many dangers and inconueniences which do indubitably follow the multiplicity of alliances. And if the alliance of France hath euer deſerued to be eſteemed, if it hath heretofore bene deſired; in my opinion it ſhall bee with more reaſon now, when as we are nearer neighbours, hauing means to ſuccour one another, without demanding paſſage from any Prince, the Realme of France being in full peace, reſtored to her beauty, and her limits extended by the force, clemency, wiſdome, and conduct of that great King, who hath juſtly merited the title of greatneſſe, for the glory and greatneſſe of his vertues, and of his high exploits, for in him may be ſeene the perfect Image of a good King, and a great Captaine, which is the greateſt commendation which the ancient Sages haue thought might be giuen vnto a mortall man. His Maieſty hath ſhewed his valour and force of armes during the war: hee hath alſo made his bounty and wiſdome ſhine in time of peace. All diuiſions are ceaſed in his Realme, and every man liues in peace vnder his authority, as well by his power, as through the loue and affection of his ſubiects, who reuerence and feare him as a great King, and loue and obſerue him as a good father. And doubtleſſe his Maieſty hath no other care but to make his Subiects moſt happy vnder his obedience, reſtoring the manuring of the Land, the traffike, Merchandize, order and policy in all the parts of his Eſtate; and it is to be hoped that his raigne will abound in all felicity for his Subiects, Friends, and good Neighbours.

This great King, my noble Lords, deſires your frienſhip and alliance, ſuch as you haue had with the Kings of France his Predeceſſors. It is not to hurt any one, but to doe good to all. It is not to trouble the publike peace, but rather to maintaine it, his Maieſty hauing giuen good prooffes of the ſincerity of his intentions, for the generall quiet of Chriſtendome, by his facility in the treaty of peace made at Veruins with the King of Spaine, and ſince confirmed at the City of Paris and Lions with the Duke of Sauoy, whereof I can giue teſtimony hauing had the honour to ſerue in all that hath bene negotiated in the ſaid Treaties of Veruins and Lions. His Maieſty offers you his loue and affection, which is to be eſteemed in a good and iuſt Prince, whoſe faith hath neuer failed to his friends, enemies, nor to his owne ſubiects. he promiſeth you all affection that can " be required, and hath giuen power to my Lord Ambassador and me, to aduise with you

 " of the best meanes that may be, to renew the alliance with you, and to make it so firme
 " and durable as it may neuer be changed nor altered.

" His Maiesty doth also assure himselfe of your wildomes and equity, that you would not " require any thing that were not reasonable and in his power, and that you would consider
 " and adde thereunto what shall be required of your part, to assure the effect of a good " alliance, that hereafter they might not fall into former inconueniences, by means where-
 " of his Maiesty finds himselfe charged with great and excessiue debts, the which had not " beene if alliances had beene kept: I speake it without offence to any but onely by the " necessity of duty, which binds mee to represent the truth of the fact for two reasons:
 " the one, that it may be provided for; the other, to the end that considering the greatnesse
 " and quality of the debts, you may know we deferue to be a little borne withall in the " payment thereof.

" I hope in his diuine bounty, that as it hath pleased him to manifest by so many mira-
 " cles, that he hath taken into his protection the affaires of this good King, this realme,
 " and this mighty Common-weale, that he will also be pleased to inspire your hearts with " his wisdom, to take a good and holy resolution, which may be first to his glory, for the " health of both the Estates, and of all good men, and finally for the encrease of the ho" nour, glory, and prosperity of your Estate, for the which the alliance of France shall be
 " vnto you as it alwaies hath beene, very honourable and profitable.

His discourse was very pleasing vnto the hearers, who thought that the alliance of France, with whom they neuer had any question, and whose friendship had not beene troubled with those feelings which the iniuries of war doe fix deeply in the minds of men, was more profitable and necessary then that of other Princes, which haue hereditary designes vpon that Estate, who would call lots againe, and come to a new diuision.

These had some-times sought to make their profit of the diuersity of Religion that is amongst the Cantons, in weakening the body by cutting off the members. France on the contrary side had alwaies exhorted them to liue in peace, and not vnder-mine the foundation of their Estate, the which consists of concord and vnion. So Princes should alwaies desire that their Allies might liue in Vnion and Peace. This proposition of renewing the League with the King, was very acceptable vnto them all, but it troubled the small Catholike Cantons, who had made new Leagues with their neighbours, and desired that they would propound some meanes vnto them, that in contenting the King they might with honour keepe their latter promises. The Ambassadors answered, that they must take those resolutions of themselves, whereby they might willingly contribute that which depended of them. It is no reason sayd the Ambassadors, that you should be directed and set into the right way by vs, seeing you left it without vs and against vs. The Cantons sayd, that the friendship which they had sworn to France, was grounded vpon conditions, the which saying, the duty of their alliance must also faile.

Friendship grounded vpon profit is neuer durable, that of the Suiffes cannot be otherwise vnited, they loue the Darigues more then Darius himselfe, and glory to see the greatest Princes of Europe to purchase their friendship. Some aduised the King to leaue the petty Cantons, and to take them as his enemies, seeing they had broken the League.
 But he thought he should wound the reputation and dignity of his Crown, if he should lose the friends which his Predecessors had gotten. And therefore his Ambassadors (although they seemed not to care for it) omitted nothing that might serue to reduce them into the right way, from the which the opinion of profit, more then the force of his friendship, had drawne them: thinking it reasonable to loue friends with their humors, not for the respect of the continuance of friendship, nor of their constancy, but for the honour of this Crowne. They would not bind the Kings word to any other thing then the payment of a million of gold, in discharge of their debt or pension. There must be a nother day to deliuer that which should be resolu'd by euery Canton, vpon the Kings offers and propositions. The petty Cantons appointed a Diet at Lucerna, to resolu'e of the difficulties they were in betwixt the alliances with France and Spaine, seeing they might not hold the one, but they must abandon the other. Their resolution was, to accept the renewing of the league, and to esteeme old friends for the best. Yet they

A million of gold granted to the Suiffes.

A did not publish it so soone, that it might be the better accepted: many daies were spent in generall assemblies at Bale and Soleurre, to reduce it to an immutable point. Monsieur de Vic went vnto the Grifons, and procured an assembly to be called at Coire of the three Cantons and their commons in their Episcopall city: there were as many difficulties as the country is rough, the Spanish practices had so much withdrawne their affections from France, they could not dissemble the grieffe they conceived for the confirmation of this League. The Count of Fuentes would not suffer any provision to goe out of the Duchy of Milan, that the dearth and discommodity of victuals, might make the Grifons know that the friendship of Spaine was more profitable vnto them then that of France, and that they should not so much desire the number, as the profit of friends.

De Vic propounded the Kings intention to threecore and seuen Ambassadors deputied by the three Cantons of the Grifons, and to as many other chosen out of the country. They hold a great liberty of opinions in their assemblies, euery man speaks what he thinks. Heere they which made least shew, spake loudest, in the end they resolu'd to accept of the renewing of the League, adding thereunto such preiudicial conditions, as two of them were sufficient to make the League fruitlesse for the King. De Vic sayd vnto them, that they must not thinke that the King would endure any addition or deminution in the ancient Treaty, answering the sayd Articles by writing, to the end that the commons which were to determine thereon, might iudge that their reasons were not stronger then those which he had propounded vnto them, and their commodities and suerties greater with the Kings alliance, then with all others. Whilst that De Vic was with the Grifons, Sillery labored to dispose the 13 Cantons to the Kings will. But there was still more to resolu'e then had beene resolu'd on. The Suiffes although they haue not the quicknesse of spirit as other nations, yet are they not lesse aduised in the conduct of their affaires. So as when the Kings Ambassadors thought that in the last Diet held at Soleurre, there would be but one sitting, for that all difficulties had beene very exactly confidered, they must yet haue patience for twelue dayes, with more crosses and difficulties then were euer treated of in Suisseerland, for the like affaires; for both the Kings friends and enemies, had conspired not to consent to the conclusion of the Treaty, without assurance to be paid vnto them euery yeere, besides the million of gold that was granted. The stay of the bringing of the Kings mony did also greatly distast them that should haue the best share in the distribution. The more certaine the hope is, the more troublesome is the stay. This failing was insupportable vnto them, and thrust them into bad resolutions against the aduancement of the Kings affaires. So as the Ambassadors did thinke for a time they should get much, to breake with some, and to differ with others, rather then to tie the King vnto such forced conditions. But after much toile of body and mind, the Treaty was concluded with the good liking of the superiors. There remained nothing but to haue the Duke of Biron come, to authorize by his presence, what had beene concluded by the Kings Ambassadors: he came in the end of January, well accompanied, and as well received by the Lords of that Common-weale, and by the Colonels and Captaines, to whom it seemed that they were in France, seeing him alwaies that had commanded over them in the Kings Army. The Duke spake vnto them in the generall assembly at Soleurre in this sort: " Noble Lords, the King my Master (making the same esteeme which his Predecessors haue done, of your generosity, desiring the continuance of true friendship and faithfull alliance, which hath been of long time betwixt his Crown and your Commonalties) hath commanded me to come into your Country, for the happy ending of the Treaty, which the Seigneurs of Sillery, and de Vic, haue managed for the renewing of the League. His Maiesty hath also commanded me to assure you of the account he makes of your faith, and that hee will fully obserue the promises that shall be made vnto you. He doth also assure himselfe, that for your parts, you will bring all willingness and freedome, now that his Realme is the most flourishing, ei-uing more cause of enuy then of pity. He desires more earnestly to renew the ancient alliances that haue beene betwixt the Kings and Crowne of France, and your Common-weale, thinking that the good which shall rise thereby shall be profitable vnto you, and the best and most assured meanes to make you liue powerfully, and happily. I will conceale how highly I esteeme the honour which the King my Master hath done me, in making choice of me with these Gentlemen, to serue for so good and holy a worke, and also to see my selfe with a Nation, which hath beene often (both in peace and war) cherished and esteemed by my deceased Lord and father, the Marshall of Eiron, and of my self: For proove of my affection, I offer you all that is in my power, being desirous to assist you with all favour, and to serve you in that which a Knight of honour ought and may.

The Kings alliance was accepted by the Suisses, publike thanks were given to God, and the Duke with the Ambassadors solemnly feasted. The alliance which before had beene contracted but for the Kings life onely, was concluded for the Dauphins also, after that of the Kings, and as many years after as were granted to the deceased King. The King received great content to see this Treaty so happily concluded, to the honour of his Crowne, contrary to the intent and practices of those that sought to hinder it.

The King of Spaine had leaved a great army in Italy; men spake diversly of his designs, some added, that D'Albigny was gone to Milan to the Count Fuertes; that the Marquis of Aix was in Spaine; that the Duke was ready to subiect himselfe wholly to the will of the Councell of Spaine, to whom he deliuered his two sonnes, having made them Knights of his order, to prepare them to the voyage, and had sent De Fourny (an extraordinary Ambassador to Rome) to beseech the Pope to send them his blessing. But the King knew well, that vnder these shewes and pretences, there were other negotiations to trouble his Estate, whereof he made no shew: yet such as did see him when hee was most free and priuate, discovered that his head was troubled, and that the toyle & weariness of his minde, was much more then that of his body. One day coming from hunting, being very penfue before the fire, with his hat on his eyes, he drew his sword, speaking some words vnto himselfe, then he turned towards the Vidam of Chartres, who was there present, asking him when La Fin his Vncle would come, and that he longed to see him. At the same time there were great reparations made at the Bastille, rather to keepe that fast that was to be within it, then to resist without.

There are crimes whereof they make no shew vntill they be committed, but in cases of Treason they must thunder and lighten both together, and it is better to auoid the blow being far off, then to attend it, and not regard it, there being nothing so troublesome as to liue in continuall feare of conspiracies, the which the more they are diffembled, the more they are fortified. This winter the Queene made a rich and sumptuous maske, calling fiftene Princesses and Ladies of the Court vnto her, which represented sixteene Vertues, whereof the Queene made the first. The Duke of Vendosme being attired like Cupid, marched before the Queene: but within few daies after he changed that habit into mourning, for the death of the Duke of Mercure his Father-in-law, who died of a pestilent feuer, on Twelfth day, in the City of Nuremberg, coming into France to prepare a greater expedition against the Turkes.

The King was much grieved for his death: his funerals were made in Lorraine, and at our Ladies Church in Paris; the whole Court of Parliament did assist, and Francis de Sala (elect Bishop of Geneva) made the Funeral Sermon. During the publike sports in Court, the Kings Councell laboured to end the suit betwixt the Commons (or third Estate) and the two first Orders of Dauphine.

The Commons complaining, that all the charges and publike oppressions were laid vpon them, without any helpe from the other Estates of the Prouince, although they made not the sixth part, being reasonable, that all the charges being common, they should be supported equally by all the Prouince, which (by her first condition) was declared free from all such charges, and with this freedome was given to the first Sonne of France. Every Order pleaded for his owne liberties.

This suite continued six yeares, during the which the parties made ample productions, the which were deliuered into the hands of Andrew Harault, Seigneur of Maasles, one of the Kings priuy Councell, who before he made his report vnto the King and Councell, caused the whole Proceffe to be seene by the President of Commartin, and to Merle and Villegaignon, Masters of Requests of the Kings household, and heard the Deputies of the parties touching difficulties which did arise. The King would haue the Proceffe seene in his Councell, and that the sentence should be solemnly giuen in his presence, and with the aduice of the first Officers of the Crown, & chiefe of his Councell, whom he did particularly name. Many daies being spent in the report, & much pleading by the deputies of either part, the King ordained by decree a general order for the subsidies of Dauphiné.

The

The third Estate was nipe well pleased with this Decree, but in the end they were forced to remember, that in all Countries gouerned by an absolute Monarch, they might not censure into comparison with the other Orders.

The King having passed the Feast of Easter at Fontainebleau, prepared to goe to Blois, to Tours, and to Poitiers, and farther, if the good of his preference so required. Many beleued that his intent was to goe another way, which agreed well with their humors who heaued nothing but war. The great leauies which were made in Italy, the warlike humour of the Count of Fuentes, the great stirring of the Duke of Savoy, who could not liue in peace: the discontent of the Spaniards for the preiudicial conditions of the Treaty of Veruins, and many other considerations, gaue some shew of the common opinion of was.

The King had also some intelligence, that the Sea Army, prepared in the realme of Naples, had an enterprife vpon Prouence, although the Spaniards gaue it out, that it was for Algier; but the cleere sighted knew well that without some treason among the French, the Spaniards affaires were not in so good estate as to attempt any thing against France. The King was aduertised that the Duke of Biron was strait from his duty, and assured moreover, that this disposition of his did not grow in an instant; and that he had not entered into these bad resolutions suddenly, if he had not had conference with strangers. He could not beleue that a spirit so vigilant, so active and so valiant, could suffer himselfe to be transported with such violent furies: and it seemed a dreame vnto him, that a man which had gotten so much honour, to whom his father had left so much, and who had received daily what he would from the King, should resolute to that which was contrary to his honour, and greatnesse of his courage. This good opinion made the King not beleue the aduice giuen him of his bad intentions, making no shew thereof, but would giue him the gouernment of Guienne, & 200000 crownes recompence, with the Castles of Trampet and Blay, to draw him from the frontier, which was more commodious for conference with them, who were resolute to draw him from France, or to ruine him.

They had fought him after the taking of Laas, when as they discovered, that hee was come to Paris in choller, for that the King had refused him something, wherewith he gratified the Duchesse of Beaufort: then they offered him two hundred thousand crownes yearly entertainment, and to be Generall of all the King of Spaines forces in France. As they had found him an Achilles in battell, so they found him an Ulysses to their words, stopping his eares at their enchantments, saying; That choller should neuer draw him from his duty: that although his nature were fiery and boyling in the feeling and apprehension of a wrong, yet his heart would neuer suffer this fire to consume the faith and loyalty which he ought vnto his Prince. He retained nothing of the offer which they made him, but onely the remembrance of the reparation and esteeme which they made of his valour; and euen then he suffered himselfe to be caried away with those motions, which often transport the minde to insolvency, and contempt of all things, when they see themselves assured of ease, how soeuer the chance fall, and that they shall neuer bee vnder the seruitude of necessity. He was sometimes heard say, That he would not die before he had seene his head set vpon a quarter of a Crowne: that he would rather goe to a Scaffold to lose his head, then to an Hospitall to beg his bread: that he would dye young, or haue meanes to doe his friends good. Either Caesar, or nothing. Either a free life, or a glorious death: but he had neither of them. His designs made him vter words of a Soueraigne, or so absolute, as the wise did impute it to extreme arrogance, the which hath alwaies ruined and confounded them that entertaine it. It is a great happinesse for an Estate to haue great Captains, but nothing is so hard to entertaine, for when they thinke they haue bound their Country vnto them, although all they doe be lesse then their duties, they are easily discontented, and like Pananius and Themistocles, seeke new alliances and friendship from enemies, if they be not rewarded to their own wils, and to the height of their ambition. The Duke of Biron had done great seruice to the King and Realme, so were his recompences so great, as no Nobleman of his quality in France but might enuy him: For being not yet forty yeares old, he had enjoyed the chieft dignities of the Realme. At foueteene yeares he was Colonell of the Suisses in Flanders. Soone after Marshall of the Campe, and then Marshall Generall. He was receiued Admirall of France in the Paillade at Tours, and Marshall of France in that of Paris. Hee acknowledged none but the King at the siege of Amiens, and was his Maiesties Lieutenant Generall, although there were Princes of the blood. To encrease his greatness, he was declared a Peer of France, and his Barony erected into a Duchy. And yet not content with all this, he said, He would not die, but he would strive higher. That he will goe no more to recover the Townes of Picardy, vntill the King set vp his Image in brasle before the Towre, vntill still in his brauery some very dangerous speeches, and with such affection, as hee was not pleased with them that did not applaud them. When he saw after the siege of Amiens, that Britany was reduced and the war ended, he thought, that having no more vtil of his valor, he should haue no more credit: that hee should haue no more meanes to play the petty King, and to doe all that without feare which he did without iustice. Hee complained of the King, and of the vnequall recompence of his merits and seruises: hee proclaimed his discontents, adding threats to his complaints, speaking of the King with so small respect, as his most passionate seruants held his speeches to be insolent and dangerous. It was the defect of his nature, but fortune added something vnto it, for finding himselfe to abound with all the prosperities that a well ordered desire could wish for in his condition, he found that men lose themselves, being too much at their owne ease. The opinion of himselfe raised his thoughts so high, as hee valued himselfe at an insupportable price, thinking that his heart was not of the common temper of others; that there was no man living might equall him, and that none that were dead had attained to his merits. And although that in all his life he had shewed small zeale to religion; yet now when he prepared his heart to the motions of ambition, he would seeme very religious; protesting that he would be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants. La Noche, Seigneur of La Fin, was (by reason of the troubles of Prouence, and the quarrell of Des Digneurs) retired to his house, being threatened by the King, in quarrell with some great personages of the realme, and surcharged with debts and suits in law. The discontented does still meet by appointment or by chance. The Duke of Biron (who knew that hee had bene employed in the Duke of Alancous affaires, that since he had negotiated with the ministers of the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy, during the siege of Amiens, and that he had a heart full of discontent) imagined that he sought a Master. They talke together, and mixed their griefes and passions in one complaint, they propound to seek together without the realme, which they could not find within it, and to enter in practice with the Duke of Sauoy: they resolute to aduertise him of an intelligence which Des Digneurs had vpon the Fort of Barraut, the which he executed happily. Now after so many examples of inevitable dangers, the Duke of Biron abandons himselfe to a voyage full of dangerous rocks, and fearfull straights, vnder the conduct of a man who was yett with shipwracke which he had suffered.

Hee went into Flanders for the execution of the Treaty of Verains, where Picote of Orleanse had conference with him, and inspired his heart with desire to raise his fortune with those who both knew and admired his merits. The Duke of Biron heard him, and made no shew to vnderstand him, and yet he left him in an opinion, that if hee came into France, he would be well pleased that he should speake more plainly vnto him of that subject. The Spaniards did beleue that he yielded, seeing he gaue care, and assured themselves, either to win him, or to vndoe him. The King was aduertised by one which was then employed in the Archdukes Court, of this practice, but he sent him word, that the Marshall Biron was of too high a spirit to yeeld to so great a treachery. Being returned out of Flanders, the King would haue married him; but he made shew that his affections were otherwise settled. And although he gaue it out that he sought the Daughter of Madame de Luce, yet he treated to haue the other daughter of the Duke of Sauoy, whereof Cheualier Breton had spoken vnto him.

La Fin had a promise from the Duke of Biron to do all he could to content his hopes. Picote had made a voyage into Spaine to receive directions. Fuyet (a religious man of the order of Cisteraux) went into Sauoy, and so to Milan, to receive order how to teare this plaint from France: but the Duke of Sauoy being at Paris, pulled vp the Flower-de-Luce which was planted in his heart, and disposed him so to trouble the King within the Realme, as he should leaue him the Marquissate of Saluces in peace. Vpon this assurance the Duke of Sauoy had no meaning to effect the Treaty of Peace: war was proclaimed; the Duke of Biron takes the chiefe places of Bresse: being at Pierre Chastell in the beginning of September, La Fin comes vnto him, who by his order had made two Hee contemned the Kings aduice.

He is discontented for the refusal of the Citadell of Bourg.

He treats with the Duke of Sauoy and the Count of Fuentes.

A voyages to Saint Claude, where Rencas met him. The King had aduice thereof, but hee thought it better to dissemble these practices, then to surprize the best of his seruants in his acts of infidelity. He was content to draw him into Sauoy, and to tell him that he must abandon La Fin, and not giue care to his bad persuasions. The King shewed him his error, to guide him in the right way, but as they which are posselt with this violent passion of desire to be matters, are no more capable of government nor counsell, hee conceived that what the King spake for loue, proceeded from feare, continuing still his practices with La Fin, and neuer going to see the King, but with a great troupe. He made him beleue being at Annessy, that he desired to discover some passage, and demanded guides of the Country to tharend, but it was onely to let Rencas passe to the Duke of Sauoy, to discover vnto him the estate of the Kings army, and to make D'Albigny retire with his troopes, the which without this aduice had bene cut in pieces.

It was at the same time when as the Duke of Biron intreated the King to giue the government of the Citadell of Bourg to him that he should name. It is the nature of great men which serue Princes, to thinke they merit all, and to be more dangerous then enemies if they refused what they demand. The King answered him, That hee would commit that place vnto de Buisser. This denyall did so transport the Duke of Biron, and thrust him into such strange and deuillish resolutions, as one morning being in his bed at Chaumont, hee made an enterprise vpon the Kings person, whereof mention is made in the deposition of La Fin and Rencas, but it was not executed. He himselfe had horror of so execrable a thought.

La Fin went also from the army to conclude the bargain with the Duke of Sauoy and the Count of Fuentes. He treated first with the Duke, and the Ambassador of Spaine at Iurec, and then at Thurlin with Rencas. He went to Milan to the Count of Fuentes, whither Picote also came, bringing an answer from the Councell of Spaine, to the Duke of Biron's propositions, and order to conferre with La Fin, and to perswade him to make a voyage into Spaine. He said openly, that the King of Spaine desired to haue the Duke of Biron at what price and perill soeuer. The Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes appointed a day to meet at Some with the Ambassador of Spaine, La Fin and Picote. There their minds were knowne, and all difficulties freed of either side. La Fin who had pierced into the secret of his counsels, sayd, That the mariage of the Duke of Sauoyes third daughter, was the Cymment to ioyne together and vntie all this treaty, with promise of five hundred thousand Crownes, and the transport of all the rights of the Souerainity of Bourgongne. A more fetled iudgement, and greater constancy then that of the Duke of Biron, might haue bene troubled with such plausible and goodly offers: hee could not be seduced but by that Demon of Ambition, nor stumble but by that blindness.

The Duke of Sauoy gaue him more hope then assurance of this mariage, and it was not credible that he would accept of a meane Gentleman for his Sonne in law, who was not E of so great a House, but there were many better then his in France. Princes promise all, and hold nothing but what doth not preiudice their greatness. Whilest that La Fin treated of the Duke of Biron's capitulation in Italy, the treaty of peace at Lyons was concluded. The ignorant sayd, that the King had done ill in not proceeding, and that he should keepe that great rampier of the Alpes, for the frontier of Gaule. There were discourses of men which did not consider, how dangerous it is to goe farre from the frontier, and to leaue behind his backe a strong conspiracy: without this peace the King had bene forced to passe the Alpes, the which had bin a favorable occasion for this treason. He was aduertised of the bad seruises the Duke of Biron did him: and that the enterprises which he had vpon the Citadell of Thurin, and the best places of Piedmont, were discovered by their treachery, to whom he had trusted his Crowne and Scepter. A Prince that hath trayned in his army, neuer fighteth happily. Charles repented his trust reposed in Guelon, and Charles Duke of Bourgongne in Campobasso.

The Duke of Biron had alwayes dissuaded this peace. For that is alwayes the nature of Souldiers to desire worke at whole cost: wholeouer, and not to haue rest, but to troubles which they breed or entertaine. But finding that this peace must send him home to his government, & that the King had some notice of his practices with La Fin, hee came to be very penitent, & asked pardon of the King, walking in the Cloister of the Franciscan Friars at Lyons, beseeching him (with a countenance full of contrition and humility) to forget A his bad intentions, the which rage and despit for the Citadell of Bourg had possessed his heart with. The King pardoned him, saying; That he was well pleased that he had relied upon his clemency, and the love which he bare him, whereof hee would alwayes give him so good proofes, as he should have no cause to doubt, nor to attempt any thing against the assurance he had of his loyalty. Going from thence, he met with the Duke of Espernon, saying, That (as to his best friend) he would impart vnto him the best adventure that euer hapned vnto him, hauing discharged his conscience from the terrors and horrors that did afflicke him: and that the King had pardoned him what was past, and had promised him all fauour hereafter. The Duke of Espernon answered, That he was glad, but he must craue an abolishment B for offences of that quality are not so easily remitted. How should I (said hee) assure my selfe better then in the Kings word? If the Duke of Biron must sue for an abolishment, what must others doe? The Duke of Espernon had reason to aduise him to take an abolishment, and the other was in no error in trusting to the Kings word, who had forgotten his fault, if he had done nothing since to renew the remembrance. But here they obserued an act which had all the signes of an implacable hatred. The Duke of Biron being sent for by the King, to come and receiue his commandements, and the testimony of his clemencie, parts from Bourg, and comes to lye at Vimy. There hee made a dispatch to La Fin, who was at Milan. He goes to Lyons, and is receiued of the King, as the father doth his lost child, whom he hath found againe. He stayed some dayes at Lyons, and hauing accompanied the Queene at her departure, he returned to Vimy, where hee made another dispatch to La Fin by one Farges. As soone as he comes to Bourg, hee sends away Bisces (cousin to Rencaz) to aduance the businesse.

Crimes of treason are not pardoned without an abolishment.

He continues the offence pardoned.

Rencaz stayed prisoner by the Duke of Sauoyes command.

Instructions given by the Duke of Biron to La Fin.

This negotiation was continued at Some, betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count of Fuentes, and La Fin. The Count of Fuentes led La Fin to Milan, desiring to be satisfied of some points, but finding his answers not constant, hee thought it not fit to trust the secret vnto him, but to dispatch him; who finding that he was vnpleasing vnto them in this negotiation, stayed not long there. Hereupon he sent him back, and requested him to passe by the Duke. But he did well in taking his way by the Grisons, to recouer Basil, Paurcristin, and Besangon, for Rencaz his Secretary, who passed into Sauoy, was stayed prisoner. D The worke changed nothing but the instrument. Alphonso, Casal, and Rencaz, continued it with the Baron of Lux. In the meane time the Duke of Biron slept not, hauing sent a man into Spaine, although he were neere vnto the King, who for that he would not lose him, kept him about him, he caried him to the frontier, and sent him into England, where he heard of the death of the Earle of Essex. A fresh example of iustice against those that seeke to be feared of their Masters, and abuse their loue. At his returne he made a voyage into Gascony, where he was honoured of the Nobility as a Prince; and being returned to Dijon, he went into Suifferland, to conclude the renewing of the Kings alliance, where he continued his practices with the Count of Fuentes, to whom he sent his Secretary, vnder colour to condukt his Pages to Nova Palma, a Fort of the Venetians. Being returned out E of Suifferland, he went not to give an account of his charge, excusing himselfe vpon the holding of Estates of the Prouince. The King who had some inkling of these broyles (by Cambellers) desired greatly to speake with La Fin, to be informed of the truth. La Fin who had his heart big with despit, that the Baron of Lux would haue all the fruit of this negotiation: and that Rencaz was detained prisoner in Sauoy, sent Cerezas to the Duke of Biron, to tell him that he could no longer be his seruant, if he did not deliuer him Rencaz, aduertising him also that he could no longer deferre his going vnto the King, and that he desired to know what he would haue him say, touching things past. Hee made small account of one of his propositions, and spake of Rencaz as if hee were no more among the liuing. Touching the other, he sayd to Cerezas, that hee was of opinion hee should goe to F Court with small traine, and that hee should prepare himselfe at the first, to receiue words of choller and contempt from the King, the which hee should easily calme, in beseeching him to beleuee that the voyage which he had made into Italy, was onely for deuotion to our Lady of Loreto, and that passing by Milan and Thurin, they had charged him to propound the marriage of the Duke of Sauoyes third Daughter vnto him, which he would not hearken vnto, seeing his Maiestie would take the care to marrie him. He entreated and aduised Cerezas, to aduise La Fin, to dismisse all those that had made the voyages

A voyages with him, especially a Curate, and to lay his papers in some place of safety, if he would not burne them, and to consider in the end, that he had in his hands, his life, his fortune, and his honour. La Fin came to the Court at Fontainebleau in the end of Lent, hee spake first with the King, and with Villeroy alone, he had conference with the Chancelor in the night, with Rhuspi in the Forrest, and with Sillery at the pressing place, being newly come out of Suifferland. All had horror to see the writings, and to heare the designs which they vnderstood. We must not beleue lightly: for slander is subtil, and doth seek to supplant the most innocent actions. But when the preferuacion of the State is in question, the most doubtful things are not to be reiected nor contemned. The King could hardly beleue so great a wickednesse: the facility of his bounty made him hard of belief. La Fin made him to see such apparant and certaine proofes of this conspiracy, as hee was forced to beleue more then he desired. He declared all that had past in his voyages to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuentes, for the Duke of Biron, saying; That hee desired that the returne of the warre might haue troubled his Maiesty, and profited them that were the cause of it. But seeing that his sacred and inuolable person was not excepted; and that they made cruell designs against him, he had such horror, as he was resolu'd to giue him intelligence thereof, choosing rather to faile in his promise to the seruant, then in his duty to the Master.

La Fin comes to Court.

The King full of clemency and bounty, was wonderfully grieved to see so vnnatural a conspiracy: yet he said; that if the conspirators did their duties, and gaue him the means they might to prevent the bad designs of his enemies, hee would pardon them. If they weep (sayd he) I will weep with them. If they remember what they owe me, I will not forget what is due to them. They shall find me as full of clemency as they are void of good affections. I would not haue the Marshall of Biron the first example of the severity of my iustice, & that he should be the cause that my reigne (which hitherto hath been like vnto a calme & clear skie) should be suddenly ouercast with clouds of thunder & lightning. And from that time his resolution was, that if the Marshall of Biron confessed the truth, hee would pardon him. His Councell were of that opinion, so as he would employ himselfe effectually, to doe as much good for the seruice of his Estate against his enemies, as he had practised ill among them. Of many papers which La Fin presented vnto the King, they made choise of seuen and twenty peeces, which were not those which concluded most against the Duke of Biron, but which made mention onely of him, the King being vnwilling to haue the rest discouered, to the end that the punishment of one, might serue for an example to all. The Chancelor kept these papers with such care, as he caused them to be sowed vnto his doublet, being loath to trust any one with them, or shew them till need required. The Baron of Lux was at Fontainebleau when as La Fin arriued; the King sayd vnto him that hee was very well satisfied, that La Fin had spoken so honourably and so wisely of the Duke of Biron, that he knew well his intentions were not conuerted to any bad designs, as they sayd. Hee returned to Dijon well content, thinking that all things E were found.

The King expresses repentance onely of the Duke.

La Fin writes to the Duke of Biron, that hee had satisfied the King of his actions, and hath said nothing but what hee thought might serue to banish all bad impressions. The King managed the businesse so wisely, as the euent was happy, making few to feare no enemies but abroad. He grew iousal of the arming of so many galleies at Genoa for the King of Spaine, vnder colour of the Prince of Piedmonts passage, lest they should haue some enterprize vpon Prouence. He therefore commanded the Dukes of Guise and Ventadour, to be carefull of their charges. Hee wrote to the Gouverneur of Lions (whose intent was to spend some part of the Summer at Chaumont) to returne to Lyons, for that hee was aduertised from all parts, that his enemies had some designe there, whereof they F vaunted.

An army at Sen for the King of Spaine.

He commanded Des Diguieres to goe to horse-backe if need were; and when the Gouverneur of Lions should send for him; and he caused the Marquis of Spinola's troops to be obserued, the which were ready to passe at Pont de Grefin to go into Flanders, the which in truth were but to couer the Duke of Biron's practices.

The King parted from Fontainebleau to goe to Blois and so into Poictou. There are always in States (as in great bodies) swellings and bad humors, which are not to be cured by violent remedies, but gently & by the Princes presence. There were in Guienne & Poictou diuers motions, which could not be dispersed, but by the light of the King. He resolved to go into those quarters, and to shew himselfe vnto them glorious in peace, who had neuer seene him but triumphant in warre. He past to Blois, Tours, and then to Poitiers. His presence did pacifie all mutinies which grew by reason of the imposition of a Soule vpon a Luer, and through the apprehension which was given the people, that hee would giue garisons to some Townes, and Citadels to others, and to all in generall an encrease of their miseries. But as soone as the King had said vnto them, that he came not to ruine them, but relieue them. That he would build no other fortresses but in their hearts, nor vfe any more constraints to succour the necessities of the Crowne, then their owne good wils: That he desired more to adde and encrease, then to diminish their contents: and that he would not haue the gold of his treasure to be bathed in the teares and blood of his subjects: That there was no man but did blesse the yeares of his reigne, and did wish it immortall. His presence did also disappoint many bad practices which were growing. France was so full of corrupt humours, as vpon the least motion that happened, it was ready to fall into her former frenzies.

The said decree against Aduo-

The great trouble of the Palace at Paris, by the intermission of hearing of causes, and the dismission of Aduocates (the which happened the 13 of May, a fatal moneth for the Parisiens by a greater reuolt) seemed to preiudge some new storme. The cause grew from a Decree of the Court, giuen against Aduocates, and by the Kings authority and expresse commandement, who before he parted from Paris to passe the Easter at Fontainebleau, sent for the chiefe of the Court of Parliament, and of all the other Courts, to recommend their charges vnto them. From whose owne mouth they vnderstood, how much hee desired that iustice might be administrd with lesse charge, and lesse losse of time: that there was no iustice for them that had no money; so exorbitant were the Iudges Spices, and the Aduocates Fees. The Court of Parliament desiring that according to the Kings mind, intention, and last command, the exorbitant (whereof they complained) against the Aduocates might be reduced to a meane and iust temper, assembled to redresse those disorders. The opinions being heard and numbered, against Aduocates, the first President shewing that a reformation was as necessary in Iudges as in Aduocates; in the end, a decree was made, by the which it was ordained and appointed, that every Aduocate should set downe vnder his owne hand, in the end of his writings, what he had taken for his owne fees, to the end that in case of exorbitance, it might be moderated, when as the Court should proceed to iudgement of the processe. Moreover, they should giue a certificate what they had taken for the pleading of causes, to be set down in the taxe of charges, all vpon paine of extortion. This law was not made against the good, but onely to restrain the auarice of others, who preferre the opportunity of taking, before all apprehension. All notwithstanding, did oppose themselves against the execution of this law, saying, That they would rather leave their places, then subiect themselves to the rigour of the Decree, and doe so great a wrong to the dignity and liberty of their profession.

The second decree against Aduocates.

The Court made another Law, whereby it was decreed, That such as would not plead, E should deliuer their names vnto the Register, after which they were forbidden to practice as Aduocates, vpon paine of fialhood. This second Decree was pronounced in open assembly in the house of the Kings Attorney generall. The next day there went out of the Chambers of Consultation, by two and two, to the number of three hundred and seuen, they past through the Palace Hall, went to the Register to giue vp their hoods, and to declare that they obeyed the second Decree, seeing they could not obey the first.

Defence of
the Aduocates.

From that time the Palace was without pleading, the Aduocates being busied to defend themselves, yet the toyle was not great for them to maintaine a bad cause for themselves, which had defended so many for others. The cause was bad indeed, for that it did impugn the iustice of a Law made at the Estates of Blois, and that it seemed priuate men would know more then the law it selfe. They caused a Declaration to be published at Paris, in the name of a young Aduocate, but it was written by one of the learnedst of the Palace, declaring, That as of custome they should referre their reward to the discretion of the parties; the reasons were grounded vpon the fidelity, discretion, learning, and eloquence of the Aduocates of the Court of Parliament of Paris, to whom they could not reproach preiudication, or filthy contracts, so ordinary heretofore at Rome,

A or that they euer had processe for their fees, although they plead infinit causes, for the which through the pouerty or misprision of parties, the Aduocates haue not any thing, and others for the which they receiue no recompence, but a yeare, yea three or foure after their employments. They shewed, that they could not iudge of the exorbitant fees of a Pleader, vnlesse they knew the time which had bene employed to peruse the writings, and to study the questions, and that sometimes bare words cost more whole nights, then a long discourse, which shall containe many Citations, will require quarters of houres. That for this respect the President Thou in a famous cause, after that hee had pronounced sentences, said, (as hauing charge from the Court) that all which Princes and Noblemen B gaue vnto their Aduocates, could in no sort equal the recompence which their care, diligence, and knowledge did merit. That this profession is very laborious and painfull, to the which the gate of the greatest dignities of the Realme was open, when as they knew not what it was to buy such offices. That there is nothing comparable to the apprehension of an Orator, to lose in one day the reputation which hee hath purchased in thirtie yeares, when as he speaks in the presence of 3000 persons which neuer heard him, and that an inconsiderate word or a defect of memory (wherein the greatest Oratours haue failed) should blemish all the fruits of their study. That this Profession being an Art which consumes much, it should be fauoured, to the end that such as are in that course, might be encouraged to perseuer, and others inuited which might succeed them. That C next to the Art of warre, there is nothing more generous, then to oppose themselves to the violence of great men, notwithstanding all their secret and open threats: and to make Truth, Equity, and Iustice, to shine through a million of clouds, which they would obscure by diuers Contracts: To cause the wicked to tremble, to encourage good men, and to be a Sanctuary to innocents oppressed, and by the liuely force of an eloquent discourse, capable to moue rocks, to breake the hardnesse of mens hearts banded to support iniustice and wrong; and according to occasions which should be presented, extoll vnto heauen, his Prince and Country. That it was impossible that they which had attained to the most difficult Sciences in the world, should submit themselves to the scandall of Solicitors, who would giue lesse to the Aduocate then their masters had commanded them, and to couer D their theft they would make them beleue, that they would not giue them quitrances for such a summe, although they had taken all. That the very day this order should take place, all liberties should be banished from the Bar, there being few which could resolute to liue otherwise, then vnder the Lawes which great personages haue made, hauing immortalized their names by their learning and eloquence, who could not doe any thing against their honour, no more then against their consciences, flying dishonest things, not as vnlawfull, but as shamefull and reproachfull. That posterity will neuer approue the counsell which some would giue his Maiesty, to be the first that should begin to disfaue those which had bin alwaies held & esteemed among the best & most pregnant wits of his kingdom, and who by their golden pen and immortall sounding voyce doe consecrate to eternitie the worthy actions, and glorious deeds of armes, of great Kings, and great Captains; E yet could they not moue the Court to reuoke or change the Decree, they were forced to haue recourse vnto the King, to reconcile this diuision, which happened vpon a day, which reuincd the memory of a greater trouble, he sent his Letters to the Parliament, in termes conformable to his iustice, and the wisdom of his Councill. By the which it was lawfull for Aduocates to exercise their functions, as they had done before the said Decree, enioyning them notwithstanding to obserue the ordinance made at Blois in that behalfe, in the 161 Article. The parties which had sutes did languish in expectation of this Declaration. As they complained of the corruption, so they suffered the inconueniency of the remedy.

F The Court which had made many iust and seuer Lawes against Duels and Combats, confirmed the Edict which the King made at Blois. Before his Maiesties departure from Fontainebleau, he had commanded the Constable, Chancellor, Marshals of France, and the chiefe of his Councill, to devise some means to suppress the libertie of Duels, being so iniurious and preiudiciall to his Estate. By their aduice an Edict was made, by the which they that call, or are called, or which assist, or second him that calls, or is called, are declared guilty of high treason, and to be punished according to the rigour of the Lawes. 1602 unces, to prevent Duels, and to forbid them vpon paine of death; to iudge absolutely as they shall thinke good, of all that concerns the reparation of wrongs, and to force them that are condemned, to satisfie by imprisonment. It is true, that the custome of fighting is stronger then the Law, that the obedience of the law is alwayes held for faintnesse of heart; and to kill in single combat not for iniuries and offences alone, but for opinions and shadowes of offences, is but a sport, being to be feared that Duels will be as ordinary in France as in the Realme of Narvingue, whereas the King doth not onely allow them, but doth also assit, and giues markes of honour and recompence to the victors, vpon condition that another might take it from him by the same meanes that he had gotten it, in measuring their armes. But it is lost labour to prescribe lawes to them who thinke their courages cannot be subiected, nor the French kept from fighting, being of such an humor as they cannot liue otherwise, but must with the losse of their liues pay their apprenticeship of fencing. Whilst the enemy watched to ouerthrow this Estate, & that to minister occasion to speake of them, they would set Diana's Temple on fire, and consume obedience to shew, the King neglected not the meanes to crosse their designs. The voyage which hee made into Poictou, diuerted the effects, and reclaimed them to their duties which by perswasions and dangerous impressions were gone astray. And although wee haue some feeling of the last Frenzie, and that the Feuer which hath afflicted the body, hath in it some bad humours, that the people is by nature variable and easily drawne away. Yet the pretexes which they tooke to moue them, were reiected like drugges which had taken wind, and bitter pills giue ouer with goodly hopes, to profit by the change of the present estate. In the end, the King effected this businesse happily in Poictou: he found so great an obedience in them to please him, as he remained very well satisfied. His Maiesty left so many testimonies in all places of his bounty, as all had cause to praise him, and to blame the practices which sought to trouble the peace. The Duke of Biron did not thinke the King should haue found so great obedience and loue, among his subiects of that Prouince. He had sent some of his seruants to Court, to learne how the market went, and to shew the discontent he had for the iacalous which was conceiued of his faith and dutie. The King who was well informed of his intelligences with the Count of Fuentes, resolved to see him, and to keepe him from his enemies. He sent Desferes vnto him, with charge to say, that hauing intelligence of the great leaues of souldiers made in Italy, he had resolved to maintaine the body of an army vpon the frontier, and to giue the charge vnto him, and to that end he had commanded de Vic his Ambassador in Suisse, to demand a leaue of six thousand men, and to cause them to march where he should haue directions: that therein he followed the counsell of the Constable his gossip, whose aduice he sent him in writing, and desired to haue his by mouth, consiuring him to come with speed. Hee stirres not for all that, excusing himselfe sometimes vpon the holding of the Estates: sometimes, that the enemy being so neare, it were an act vnworthy of his reputation to turne his backe and to abandon his frontier. The King sent the President Ianin, a man powerfull in perswasion, who coming to Dijon, gaue the Duke to vnderstand how much the King desired to see him, and how necessary this sight was; and among many discourses (applied fitly to his humour) he let him know the Kings strength, and the length of his arme. This was not able to moue him. He considered that the Duke of Biron must be perswaded to this voyage, by him that was all of his counsell, whom he assured that as hee should haue all the honour of this perswasion, so he could expect nothing but disgrace and ruine of a contrary counsell. His friends notwithstanding did consiure him not to come: one of his best friends sent him word by his brother, that his gouernment was disposed of, and that for his last hope he aduised him to retire into the Franche Conté. Another friend sent him word that he should distrust all he saw, and all that should be said vnto him to moue him to come: that the Kings letters were golden pills: that la Fins assurances were but deccits; and to consider that the voyage which the Vidame of Châtreaux had made to Aunton (to assure him that his Vncle had sayd nothing) was made at the Kings charge. But another friend sent him a contrary aduice to come, and that his onely presence would disperse all these bad reports. There was danger in either. The King sware he would goe fetch him; Hee should haue seene himselfe besieged with the Kings forces, and farre from the strangers which had charge to passe into Flanders. In going, the foulness of his offence could giue him no hope to returne. Hee takes that aduice which hee thinks lesse perillous; and nothing

Frutes of the Kings voyage into Poictou.

The King sends for the Duke of Biron.

The President Janin sent vnto him.

Discreet aduices giuen to the Duke of Biron.

A nothing doth so much aduance the execution, as the assurance hee takes of that which La Fin had written vnto him, whom hee fees returned to his house contented, and freed from all distrust. So the duke promiseth to come vnto the King about the midst of Iune, to some of his houses neere vnto Paris. It was a signe of distrust which the King dissembled, as being indifferent vnto him. The President Ianin goes before, and the Duke of Biron with Desferes follow after by easie iourneys.

Vpon the way hee had an aduice sent him to come no further, and being at Montargis he was in great suspence, but hee had so great a confidence of himselfe, and of the opinion which all the Court had of his valour, as he did not beleue there was any man so hardy as B to lay hold of him, and that if he might haue but meanes to draw his sword, he would free himselfe from his enemies. Hee flattered himselfe in his vanity, and pleased himselfe as Pigmalion did in his Image, and Narcissus in his Shadow. The counsell which they gaue him to humble himselfe vnto the King, was the last anchor of his health. He found no man that spake for his pride, but euery man would haue intreated for his humilitie: But his courage was too great to stoop. Presumption had filled his eares with so much vanity, as the voice of Truth could not enter. If hee were not resolved to take that course what need he come? He should consider that he had offended the King, that offences of Princes are fixed starres, their fauours are moueable, and are like to the Egyptian wheeles. That if the King had had no other proofe of his bad designs, but what suspicion and opinion C might giue him, it had beene alwayes dangerous to approach. If hee had knowne nothing but by dreames and diuinations, yet should hee thinke it had bene sufficient to put him to death. We must thinke (said Nestor to Agamemnon) that all that a Prince doth dreame for the conduct of his Estate is true. And if the innocence of that whereof hee was accused, had assured him of his returne, yet should hee consult with his conscience: it is better to rely in her, then in all the assurances which the offence can imagine, to free him from the punishment which followeth him, as the shadow doth the body. The conscience is the Accuser, the Witnesse, and the Iudge of the most secret crimes, the pursuits and torments whereof cannot be auoided.

These with other reasons were giuen to stay him in his iourney. But it is impossible to D auoid the prouidence of Heauen. The Duke of Biron will needs carie his head to the Kings Iustice. The discourse of Reason, or the iudgements of Truth preuaile not with a spirit transported with passions. There were many bad presages of the Dukes voyage. A Duke came into his Cabinet and no man knew how, hee commanded it should be carefully kept, but as soone as hee was parted it died. Presently after, the horse which the Archduke gaue him, called Pasfrana, fell mad and killed himselfe. The like hapned to a horse which he had from the great Duke. Another horse which the Duke of Lorraine gaue him, pined to death.

He came to Fountainbleau, when as they had no more hope of his coming, and the King had resolved within two or three dayes after to goe into Bourgogne. His Maiesty E walking in the great garden about six of the clocke in the morning, was heard say vnto the Lord of Souvray. He will not come? Hee had scarce spoken these words, but hee fees him enter with him. The King said, hee comes fitly to conduct him to his house. Hee aduaneeth and makes three great courtesies a good distance off. The King embraced him and said, that hee was come in good time to conduct him to his house: which words were diuersly vnderstood by the hearers. The first words he vsed vnto the King, were vpon the occasion of his coming, beginning to excuse his long stay. The King gaue care to few words, but tooke him by the hand, to walke and shew him the plot of his building. Passing from one garden to another, the Duke of Espernon saluting the Duke of Biron, told him in his eare, that in coming hee had giuen more credit to his owne courage, then to the counsell of his friends. In all the discourse which he had with the King, as there appeared coldnesse in the countenance of the one, so there was some signe of perturbation in the other words. The King talked vnto him of the bad course hee had taken, the which had no other issue, then ruine, repentance, and despair. The Duke of Biron answered, that hee was not come either to iustifie himselfe, or to demand pardon, or to accuse his friends. He let scape many other words, which his Maiesties presence and the law of duty should haue restrained. It is not sufficient to be faithful, if his tongue and heart doe not witnesse his loyalty.

Hee received many messages to turne him backe.

Hee excused his stay.

The Kings fauour to him growne cold.

The Duke of Biron not respected.

Dinner time being come, he desired to dine with the Duke of Espernon, for that his owne Trainee was not yet come. After dinner they came to see the King, who having walked a little in the Hall, retired into his Cabinet, commanding two or three to enter, and said nothing to the Duke of Biron, who stayed at the corner of the bed towards the chaire, observing that he was not respected as he had wont to be, and that he was no more in opinion and admiration as he had bene. The Marquis of Rhosny entred into the Cabinet, and having stayed there almost halfe an hour, he came forth and saluted the Duke of Biron, telling him, that the King asked for him. There he was perswaded not to conceale that which time could not long keep hidden, and whereof the King was so well informed, that what he desired to know from the Dukes owne mouth, was but to let him see, that Biron none but himselfe should have knowledge thereof.

The Duke of
himselfe.

The Duke of Biron (who thought that La Fin had not discovered any thing) continued still firme, vpon the protestations of his innocencie, beseeching the King to doe him iustice against them that sought to oppresse him by slanders: insupportable to a conscience so cleare as his was, or to suffer him to take his revenge by the sword. The King led him to the Tennis-court: he could make the match, saying, That the Duke of Espernon and hee, would play against his Maestie and the Count of Soissons. The Duke of Espernon answered presently, Tou play well, but you make your matches ill. At night hee supped with the Lord Steward. It appeared he was not content. Hee ate not any thing, no man spake to him, and they held him for a man abandoned to misfortune. Yet hee thought no man would lay hand on him, trusting too much in his owne courage. The King in the meane time walked in his chamber, devising of some great resolution, he was heard speak these words, He must bend or breake. He gave him time to take counsell of his conscience, and to evaporate those bad humours which did choke him. The night past so quietly as many thought it would be but a thunder-clap, which made a great noise, and did little harme; that the King would rest satisfied to have discovered the Treason, and taken all means from the Traitors to hurt him, not being convenient to discover all the conspirators. Hee commanded the Count of Soissons to goe to the Duke of Biron, and to do what he could to dissolue the hardnesse of his heart, and to draw the truth from him: he goes vnto him, hee coniures and adiuers him, to thinke of that which hee thought least of, to humble himselfe, and to feare the Lyons paw, and the indignation of a King. The Duke of Biron answered, That the King could not complaine but of the good seruices hee had done him, and that hee had great reason to complaine that hee suspected his loyalty, having given him so many proofs.

The Count of Soissons having observed his humour, and what little fruit might bee drawne from his obdurate heart, by any more perswasions, who beleued that the King had sent him to draw something from him, he left him. Early the next morning the King walking in the little Garden, he sent for the Duke of Biron, and talked long with him, thinking to reclaime him, and to giue him means to free himselfe from the mischief into the which he did runne headlong by his wilfulness. Hee continued long bare-headed, lifting his eyes vp to heauen, beating his brest, and making great protestations to maintaine his innocencie. There appeared choller in the Kings countenance, and by the Duke of Biron's behaviour there seemed fire in his words.

From thence the Duke went to dinner, by the way he met one with a Letter which aduised him to retire himselfe: he shewed it to the Capaine of his Guard, who wished that he had been stabb'd with a Dagger, so as hee had not come. Hee mocked at all them which fore-told his fall, and seemed alwayes hardy and bold in his answiers. The King heard his braueries coldly, but not able to apply himselfe to dissemble, which is held a new vertue in Princes, hee fillt out some words of the bad estate into the which his wilfulness would bring him. The King was much troubled in minde before he could resolute: the Lords of Villeroi, Silillery, and Geure went and came often, before they could vnderstand whereunto it tended.

Many thought it was to shorten the course of Iustice, in so apparant a crime, and begin with the execution, dealing with the Duke of Biron, as Alexander did with Permenio: for Princes are Masters of the Lawes, they have one forme of Iustice for Great men, and another for those whose quality requires not so great respect. In these accidents there is no difference whether blood be drawne before or after dinner; Necessitie teacheth the disorder

A disorder, and the profit doth recompence the Example, so as the Estate bee preferred by the death of him that is prevented. But the King will none of that. Hee proceeds with more courage and generositie: these examples of execution had bene blamed in his Predecessors, hee will haue his subiects, and all the world to know, that hee hath power and authoritie sufficient to root out by the forme of Iustice, not the authors of such a conspiracie, for they bee diuels, but the complices and the instruments how terrible fouler. Hee will haue the solemnities and lawfull ceremonies observed, and that they be iudged by the rigour of the Lawes. He vseth no Proscriptions, he makes no Proclamations, that hee will giue 100000 crownes to them, that shall bring the Conspirators heads, and will make his house Noble: he sends for them, they come, and being come, hee punisheth them.

The resolution was taken to apprehend him, and in like sort to seize vpon the Count of Auvergne. The King would not haue them taken in the Castle, but in their lodgings. The Duke of Biron who had some doubt thereof, and who was prepared for that which hee could not fore-see nor prevent, thought that hee needed not to feare any thing in the Kings Chamber, and that all the danger were at the going forth; and therefore hee provided himselfe of a short sword, with the which he presumed to make his passage. They gaue the King to vnderstand, that if hee were apprehended in any other place, it must needs be bloody: that to avoid an inconuenience, it was good to passe ouer respects that were more vaine then necessary. The King walking in the Gallery, called for Virry and Pralin, and gaue them order how hee would haue his commandements executed, and then he called for his supper.

The Duke of Biron supt at Montignies lodging, where hee spake more proudly and vainly then euer, of his owne Merits, and of the friends hee had gotten in Suiffreland. Then he fell to commend the deceased King of Spaine, his Piety, Iustice, and Liberalitie: Montigny stayed him suddenly, saying, That the greatest commendation they could giue vnto his memory, was to haue put his owne Sonne to death, for that he had attempted to trouble his Estates.

This speech brake off the Duke of Biron's discourse, who answered but with his eyes, and thought of it with some little amazement. After supper the Count of Auvergne and the Duke of Biron came to the King, who walked in the garden. They were wel accompanied, intending to haue gone with a lesse traine. It was said the Dukes horses were fadled ready to be gone, and that he had asked leave in the morning. The King hauing done walking, inuited the Duke of Biron to play; they entred into the Queenes Chamber. The Count of Auvergne passing by the Duke at the entry of the doore, said vnto him in his ear, We are undone. There played at Primero, the Queene, the Duke of Biron (vpon whom all the mischief must fall) and two others. The King played at Chesse, and in playing did ad the part of Vlisses, going and coming to giue order to his affaires. It appeared that his spirit was troubled with a waighy adion. He entred into his Cabinet, being perplexed with two contrary passions, doubtfull whereunto he should yeeld. The loue which he had borne to the Duke of Biron, the knowledge hee had of his valour, and the remembrance of his seruices, made him to reiect all thoughts of Iustice, and to intreat him, as Licurgus had done him that put out his eye. On the other side, feare of trouble in his Estate, and the apprehension of the execrable effects of so vnnatural a conspiracie, accus'd his clemencie of cruelty, which preferred the priuate before the publike. Hee prayed vnto God to assist him with his holy Spirit, to pacifie the combat which hee felt in his soule, and to fortifie him with a holy resolution, so that which should bee for the good of his people, ouer whom he commanded by his onely grace.

His prayer being ended, all difficulties which troubled him were dispersed, and hee fully refused to deliuer the Duke of Biron into the hands of Iustice, if he might not otherwise draw the truth from him of his disloyall enterprises. They continued play still, the King taking the Queenes place sometimes, attending the end of his resolution. The Count of Auvergne was retired: The King sent for him, and walked vp and downe the Chamber whilest the Duke of Biron dreamt of nothing but his game. Parrenes Lieutenant of his company, making a shew to take vp his cloake, told him in his ear, That hee was vnder. This word troubled him so, as he neglected his game. The Queene observed it and told him, That hee had mis-reckoned himselfe to his owne losse. The King said, That they had played enough, enough, commanding every man to retire. He entered into his Cabinet, and commanded the Duke of Biron to enter with him, whose health or ruine depended vpon an answer pleasing to his Maiefty. Who willed him once for all to declare what hee had done with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes, and that he should assure himselfe, his clemencie should be greater then his fault. The Duke of Biron who beleued that hee deserved death, that demanded life, had not the heart to humble himselfe, nor the tongue to craue pardon. He answered the King more boldly then euer, That they had neuer prest an honest man; and that he neuer had any other designe, then that which he had said: I would to Gods will, replied the King, but you will not tell me: A dieu, good night.

As he goes out of the Cabinet, and had past the Chamber doore, hee met with Vitry, B who layes his hand vpon his sword, and demands it of him by the Kings commandment. From me (said the Duke of Biron) to take away my sword who haue so well serued the King? my sword, who haue ended the warre, and haue sealed a Peace in France? That my sword which my enemies could neuer take from me, should be taken from me by my friends. He intreated the Duke of Montbazon to beseech the King, to giue him leaue to deliuer it into his owne hands. The King sent Vitry charge to doe his commandment. The Duke of Biron was forced to suffer them to take it from him, and in deliuering it, hee cast his eyes about him, to see if he could seize vpon some other, but they had prevented him. When as hee saw all the guard placed in order in the Gallery, he thought they would haue slaine him, and demanded something in his hand, that he might haue the honour to dye in defending himselfe, and some little time to pray vnto God. They answered him; That there was not any man would offend him; that they had no other charge from the King, but to conduct him to his lodging. You see (said he in passing) how they intreat good Catholics.

He was conducted to the Cabinet of Armes, whereas hee neither slept nor lay downe. Pratin went to the Count of Auvergne, declared vnto him the Kings commandment, and demanded his sword; Hold, take it (said the Count, it hath neuer killed any but wilde Boares, if I haue had advertised me of this, I had been in bed and asleepe two houres since. These two Noblemen were like vnto two Torches, which being held downward are quenched with the wax which did nourish them and giue them light. And as if all the Dukes power had beene in his sword, as soone as he had deliuered it, hee remained as a body without a soule, and was in a moment deuiued of all that which Galba held most precious amongst men, faith, liberty and friendship. There came no word out of his mouth but did offend God or the King. He suffered himselfe to be caried away with extreame impatience. The fore-sight of misery which doth moderate it in others, made it insupportable to him, cursing himself and his indiscretion, in that he had not beleued his good friends, who aduised him to make his peace a farre off. This choller in effect was not much vnlike vnto a mad-man, but in the continuance: for suddenly he reclaimed himselfe, and considered that all his cries and words, were not of force to saue him.

Presently dispatches were made to all the Princes and Potentates of Christendome, to Governours of Prouinces, and to Ambassadors, who were amazed at this accident, as of a most odious conspiracy, by a person that was so much obliged. Those which fauoured it, gaue out false brutes in Italy, that it was a blow giuen to Religion, to weaken it in the ruine of him who said that he desired no more glorious title, then to be surnamed the Scurge of Hungarions. That it was an aduice from England to brake the Iuelins one after another. The King would haue these false impressions made cleere by the light of truth, euen when as the passion of his enemies did seeke to obscure it.

One writing out of the Realme vpon this subiect, said, "That it was no question of Religion, but to dismember the Crowne, and to diuide it at the discretion of the Councell of Spaine, and the Duke of Sauoy, rooting out the King and his Race. It may be the Authors and Vnder-takers would haue bene troubled in the execution of their designe, although we had not prevented them, as now we haue. But it was the end whereunto they aspired. The names of many haue bene drawne in vnknewne to them, the which the Kings Iustice might well discerne and verifie: you must not bee moued with the brutes which fly abroad, but beleue what I write vnto you, for it is the very truth. The next day about dinner time, the Duke of Biron sent to tell his Maiefty, "That if hee tooke not order for Bourgundy it was lost, for that as soon as the Baron of Lux, should heare of his imprisonment he would vndoubtedly deliuer Dijon, and Beaune vnto the Spaniard. These words

A did greatly offend the King, who said; Behold the boldnesse and impudency of the Mar- shall Biron, who sends me word, that Bourgundy is lost, if I take not order, and that the Baron of Lux will draw in the Spaniard when he shall heare of his imprisonment. His obstinacie hath vndone him, if he would haue told me the truth of one thing, whereoff I haue proofe by his owne hand writing, he should not be where hee is; I know I had paid two hundred thousand crownes, that he had giuen me means to pardon him: I neuer Ioud any so much as him. I would haue committed my Sonne and Realme into his hands: Hee hath done me good seruice, yet he cannot deny but I haue thrice saued his life. I drew him out of the enemies hands at Fontaine Francoise, so wounded, and so amazed with blowes, B that as I played the fouldier to saue him, I also played the Marshall to make the retreat, for he told me that he was not then in case to doe it, nor to serue me.

The King attended not this advertisement from the Duke of Biron, for hee had already sent the Marshall Lanardin to settle his Authority in that Prouince, with a resolution to march in person if there were need. His enemies were not without feare, doubting that he would proceed farther, nothing being so much to be feared as an enemy that hath alwayes vanquished. About fifteene dayes before, Bourg l'Espinaffe received a Commission to raise a Regiment of ten Companies, and Nereslan had the like to supply his. The order was to send them into Prouence, but needfull had drawne them into Bourgogne, with two Regiments of Suisses, vnder the commands of the Colonels, Galaty and Heyd, and a great quantitie of artillery drawne out of the Arsenall of Paris, and that of Lions, if all the country had not presently yielded obedience to their Prince.

The President Lamin made many voyages thither with great expedition. Some of the Duke of Biron's seruants had a desire to reuolt. The Baron of Lux was retired to Saux, the King sent them word that they must seeke the prisoners liberty by proofes of obedience, and not by effects of rebellion, and that he would iudge of his intentions by the behaviour of his seruants. The townes of Dijon and Beaune intrenched themselves against the Castles, who (acknowledging that it were not onely a rashnesse, but an iniustice to fall from their obedience) deliuered the places into the Marshall Lanardins hands for the King. Breffe continued quiet through the care of Bosse. All France was in peace, euerly man detesting the Duke of Biron, and his adherents.

The King seemed to be very well satisfied, seeing things to succeed better then he expected, having found all obedience and submission in them who in shew were most bold and resolute to trouble his affaires. He was more respected and feared of them then euer, and there was no man so great, but did humble himselfe. He said openly, that he was resolute not to endure his subjects to play any more with their King, abusing his bounty as many had done, contemning his actions as vniustly and rashly as without punishment. The prisoners were led to the Bastile at Paris on the Saturday after. The Duke of Biron going in the boat seemed heauy and pensiu. The Count of Auvergne was merry and dmed. The Duke of Biron entered into the Bastile as into a graue: The Count of Auvergne went E as to the Louvre, and imagined that the place where he should be, could not bee a prison: The King entered into the City the same night, and the people with great cries of joy, blessed his returne, and praised God for their captiuitie that would haue brought France againe into seruitude.

This great Prince who like vnto Augustus neuer thought of the death of the least of his subjects but with sighs, did shew that a father cuts off his members with griefe. Some dayes after a Gentleman coming to doe his dutie to his Maiefty, said vnto him, that he held his life, fortune and honour of him, and that hee came for to doe him homage; to whom the King answered aloud, that he might be vnderstood: I know you well, if they one day should see you, I should not be in the paines I am in. There were new forces, which passed F the Alpes. The Spanish Ambassador demanded passage for Flanders, beseeching the King not to beleue that his Master was acquainted with the Duke of Biron's designs.

There was some likelihood that their iourney was not so farre, for they could not but arrive too late, Count Maurice was entered into Brabant, to passe into Flanders to the relief of Ostend. The Archduke was prepared to hinder him; they must measure their forces, and it was most certaine before this new armie had past the Alpes, they had with This made their marching to be much suspected; and had done more, if the President Lamin had not assured the King, that the Baron of Lux would not giue eare to the offers that that were made him, promising to bring him to the Court, where the King offered him a all surety.

His Maieftie was aduertised that the Count of Fuentes (one of the chiefe instigators of the Duke of Biron's conspiracie with the Duke of Sauoy) had caused his forces to aduance vnder colour of sending them into Flanders, to giue fauour and countenance to his Partifans that were in Bresse and Bourgundy, to incourage them, and to with-draw them from his Maiefties obedience. For these reasons as the Ambassadour of Spaine did pfe to haue the passage vpon the riuier of Rhosne free; the King who beleued that by reason of things past, he could not be too distrustfull, answered, "I wil not leaue the frontier vnarmed, vntill I bee satisfied by the arraignment of the Duke of Biron, what account I shall make of the faith of the King of Spaine your Master, touching the obseruation of the Peace. You will haue me beleue that he was ignorant of plots and practises laid with the Count of Fuentes: and I answer that it is hard to beleue that his money, hath bene so bountifullly employed without his priuity and command: yet I meane not to breake the commerce that is allowed by our treaties. He had only commanded the Marshall Lamar-din to lodge and camp vpon the frontier, to defend the entry of his Estates. D'Albigny hauing bragged; that if he attempted to retrench the passage, hee should soone haue it laid open by Armes. But the Spaniards durst not attempt to passe the bridge of Gréfin, fearing to be repulst and charged, retired to Rumilly and Anicy. In the end the King seeing that they feared more their owne harme, then they had any desire to doe harme, hee suffered them to passe.

The King commands the Marshal Laure-din to campe vpon the frontiers.

The Greue is the public place of execution in Paris.

But to returne to the Duke of Biron; it was a strange thing that hauing consulted with himselfe, whether he should come to Court or not, hee neglected his friends aduice, and tooke the worst resolution. A minde transported with passion, rejects the best reasons, and retaines the most dangerous opinions. Like vnto a boulder which lets the floore passe, and keepe nothing but the Branne. Before his departure from Dijon, they said at Marfeilles that he was taken; and in parting, his friends sent him word that he should leaue his head where he caried it: and that there was no returne for him. Never prisoner was better guarded, with more care, order and vigilancy. The King caused the Duke to bee kept as in his own house, & at liberty. And for that nature hath found no other remedies against the injuries of fortune, and the wearinesse of life, then death, they feared that hee would offer violence to himselfe. And therefore those which kept him, caried no armes, and seeing himselfe serued with a knife without a point, he said, it was the way to the Greue. Scorning death, hee said, that it could not come vnlooked for, to a man well resolved, nor strange to him that hath foreseen it, nor shamefull to a resolute minde. Yet hee found that it is a miserable life not to be able to dye, being deprived of all meanes to aduance death, and to haue no other consolation but in the onely desire of an impossible thing.

He spent the first dayes of his imprisonment, without eating or sleeping. These violent motions of choller, and the heat of his blood, put him into a Feuer, and griefe caried fuming passions vnto his braine, which increased his sicknesse, in the which (as in all other diseases) the feare of death, the paine of his body, and the alteration of his life, did much augment the griefe of his prison. He was some what affraid left vnder colour of remedie, they should giue him poison to cure all his griefes, and therefore hee would haue them take a taste of euery thing, although there were no other assurance of his life, but what his owne conscience could giue him.

His captivity deprived him not of the liberty of speaking. The fire of his courage was not smothered vnder the ashes of this affliction. What said hee? and what said hee not? choller thrust forth a streame of words, in the which there was not a drop of reason. Sometimes he said; That if they desired to put him to death, they should dispatch him; that they should not bragge they had made him to feare death; that they should speedily drinke themselves drunke, with the blood which remained of thirty and five wounds, which hee had receiued for the seruice of France.

It is the nature of great spirits not to be silent for present perils, or the feare of seruitude. They feared that solitarinesse, fasting, melancholy and change of the place would trouble his braine, and thrust him into some furious passion. To pacifie the discontent of his first imprisonment, they perswade him to submit himselfe to the mercy of God, and gaue him hope of the Kings Pardon. The Archbishop of Bourges went to see him, hee disswaded him

His words in prison.

A him from many bad Maximes of conscience, and satisfied him of many points which he held against the purity and integrity of a iust confession: He desired to speake with Pillerey and Sillery, who went to see him by the Kings commandement.

They had told him, or he had learned it in the time of his liberty by the reading of Histories, that the Constable of Saint Paul had bene prisoner in the same place, and desired to see the discoufse. They gaue him Enguerrand of Monstrelet, in whose edition this Tragedy is related. He decciued the time in the reading of Annales, the which hee had amplified if they would haue let him alone. He should haue done better if hee had read them sooner, and had propounded vnto himselfe his fortune, whose dignity he did effect, full of so many accidents as it had bene sufficient to correct his. If he had seene it sooner, he had found precepts, which like vnto a Lanthorne had giuen him light amidst the darknesse of this dangerous navigation, in which he had nothing but his owne ambition for compasse and saile. He should haue knowne that Machiavels counsell (whofaith, that private men rife neuer from a base to a high fortune but by fraud and force) is ruinous, and that humane lawes being grounded vpon diuine, suffer no confusion of designes which that euery one doth limit them by this condition, and that hee knowes that God doth distribute powers for the government of people: That it is alwaies dangerous to play with his Master, and although he suffer him for a time, yet he is like vnto the Lion who suddenly laies hold of him that thought to haue mastered him. The Germanes say, we may not eate cherries with great men, for that they will cast the stones in our eyes if we play the companions with them.

In the beginning of his imprisonment, he talked of nothing but of Iustices; but knowing his fault, he had no hope but in the Kings mercy. Some one published an admonition at Paris, beseeching the King to change the punishment of death into perpetuall imprisonment, that of imprisonment into banishment, and his banishment into an honourable seruitude to make war against the Turke. That if by his offences he did not merit to serue the state, which he sought to ruine, yet hee might serue the generall estate of Christendome.

This Counsell was dangerous, for who could assure the King that he would make war in Hungary? and what caution could be sufficient for France? He had bene more dangerous without it, then within. A burning fire-brand casts more flame and smoake without a chimney, then within it. Hee added moreover, that hee should forbid him the carrying of armes, and tie him from the warre, but if hee should haue made his house his prison, who should haue kept him? if he had designed of reuenge in prison, what would hee haue done at liberty? Many which respect no more the Lawes of Honour, then of Iustice, would haue repayed vnto him, to bring in inevitable mischiefs. There was an intent to faue him. The iron worke was forged in Bresse. The refusal of five hundred crownes, for the Petardier, hindred the execution. As soone as hee was a prisoner, euery one sayd hee was a dead man: and seeing himselfe so carefully guarded, hee said; That they did not put birds of his sort into a cage, to suffer them to escape. Hee made that iudgement of himselfe, which the Admirall did of the Earles of Egmont and Horne, when he heard they were prisoners: when they once come to accuse and imprison a man of courage and faction, it is more dangerous to absolue him then to condemne him.

The King sent his Letters to the Parliament, to proceed in the criminall and extraordinary proceffe of the Duke of Biron, according to the formes which are to be obserued in crimes of so great importance, against persons of his quality: all other affaires set aside. The Commissioners appointed for the King, were Achilles de Harley first President in the Court of Parliament at Paris. Nicholas Potier second President and Councillor of State to his Maiesty. Stephen Fleury and Philibert of Thurin, Councillors of the Parliament, good Iudges, but not to be moved in crimes of State. Informations were taken at the Bastille. The prisoner made some ceremonies to answer, but being entered into discoufse, hee gaue the Commissioners matter ynough to worke on, confessing in a manner all. From his answers alone, they might haue framed his condemnation, saying ynough to make him lose as many liues as hee had yeeres. Hee had to ill gouerned his iudgement in his prosperity, as it did him no seruice during his imprisonment: yielding some-times vnto griefe, some-times vnto choller, and alwaies to indifferency, speaking as much to ruine himselfe, as to discharge him. He was confronted with the witnesses face to face; but when as he did see La Fin, he fell into an extreame shaking. A

The first President asked the Prisoner, if he would except any thing against La Fin. He answered, That he held him for a Gentleman of honour, his friend, and his Kinsman. But when he had heard his deposition, he cried out against him as the most execrable man in the world, appealing to all the powers of heaven and earth to iustifie his innocency. La Fin grieved that he should hold him for a slanderer (a name common to all wicked men) said unto him; That he was sorry they were in a place where the one was allowed to speake all, and the other was forced to heare all. He maintained all he had said against him, and spake more plainly of his conspiracy, then in his deposition. The Prisoner said, That if Renaze were there, he would auerre the contrary: He was brought before him, whereat he was much amazed to see him, whom he held to be dead; & who was out of his remembrance as in another world. He then beleued that the Duke of Sauoy had set him at liberty to ruine him, he felt his conscience toucht, when as all things conspired to his condemnation. An admirable iudgment of Gods secret Iustice in this escape of Renaze. Mens intentions produce contrary effects. Hee was detained prisoner at Quiers in Piedmont, to the end he should not discover this practice; he escapes from his guard, and comes to fortifie his Masters deposition, who else had beene but one witness.

He is amazed to see Renaze
whom he held to be dead.

No man dares
sue for him.

Hee had many friends, but not to iustifie his innocency, as Plato saith; That many friends is a signe of wisdom, and want of them shewes the contrary: There were none that durst presume to sue for his libertie or pardon. The King had made this attempt so detestable & C odious to the Princes and Noblemen of the Court, and the meanes to execute it so execrable, as all his friends were silent: there were some that said; That for any other crime, yea, if he had killed a Prince in the Kings Cabinet, they would haue begged his pardon, and would haue sacrificed their children to the Kings Iustice for an expiation of the offence, rather then to lose him. But in this act, friendship was conspiracy, and intercession a crime. His friends went to Saint Maur where the King was: they cast themselves at his Maiesties feet to implore his mercy, and to moderate the severity of his Iustice, more in consideration of his father, then for any respect of the sonnes seruices, which could not equal his fault.

The King said, That it was a matter of such importance for his Estate, as he was constrained to leaue it to the course of Iustice; that to haue attempted against him who was his King, and his benefactor, was insupportable; that he could not remit this crime but he must ruine himselfe, the Queene his wife, his Sonne, and his Estate. That hee knew they were such true hearted Frenchmen, that as they desired not the one, so they would haue patience for the other. They hauing knowne the foulness of the fact, and the reasons which forced clemency to yeeld vnto Iustice, abandoned the pursuit. The Countesse of Rouilly solicited the Court: The Prisoners mother was not there. The King commanded the Court of Parliament to proceede to iudgment without any intermission.

A Peere cannot be iudged but
by his Peeres.

The Prisoner was a Peere of France, the Barony of Biron being made a Duchy and a Peere by the King. A Peere cannot be iudged but by the King and his Peeres, but the King is neuer present when he is a party, and that the accusation of the party concerns his person, his honour, or his Estate. And although the order of the ancient Peeres be more in number then by the first institution, for that of the six secular Peeres, five are vniued vnto the Crowne, and the sixth doth no more obey the King, yet the new created enjoy the same priuiledges and prerogatives that the ancient did, and the last, although he be about the number, shall not be iudged but by his Peeres, but may assist at the iudgment of another Peere, and haue his voice as well as the Duke of Burgundy, who is the Deane of the Peeres, yea, the wifes, whose lands are erected into Payries, or that hold it by succession may assist. Mabilla Countesse of Arthois, was called a Peere of France, & deliuered her opinion with the other Peeres at the iudgment of Robert Earle of Arthois. But if the Peeres being called doe not appeare, they may proceed. The Peeres of France were called to the Arraignment of the Duke of Biron, they appeared not.

The Peeres
could not.

The Court forbears not to proceed notwithstanding their absence. All the Chambers being assembled, the Chancellor accompanied by Mailles and Pontcarre (two Counsellors of the State) entered into the Parliament, two Sergeants at arms, & some officers of the Chancery going before him. He was receiued at the entering of the Barre by two ancient

A ancient Counsellor, and being saluted by the Court, he set him down in the Presidents place, hauing deliuered the Kings intention; and his assurance of the integrity and wisdom of the Court; vpon an occasion importing the State, and vpon a foule crime in a person other waies recommended for his seruices, he made a signe to Stephen Henry the Reporter of the Proceesse to begin. This was done for want of the Peeres. A request was made in the Prisoners name, that it would please the Court to allow him Councillors, to direct him in the forties of their proceeding, whereof he was as ignorant, as he had let all France know how well he vnderstood the art of War. De la Guesle, the Kings Attourney Generall, being heard vpon this request, and Servin the Soliciter Generall speaking for him, he said; That although this request seemed to be grounded vpon some presidents, for that the King had beene granted vnto the Prince of Conde, yet there was great diuersity, & many considerations for the denying of this. Their opinions being giuen, it was rejected. His request rejected. Cicero pleaded for Rabirius, and Anthony for Narbonus, but there is no Advocate admitted for crimes of State: Counsell depends vpon the conscience of him that is accused, his defence must come from his owne innocency; and hee may well free himselfe from blame, without the mediation of any man, and without the helpe of an Advocate. They which are accused of crimes must plead for themselves.

If he be innocent, truth will confound all the practices of his accusers. If he be guilty, there is no excuse nor euasion but his guiltiness will appeare. It is not lawfull to defend the wicked, and good men haue no need of defence. They spent three sittings to examine the informations; which done, the conclusions of the Attourney General were read and followed. There rested nothing but to heare the Prisoner and to call him before the Parliament.

While they were viewing of the Proceesse, one had set vp a discourse vpon the Palace gate, to moue the Iudges to pity, and that they should not punish the weakness of Adam for the Serpents subtilty. The Lord of Montigny came vnto the Bastille about foure of the clocke in the morning; the Prisoner who alwaies slept little (holding sleepe to bee no life) was already vp and at his deuotion: he would not trouble him in so necessary an action, but staid vntill he had done. Entering into his Chamber, he told him the occasion of his comming, that the Court was assembled for his Proceesse; that the Lord Chancellor was there, and had commanded him to bring him: Hee seemed a little troubled, although he had beene aduertised that he should be sent for. Being ready, hee goes out of the Bastille, thinking neuer to returne, and that they drew him out of the cares of Captivity, to lead him vnto the darkness of death, and that he left the prison to lose his life. He was conducted in the Marquis of Rosnies Carrosse, through the Arsenall to the *Ri*uers side; where he entered into a boat couered with Tapistry, in which the Kings guards were, the Chief Approaches, the Ports, the Greue, and the Towne-houfe, were manned with Suisses. Hee entered into the Palace by the first Presidents garden, and went to rest himselfe in one of the Chambers, vntill he were sent for, presenting him a breakfast before he entered.

E The houre being come, the Register went to call him, and he entered into the golden Chamber: The place whereas strangers haue come to implore Iustice of the King; whereas great Kings haue held it an honour to haue a place: where he himselfe had sat, and beene honoured with the most glorious title of vertue: whereas one of the Kings Solicitors had said; That Biron had none before him to imitate, that hee could imitate none but himselfe, and that he made himselfe inimitable to them that should come after him. This place I say, shining with the beames of the Kings Iustice, made him to remember the change of his condition, the which forced him somewhat to blush: an accident which happens to the most assured. These Scarlet Roabes doe more amaze him then all the red caffackes of Spaine, or the most fierce encounters of his enemies. He had no other place then that which was appointed for men accused, being set vpon a stole within the Barre, but finding himselfe too far off to heare, or to be heard, he rose vp and carried his stole nearer, saying vnto the Chancellor, Excuse my Lord, I cannot heare you, except you speake louder. When the Duke of Alancou was examined before the King, and in open Court, he was set in the midst of the Hall vpon a low stoole; the Constable of Luxembourg, the Duke of Nemours, and the Chancellor of Poyet, were set within the Barre, like to the Duke of Biron. Hee sat with his Cloake vnder his right arme, holding his hand sometimes by his side; after a brauing manner, the which notwithstanding did not become him ill, having his arme free to lift vp his hand to heaven, and strike his breast, when he would protest of his loyalty to the Kings service. They would not have allowed it in another, being expected that men accused should shew humility outwardly, and feare inwardly.

In this Estate the Duke of Biron thought, that in this great Senate he should finde some one that would doe for him as Sempronius Gracchus had done for Scipio: that hee would speake openly, that hee would neuer endure the Common-weale should receive that disgrace to see Scipio set in the ranke and habite of men accused for crimes. He whom the Court had seene sit vpon the Flower-de-luce, in recompence of the seruices he had done. The Chancelor fired his discourse in such sort, as there was no occasion to call him by his name, nor by those of his qualities. Of many points that were in his processe, he collected five principall, the rest consisted in presumptions, whereof he made no account, for that we must neuer moue the opinion of the Iudges vpon a matter without proofe.

Accusations of the Duke of Biron.

The first was, to haue had conference with one Picote, borne at Orleans, and fled into Flanders, to haue intelligence with the Archduke, and had giuen him a hundred and fifty crownes for two voiaiges to that effect.

The second was, That he had treated with the Duke of Sauoy three daies after his coming to Paris, without the Kings permission, offering him all assistance and seruice against all men, vpon hope of marriage with his third daughter.

The third, That he had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy in the taking of Bourg & other places, giuing him aduice to attempt against the Kings armie, and against his owne person, discouering many things of importance.

The fourth was, That he would haue brought the King before S. Katherine's fort to be slain there, and to that end had written to the Governour, giuing him some tokens whereby he should know his Maiesty.

The fifth was, that he had leet La Fin to treat with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes. The D. of Biron denied all that he had conselt at his first examination, holding it no danger to suppress the truth, when as confession may hurt.

The Duke of Biron answer.

To the first the D. of Biron answered, That Picote being his prisoner in the Franche Country, and knowing that he was acquainted with Capitaine La Fortune (who was his friend) he thought he might employ him for the reduction of the towne of Sourre, wherein he vied such diligence, as the place was assured for his Maiesties seruice: that since this reduction he had not seene Picote but in Flanders, when as he went for the confirmation of the Peace, where he came vnto him with some others, intreating him to be an Intercessor for them vnto the King, that they might returne vnto their goods, and liue in their owne houses, promising him for recompence of his intercession two suits of Tapistry, the which he reiected with some spleene, for that they sought to buy his fauour, and for that they desired from him an assurance for their returne, he sent them to the Lords of Belieure and Sillery, who knew what was fittest for them, and the forms that were to be observed for their returne. That it was true that Picote had receiued 150 crowns of him, but not for any other respect, but for the charges he had bene at in the reduction of Seurre, hauing often intreated him and prest him by many letters, to haue pity on him as one that was banished from his house and Country, hauing borrowed this sum to beare his charges in this reduction. That hee had put it to account in certaine summes which hee disbursed for the Kings seruice, and that he neuer had any other busines or conference with him.

To the second he answered, That he came to Paris fiftene daies after the Duke of Sauoyes arriual there, that La Fin who accused him, came after him. That it was true, the King dining at Conflans, and the Duke of Sauoy with him, after dinner the King retiring into his Wardrobe, he commanded the Count of Auvergne and him to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy: That the Count of Soissons, and the Duke of Montpensier coming into the chamber, he gaue them place, & went into the Wardrobe, and the Kings parties gaue him drinke, and presently after went to Paris. That vpon some speech which Renaud the Dukes Secretary had with him touching the marriage of his Highnes third daughter, he acquainted the King therewith, who hauing since giuen him to vnderstand by La Force, that he bid not like thereof, he had no more dreamt of it. And in token that hee had no intelligence with the Duke, nor will to conspire with any of his, the King hauing commanded

A commanded him to accompany him in his returne, and to shew him the strongest towne in Bourgogne, he had excused himselfe, beseeching his Maiesty to dispenche with him, foreseeing that the Duke would not effect the treaty, and that hee should be grieved to make war against a Prince, whom he had accompanied, and made good cheare vnto. Adiuising the Baron of Lux to conduct him through the weakest towne, and not to giue him any time to view their fortifications.

To the third, that hee had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, in the conquest of the country of Bresse, giuing him aduice to attempt against the Kings army: He answered, That if he had had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, hee would not haue vnderderraken Bourg, against the Kings opinion, being not assisted by any, but such as were ordinarily with him. That the Gouvernors of places (who were then the Dukes subiects and now the Kings) could witness if there were any fauour vfed, and if in making war he had any other object, but the execution of his Maiesties commandements, that if hee had had any bad intent, he had not yielded vp Bourg so easily as hee did.

To the fourth, vpon the aduice giuen to the Governour of Saint Katherine's fort, to kill the King. He beseecheth his Maiesty to remember, that he alone did dissuade, and diuert him from going to view the fort, giuing him to vnderstand, that there were very good Gunners in the place, and that he could not goe without great danger. That vpon this aduice, his Maiesty altered his purpose, saying, that if he desired to see the place, he would bring him a plot of it the next day, offering his Maiesty to take it with five hundred Harquebuziers, and that he himselfe would goe vnto the assault.

To the fifth, That he had treated with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes, by the mediation of La Fin: He answered, That being denied the keeping of the Citadell of Bourg, he grew into that despaire, as he had desired to be all covered with blood, being capable to say or to do any thing. At these words the Chancelor asked him, With what blood he desired to be covered? With mine owne, answered the Prisoner, willing to liue no longer after this refusal, and I would haue engaged my selfe in such sort among the enemies, as I would haue died there, or would haue returned all covered with blood: That for two months space he had written and spoken more then he ought, but hee had not omitted to doe well. He added moreover, that La Fin had bewitched him with enchanted waters, and by speaking Images, as hee was forced to submit himselfe to his will: That he spake not vnto him, but in secret and vnknown words, calling him his Master, his King, his Prince, his Lord. And scratching his left eare, he spake execrable things against La Fin, to moue the Court, nor to regard his accusation and testimony. He that had not seene the fact verified by his owne letters, would haue said it was Plister accusation, forging false letters from Priam to Palamedes. He still fled to his pardon, saying that hauing done nothing since, the Kings clemency should remit his fault, and that if hee must implore it once more, he had his knees as supple as euer to doe it. The Chancelor said vnto him, that he had written a letter vnto La Fin since the Dauphins birth; by the which he did aduertise him, that seeing it had pleased God to send the King a sonne, hee would no more dreame of those vanities, desiring him to returne, and if hee had not employed him he would not haue written.

This letter was produced to shew the continuance of his bad designs, whereof hee made vieto iustifie himselfe and to shew his repentance, saying alwaies that he had done well, although he had some thought of doing ill.

The Chancelor said vnto him, that seeing he felt his conscience to cleare, and knowing that he had done nothing, why did he not lay himselfe more open vnto the King, who sought him with great affection at Fontainebleau, to tell him the truth of that which hath bene since discouered by the processe. He wavered at this demand, saying: That he did not thinke the King had knowne any thing of that which passed betwixt him and La Fin, for that he had assured him by oaths & feartull cusses, that he had said nothing that might hurt him. That hauing conferred with a religious man of the order of the Minimes, he knew (hauing past his word with an oath to La Fin, neuer to discouer what had past betwixt them) he might with a safe conscience say any thing. Hee had answered him: That seeing there was no more any intent to execute the things that were in discourse betwixt them, hee ought not to reueale them: That this resolution continued so constant in his minde, that although the Archbishop of Bourges had visited him in prison, 1602 "and had giuen him many reasons to free him from these scruples, yet hee held it an act vnworthy of a man to falsifie his oath, and that it was only fit for a soule hardened with Atheisme (the spring of all impiety) to sweare with an intent to circumvent. Here his speech failed him with the violence of his griefe, but recovering his spirits, hee spake these words:

"My misfortune hath this consolation, that my Iudges are not ignorant of the seruices which I haue done to the King and Realme, and with what loyalty I haue caried my selfe in the greatest and most important affaires, to restore the King vnto the Realme, and the Realme vnto the King: to preferre the lawes of State, and to settle you in this place, from the which the Saturnales of the League had expelled you. This body (whereof you hold the life and death in the disposition of your Iustice) hath no veine which hath not bene opened, and which I would not willingly open for you. This hand which did write the letters which are now produced against me, is the same which hath done the contrary to that which it hath written. It is true, I haue written, I haue said, and I haue spoken more then I ought, but no man can shew that I haue done ill. And there is no law that punisheth the lightnesse of a simple word, or the motions of the thought with death: my words haue bene alwaies feminine, but the effects of my courage masculine. Choller and despaire haue made me capable to say all, and to doe all, but reason would not suffer me to doe any thing, but what deserved praise and imitation. I haue had bad designs, but they neuer past my thought: at the same instant they sprang vp they were smothered. If I had bene desirous to nourish and make shew of them, I haue had great means and occasions. I could haue done bad seruice to the King, in England and in Swisserland. There are aboue a hundred Gentlemen that can witness of my behaviour in the first Ambassage: & for the second, I desire no other testimony but that of the Seigneurs of Sillery and de Vic, who know in what manner, and with what fidelity I employed my selfe, to reconcile and vnit to many wils disioyned and withdrawne from the Kings alliance. If you will consider how I came, and in what estate I left the places of Bourgoigne, it will be impossible to haue any bad conceit of my designs. They found not a man of war in my government. I haue left the places without Garisons. I haue giuen the Captaines no other commandement but to serue the King well, and to do that only whereunto they are bound.

"Euery man aduised mee not to come to Court. I met a Foot-man by the way, who brought me a letter from one of my dearest friends, who coniured me not to aduance. Being arriued, my Sister of Rouilly sent me another, aduising me to be gone without asking of my leaue: I shewed it to a Gentleman that was with me, who said vnto me, That he would willingly be stabbed in the bosome so as I were at Dijon. I answered, That if I were there, and were sure to receive a hundred stabs at the Court, yet would I come vpon the Kings word. A guilty minde and prest with horror of his conscience, had fallen in peeces with feare and trembling, and would haue embraced another party. The secret knowledge I had of my loyalty, and the innocency of my designs, could not giue me any imagination of distrust: I alwaies said within my selfe, I haue serued the King too well, to haue a thought that he should not account me his seruant. The King hath had too many proofes of my faith, to suspect my loyalty. I could not comprehend, that the Kings Iustice could touch a man, resting in the tranquility of his Conscience, and in the expectation of his commandements. Moreover, I was assured that the King had pardoned me, and that I had not offended him since his pardon. I cannot deny, that I told him not all that had past in this action, but in saying vnto him, that the refusal of the Citadell of Bourg made me capable to say and doe any thing, I did thinke it was not needfull to specifie that which I was ashamed to haue attempted, and that the consideration of the good which I had done vnto the King in his seruice, should alwaies weigh downe the euill that I would haue done, and the which I haue repented. That if he hath not giuen me life, but to put me to death, he must consider, that it is more commendable for a Prince to giue it, then to take it away from him to whom hee hath giuen it, and that his clemency shines neuer more clearly, then vpon offences that concerne himselfe. If it please not the King to regard my seruices, and the assurances which he hath giuen me of his mercy, I confesse my selfe worthy of death, & hope for no health in his Iustice, but in yours; hoping you will remember better then he doth, the dangers I

A haue vndergone all my life for his seruice. I implore his mercy, and although I should not say any thing, yet the wounds which I beare would speake for mee. I hope for it the more confidently, for that it hath neuer bene refused to them that haue done worse then my selfe. I would haue done euill, but my will did neuer passe the termes of their first conception, being ouercast with the clouds of choller and despaire. It were hard if I should bee the first President to bee punished for thinking. Not that I feare death, the which I hold to bee ordayned, not as a punishment, but for the end of Nature, and that it imports nothing to leaue this life in the middle of my course, if it were with as much honour, as I haue had in the beginning. My fault is great, but it was only in conceit and not executed: in desire and not in effect. Great offences must haue great fauours. I am hee alone in France, which feels the rigour of Iustice and cannot hope for the merit of Mercy. Whatsoeuer chanceth, I relye more vpon you my Masters then in the King: who hauing heretofore regarded mee with the eyes of his loue, looks no more on me now but with choller, and holds it a vertue to be cruell vnto mee, and a vice to vse any act of clemency towards mee. It had bene better for mee that he had not pardoned me at the first, then to giue me life and then to make mee lose it with shame and dishonour.

"They gaue him leaue to speake what he pleased, the Chancellor holding it reasonable, that seeing he had no counsell to aduise him what he should say, they should in regard thereof giue him time to speake all, and hearing, to consider his reasons, and the variety of his first answers with the last, in the which there were great contradiction. Those which are accused of any crime take it for a fauour to be heard patiently vnto the end: although for the most part they doe but increase the reasons of their punishments. He spake so boldly and so eloquently, as if a man should iudge of the fauour of a discourse by the attention, there was not any one of long time heard with greater patience in that place. Some shed teares in the place and wept in their houses, for pity, not of his innocency (for that appeareth not) but of his fortune so miserably deferred. Heat is more naturall to a man then cold; and mildnesse more then rigor: but he could expect nothing but Iustice from this great Assembly. It was impossible that passion, fauor or respect, should alter the integrity of their iudgements. The opinions of some weake spirits may be moued, who regard more the apparence, then the essence of things, and which beleuee not the harme vntill they seele it, or that the fire is hot, vntill it burne them. But to blinde so many graue heads from seeing of the truth, it was an enterprize of too great difficulty. A little water may be poysoned, but not a whole Riuer.

The prisoners discourse was so long, as they had no time to giue their opinions. Hee was sent backe to the Bastille, returning more cheerfully then hee came, for as in going forth of the Bastille to the Palace, he imagined that he went to his death, so seeing himself brought backe, he conceived that he returned to life. And for that he had answered the Chancellor to all his demands, and had moued some of his Iudges to lament his misfortune, many to detest his accuser; and all to wish that the fowlenesse of his offence, and the good of the State would allow of his pardon: He thought that he had so ballanced their opinions, as mercy should preuaile aboue rigour. Hee therefore neuer ceased all Saturday, Sunday and Munday, to relate vnto the Captaines, and to the guard, that kept him, all that had bene demanded of him, what hee had answered, and how brauely and discreetly he had satisfied all: adding withall, that he did imagine hee saw the Chancellors countenance going out of the great Chamber: he did counterfeit him in his stayednesse and the grauity of his words, fit for a man of his age and quality, imagining that he spake in this manner; Behold a wicked man; he is dangerous in the State, we must dispatch him, by despatching his death. Which words neuer came out of his mouth, hauing caried himselfe very respectfully in this Arraignement, hauing neuer pronounced that word of Death: but in concluding the iudgement. And therein he alwaies vsed some words to qualifie his griefe in the Image of his affliction, more then of his innocency, vnable to forget the remembrance of the good that was past, or the feeling of the present euill. These were the last sirs of the prisoners hope, the which finding no solid body, did run after the shadowes of his imagination, and flattered him so pleasantly, as he thought not to die, saying, That they could not supply his place, if he were dead. Nothing among all them that thought themselves so capable, great wants and imperfections. Yet in all these excuses hee had nothing

Sometimes he would say, It is possible, that the King should be so waine, as to make him to apprehend death, and to think to terrifie him therewith. But he conceited of things according to his imagination, the which was not answerable to the truth.

The judgment of the proceſſe. On Munday the Chancellor returned to the Palace to determine on his ſentence. They continued untill two of the clocke in the afternoon in giving of their opinions. They were drawne from one principle of truth, as many times are from one center, and did concur all in one reſolution conformable to the conſolutions of the Kings Attourney general. That it was juſt, neceſſary and poſſible to quench theſe burning flames of ambition in the blood of the Duke of Biron, if they would not ſee the Realm in combustion.

opinions. A whole day, and a good part of the night would have been spent, if every one had given a reason of his opinion, those of the great Chamber onely, and the Presidents of the In-quizzes spake what they would. This subject is like unto a great and thicke Forest, they know not what tree to choofe: it is so full and so rich, as abundance of reasons troubles

Principall reasons of their opinions. The choise: And these were the chiefe. There was a concurrence of a great crime and great merit. All France was a witness of the one: and of the other the truth was apparent. The proofes which are required to discouer a secret crime are here made perfect. Proofe by mouth, and the prisoners answer. Proofe by writings, letters and instructions. Proof by the deposition of witnesses, against whom he hath obiected no exception, which might impugn ether which they said and maintained.

By these three sorts of proofs we see that monstrous attempt against the Kings person verified, and that furious conspiracy to trouble his Estate, and to make it a prey to his enemies, and both the one and the other doth make the prisoner guilty of high treason in the first and second degree. He confesseth that hee would ill, that his intent was written and imparted to others, and yet he neuer did ill. That it neuer past his thought. That thoughts are not to be punished as hee said. That the desire to steale makes not a theefe: It is true, but the guilt of treason is so detestable, as the intent how farre to enee from the execution, is punished and required for the effect. Repenraunce which follows after, and changeth the designe, may well serue for the offence, but it helpes nothing for the punishment.

In treason the intent is punishable.

son. A Gentleman having attempted to kill King Francis the first, repented, and revealed it in his confession, yet being accused by his Confessor, he lost his head. As the respect of the Image of God, graven in the Majesty of Kings, frees them from all lawes made by men, so the dignity of their persons doth warrant them from all enterprises and conspiracies of humane malice, the which dares not once thinke so put them in practice against their Images, much lesse against their persons. The proofe of an intent, although it were not resolved nor determined, goes not unpunished, which passeth often times vnto things without life. To houses, images, althes, yea, and to the memory it selfe. This crime troubleth the dead, thirty or forty yeares after their funerals; for that is not extinct in dying, but (the which is contrary to common sense and naturall humanity) they punish the child, the wife, and the family, for the fathers offence, being a contagious Leprosie; and the contagion to all his race. The father cannot excuse his Sonne. And the Senator Fabius was commended to haue put his Sonne to death; for that he had beene one of Cathilins conspiracy. Let him then plead no more, that hee hath done no euill; it sufficeth that he would haue done it. Lawes are not made for bad actions onely, but for Counsels also, and resolutions. His intent began the crime; occasion had ended it, if hee had not bene prevented. If hee had done no other euill, but to give eare to the promises and persuasions of the enemies, hee were guiltie. For in matters of State, the subtil cannot dispose of his point of his will; without the permission of his Princes. We must not stay till venomous beasts haue bitten, and then kill them, nor Traitors inuent executed, before we discouer the offence. It is then too late to iudge of the crime, but to complaine of indifferen- tion; their they seek no more reliefe from Law, but they flie to Armes. It is not shew time to accuse and to punish, but to weepe and to die. The City of Rome laboured in time to resist Cæsar, when as hee had subverted the lawes, vsurped the Dictatorship, and terrified all Italy with the brunt of his forces. If they should haue stayed vntill the prisoners had executed his desires, there had bene no talking of liberte nor of State. You must not stay till the wound be made, and then ready to fall, you must and doe stop it, and repair it.

A like time. It is a misery: (sayd the Emperour Damian) when they will not beleue a conspiracy againe Princes, untill they be slaine by the Conspirators. Now that God by a singular worke of his prouidence hath discouered this conspiracy, it toucheth the health of the State; and the honour of the Court, to punish these Conspirators. Reason requires that the example may make men wot how execrable this offence is, for the which it is lawfull to torment the dead, and terrifie them that bee liuing, to make the children partakers of their Fathers punishment, and to assure them rather of miserie then of life, that the world might haue more horror of his wickednesse then feare of his punishment. The Kings Clemencie hath had his turne, how Iustice must take here, making her authority to be heard and admired like vnto the sea, which is more admiued when the waues are swollen and riſen vp to the clouds, then when it is calme and still. But they consider the quality and merit of the prisoner. First, Iustice hath her eyes blinded, and shut from all diſcretions, but that it holds the offence greater in a great person, then in a meane, and by this proportion, the punishment must be greater. The faults of meane men are hidden in the multitude, their fortune and reputation is one thing. Those which raised to great places, doe good or harme by the example of their good or bad actions, are they which are knowne and discouered to all men.

In matters of rebellion and crimes of State, they regard not what is past, they looke only to the present, and what they may expect hereafter: the most vertuous actions yield to the violence of the bad. The accused hath served the King, it was his duty, he hath bene recompensed. He hath attempted against his service, therein hee hath done what hee ought not. The offence and the punishment are twins: at the same instant that hee hath offended, he drawes vpon him the rigour of punishment. If with Antipater, hee hath cried vpon his body the markes of vertue, there is nothing now to bee done but signes of infidelity in his heart. His meritis haue mounted to the greatnesse of the first dignities of France, his ill desertings cast him downe with shame, and shew him to bee vnworthy of those excellent degrees of honour. Good service cannot enter into compassion with bad, nor crimes in parallel with meritis. The offence which is greater then the service, changeth the bond of recompence into punishment. Hee that helpes to build a house, deserves much of the owner, but when he sets fire to it, all the remembrance of his good which he hath done vanishes away. The accused hath had a good share in the restoring of the State, but since he would haue undermined it, and ruined the foundations, he hath praised to make it a prey to the enemy, they can no more returne to that which he hath done, they iudge what he would haue done, and shall haue no other esteeme or reparation, but as an Ariflas, a Nahor or a Gatlin. Hee hath bene profitable to the State, it is true. But he hath offended against the Lawes of State. Their preservation is so necessary, as it were better to lose the most profitable members in an Estate, then to suffer them to be violated: for in putting them to death, it doth but decrease the number of valiant men, but in suffering them to liue, you doe wrong vnto the Lawes, and thereby ruine the quiet of the State. Hee hath done well for the preservation of the State: it is true. But he that seeks to destroy what he hath preserved, makes himselfe an enemy, and the remembrance of his well deserving lies in the injury which he would haue done to the whole body. He hath begun well, but he ended ill. All actions are censured by the end. If hee belee, (that is to say) Constancy and firmnesse, had not failed in Achilles, hee had bene immorall. It is not sufficient for a man to begin to doe well, if hee desists in the middle, and continues so to the end? Who did hee better at Rome then Manlius, the onely preseruer of the Capitoll against the Gauls? and who was more severely punished then hee, whom they cast downe headlong from the Capitoll, for his factions and mutinies?

¶ If were a crime not to serve the Prince, was it not execrable to hinder, and to conspire against his service? As the services done by the accused, cannot be compared with his offences, for his quality cannot moderate his punishment. Justice hath no eyes to regard a Dukes Crowne, a Marshall of France his staffe, nor a blaw riband. All these are no prerogatives, but that he which attempts to trouble the State, shall be held an enemy to the Majesty of the Prince; and the publicke good. Great men are greatly punished. Dignities aggravate the offence upon him that is bound not to offend. The greater the bond is, the more execrable is the ingratitude.

There

Enuill unpunished is sufficient.

A pardon extends but to confession.

A Prince cannot be liberall of his subjects blood.

There is no Gentleman in France more bound vnto his Prince, then the accused. If duties, and bonds, hold no place in the affections of subiects to their Prince, to what Altar shall they goe to seeke assurance of faith? Must not the King in these continuall doubts of disloyalty, trust the guard of his Person vnto strangers, as Leuis the 11 did vnto the Scottishmen. And finding no religion nor confidence among men, trust vnto beasts, as Masius did? God is offended when a respect of the quality withholdeth the course of Iustice, and threatens that Estate with ruine, when they suffer a wicked subiect to liue. Abraham felt the heauie hand of his wrath, for that he saved the life of Rebecca. As this furious desire of soueraigne command, troubles all the considerations of Nature, Friendship, and Duty: so in punishing them wee must neither regard the respect of blood, the remembrance of seruices, nor the motions of friendship. The offence is so great a consequence to dissembles it. Hee that doth not punish an euill, allowes of it. But they say it hath beene pardoned, that wee must not open a wound which hath been closed vpon. Kings and Fortune doe often pardon, to punish them more severely that haue abused their pardon. The prisoner confesseth that he did not say all, and a pardon cannot extend, but to those things that haue beene mentioned and confessed, the greatest part of the offence hath remained in the will of the repentant, hee hath confessed but as little as hee might. There was a difference betwixt him that did pardon, and him that demanded pardon. The King pardoned to the end hee should not fall into a relapse of his former faults: and he demanded pardon that he might offend more safely. It appears by his confession, and by that which he hath said in the face of the court, when as he was demanded why hee had not discovered his offences freely vnto the King, when as hee gaue him so great assurance to forget it. He answered, that hee did not thinke La Fin had sayd any thing, and that he had kept his word, hauing confirmed it with great oaths, what if hee had acquainted him with that which he had discovered to the King, hee would haue cast himselfe at his Maiesties feet as readily as hee did to craue pardon. There was then something betwixt them that was neuer pardoned: They which offend doe often misrecon the time, seeking to excuse their fault. The conference of times discovers the continuance of intents. The pardon was in January, and after September hee writes, That seeing it hath pleased God to giue the King a Dauphin, hee would no more thinke of those vanities: and La Fin adds, that there was a biller of a contrary tenor, that the negotiation was continued, and that the King had no knowledge thereof from the prisoner. The pardon should haue drawne him to repentance, and not to ingage him in new treacheries, the which could not be remitted nor pardoned, for that hee had offended often without punishment. He must not continue his errors, the last payes for all the precedent. The Court allowes not of this pardon in a crime that is beyond all pardon, and whereof the abolishment depends not of the King, who may not bee prodigall of his subjects blood, nor bring the health of all in generall in danger for one in particular. This reason moued Alexander to put Philotas to death, being giuen so vnderstand, that if hee pardoned him, hee would make him able to attempt new treasons against him, when as he should not be in his power to pardon him. A pardon doth not change the bad intent of a mighty malefactor. This Philotas knew well, that they which had exhaled all mercy, and drawne it dry, hauing no more hope, did run headlong into despair. That there are benefites which are odious, for that hee bluntheth to confesse the cause, and to acknowledge himselfe debtor for his life to any one. Alexander had enemies enough abroad, he had no need of any at home, and assuring his Estate of these, hee needed not to feare the rest. Kings like vnto Physicians must know the diseases of their States, the accidents that are past, the present, and the future, and employ Iustice as a drugges, the which is good for them that be sicke, and may profit others before the disease hath actually seized on them.

There remains one only consideration, that the Duke of Biron may doe great seruice, and that it is not impossible but he may returne to the way of his first innocency. There is lesse harme not to beleue it, then to beleuee it. Wee must not vpon an vncertaine that is to come, neglect the remedie of a present mischiefe. There is more trouble to absolute him, and more danger to set him at liberty, then to put him to death. He is not likely to doe any more good: we can expect nothing but reuenge from his courage. There is no more any Enrico Camillus who changed his exile into a bond vnto his Country that had

Qui sine virtute non sine praefectis, prout exemplum.

A had banished him. Serpents seeme dead in winter, the cold keeps them from hurting: but when as the Sunne recouers his forces, they spend their venom. The prisoners had intents might sleepe for a time, but it should bee to awake againe and neuer to leaue the State at rest. He that can neuer profit by his vertue nor his loyalty, must profit by his example. These were the reasons of the Court, vpon the which by a general consent a sentence of death was concluded against the Duke of Biron. There were few in condemning him but said, that it was fit to arraigne La Fin, and giue warrant to apprehend him, and that it was impossible he should be cleane from the slime which he had handled, and that if the affaires of Spaine (which is like vnto the Temple of Hecatompedon, the which goes forward in words and not in workes) had beene answerable to the vehemency of their affection, he had sayd nothing. The King was aduertised thereof, who assured La Fin by his letters, that he would neuer endure that so great a seruice done to the Crowne, should be his ruine. It was reason, for if the Ancients did appoint Honors for beasts, that had done any seruice to the Common-weale, they should be no lesse thankfull vnto a Gentleman that had saued his Country. Whosoever discouers a Conspiracy against the sacred and inuolable person of the Prince, ought to be rewarded by the publike. So was Vindictus by the Romans. Princes loue them for a while that haue done some great villanies for their seruice, the which is soone turned into deadly hatred, lothing to looke on them, for that their presence doth reproach them with the wronging of their conscience. But this happens not to him who without any instigation of the Prince, but moued onely with his duty doth reueale a conspiracy, choosing rather to faile in the office of a friend, then in duty of a faithfull subiect. The Chancelor concluding their opinions, pronounced the sentence of death, and by graue reasons and great examples reconciled some few opinions for the apprehending of La Fin. Saying, that the enterprise of the prisoner condemned, was not in his head alone, that there were others, who hauing a desire to say something, would retire themselves when they should see La Fin so intreated, who in the common opinion had deserued reward. And although that Mars would not haue the day which is giuen vnto him, to be the last to one that had deserued the name of a second Mars, yet the shadow of death did enuiron him on Tuesday about Noone, seeing a great multitude of Parisiens about Saint Anthonies gate, he then beleueed that he should be a spectacle vnto them. The Lord of Vitry's Lieutenant freed him from this imagination, making him beleuee that it was to see certain Gentleman fight. Hereupon (and of that which the heart doth alwaies diuine in the like accidents, seeing more signes of death then of life) he framed in his imagination infallible consequences of his death, sending the Siegneur of Baranton to intreat the Marquis of Rhosny to come vnto him, or if hee could not, to be an intercessor vnto the King for his pardon. He answered, that he was extremely grieved that hee durst not doe the first, and had not meanes to effect the second. That the King was sorry that at his comming to Fontainebleau he was obdurate and would not deliuer the truth, which tooke from him the meanes to saue his life, and for his friends to sue for him. This multitude did not run to the gate without some occasion, they knew that the sentence of death was giuen the day before: Certaine Officers of the Court and the Executioner were seene enter into the Bastille, the Scaffold which should be set vp at the Greue was made, but they were ill informed: for the King hauing commanded the Chancelor to send him the sentence, after he had giuen it in the Parliament, that he might let him vnderstand his pleasure touching the execution, Sillery who had carried it to Saint Germaine, returned with letters, by the which (for the auoyding the ignominy of his death at the sute of his friends, and for other considerations) his Maiesty was pleased to change the place of the execution, and to appoint that in the Bastille, which should haue beene at the Greue.

These letters being verified, on Wednesday morning the last of Iuly, the Chancelor accompanied with the first President of the Court of Parliament, Sillery and three Masters of Requests, and followed by some Officers of the Chancery, De Vesjon Register for criminall causes, and sixe Vilers, came to the Bastille about nine of the clocke in the morning, to let him heare the sentence of the Court. At this entry hee commanded them to make the prisoner, dine and not to aduertise him of his comming, remaining in a little Chamber nere the entry on the left hand about an houre and a halfe, where he reioiced who should bee sent for to assist at this execution, of whose names hee made a list. that apprehends death, hath no desire to eate: yet he set him downe, rose againe presently, and according to his vsuall manner went vnto a window which looked into the Court of the Bastile, where hearing the cries and lamentations of a woman, hee thought they were for him, and had this sad content to see they wept for him before his death. Soone after, the Chancellor goes towards him, who crossing through the Court, the Duke of Biron espied him and cried out, that he was dead. You come (sayd hee) to pronounce my sentence, I am condemned vniuissly, tell my kinsfolkes that I die an innocent. The Chancellor went on without any motion, commanding that they should bring him into the Chappell. The prisoner seeing him come asafare off, cried out: Oh my Lord Chancellor is there no pardon? is there no mercy? The Chancellor saluted him and puts on his hat. The Duke of Biron continued bare, and hauing abandoned all the powers of his soule to griefe and passion, he tooke the aduantage to speake first, and to speake all that a tongue ouer-grieis prohibited, and the report punishable. But Princes regard not the railing of subiects

Biron knowing not whom he should challenge most for his misfortune, turned towards mine innocency: you my Lord shall answer for this iudgement before him, whether I doe summe you within a yeare and a day, I goe before by the iudgement of men, but those that are the cause of my death shall come after by the iudgement of God.* All which was deliuered with such violence, as he cryed out and stormed both against the King and his Parliament. They beare with all which proceeds from choller in a condemned man of his humor and qualitie. But this excesse to adorne a Chancellor to heauen being seuentie yeares old, was held unworthy the great courage of a Capitaine, blaspheming and brauing death, and yet ignorant how they plead in another world. Hee was not the first in the like extremities, that haue adourned their Iudges before the throne of God. Iohn Hus sayd in dying:

That those which had condemned him should answer a hundred yeares after before God and him: and the Bohemians who preferred the ashes of his bones and maintained his de-scendence, coyned money with this adournment. But the Duke of Biron's affligations was vaine: for the Chancellor appeared not, but hath bene more healthfull since then before. He found no meanes to enter into discourse amidst the confusion of so many words which were like to a violent streame. Yet he interrupted him, to tell him that he had need of Gods helpe, and that he should recommend himselfe vnto him. He presently answered, that he had thought vpon God, and implored his ayde to giue him patience against their iniustice, but neither he nor his Iudges had thought of it in condemning him. Passion (said the Chancellor) makes you to speake many things without any colour, and against your owne iudgement. There is not any man hath better knowne your merits then my selfe, and I would to God your offences had been as much vnkowne as they haue bene dissembled. The knowledge thereof was so great and so perfect, as your Iudges haue been more troubled how to moderate your paine, then to haue you punished, they haue more laboured to iustifie you then to condemne you.

Whilest the Chancellor was speaking, the Duke of Biron turned towards Roisly Master of Requests, and asked him if he had also bene one of his Iudges. Roisly answered, My Lord, I pray God to comfort you. My father loued you so intirely (replyd the Duke of Biron) that although you were one of them that had condemned mee I would forgive you.
And so returning to his discourse, he addressd himselfe vnto the Chancellor, who was laying something vnto Paisin. I see well (said he) what it is, I am not the most wicked, but I am the most vnforgotten. Those which haue done worse then I would haue done, are fauor-
ed. The Kings Clemency is dead for mee. Hee doth not imitate the examples of Cesar nor Augustus, or of those great Princes, who not onely pardoned them that would haue done ill, but euen them that did ill, and who were euer sparing of their blood, yea of those which was least esteemed wherein can the King shew himselfe greater then in pardoning Clemency is a Kingly vertue, euery one may giue death, but it belongs onely to Soueraines to giue life. And cruell that he is, doth hee not know well that hee hath pardoned me. I had a bad designe, he granted mee grace. I demand it againe, you may easily aduertise

A vertue him, a Post will soone returne. The Queene of England told me, that if the Earle of Essex would haue humbled himselfe and sued for grace, he would haue pardoned him.
He grew obdurate, and would neuer implore her mercy, taking from her all meanes to shew the effects. She like a generous Princeesse desiring to pardon him, euen as she would that God should pardon her. Hee was guilty, I am innocent: he sued for no pardon for his offence, I craue it in my innocency.
Is it impossible the King should thinke no more of the seruices I haue done him? doth he not remember the conspiracy at Maantes, and the danger he had runne into, if I had had intelligence with the conspirators, who found nothing that did more hinder the effects of his desire then my loyalty, nor a more ready meanes to attaine vnto it then in causing me to be slaine? There is no veine in my body which hath not bled for his seruice? He shewes that he neuer loued me any longer then he thought himselfe to haue need of mee, hath he forgotten the sieges of Amiens, where they haue seene mee so often couered with fire and bullets, and to bee in so many dangers either to giue or to receiue death?
He now quencheth the torch in my blood, after that he hath vied it. My Father exposed himselfe to a thousand dangers, and purchased death to set the Crowne vpon his head.
I haue receiued five and thirty wounds vpon my body to preferre it for him, and for my reward he takes my Head from my shoulders. Let him beware lest the Iustice of God fall vpon him. Hee shall find what profit my death will bring him, it will nothing assure his affaires, but impaire the reputation of his Iustice. Hee doth lose this day a good seruant, and the King of Spaine a great Enemy. I am not put to death for that I treated with him; my courage raised me vp, and my courage ruines me.

It is not lawfull for a man condemned to dispute of that which hath bene iudged against him. And therefore the Chancellor sayd, that he should not torment himselfe any more against his Iudgement, that they had done him that Iustice which a Father is bound to pronounce against his owne Sonne if hee had offended in the like sort. At that word, choller makes him to breake forth, saying: What Iustice? I was neuer heard barone, I could not deliuer the fiftieth part of my Iustification. What Iudgement vpon the testimony of the most wretched and most execrable man in the world, who neuer dame nere mee but with incantments, nor went from mee but he had enchanted mee?
He bit me by the eare, and made me to drinke enchanted wares; calling me his King, his Prince, his Lord. Hee cannot deny but hee made me to see an Image of waxe which spake these two words in Latin. Then shalt dye wicked King. If hee hath this power ouer a senseless Image, what might hee not doe vpon me whose will he did tyrannize vpon by his witch-craft, forcing me to doe what hee pleased. But La Fin sayes, that hee knowes not what this Image meanes. If it be true, these words discover the Diuels policie, who speakes the truth in his misery that trusteth vnto his lies, and intrangles him still with in-ferable ambiguities. So hee deceived Crasus when hee told him that the Raiser Ha-his should lose a great power, meaning his, not that of Cyrus, against whom hee went to fight. So the Diuell meant not any other King then he whom La Fin saluted by the name of King, calling the Duke of Biron his Prince and his King. At euery word now hee uttered some execration against La Fin, taxing the Court of Injustice, to haue condemned him vpon his accusation. The Chancellor said vnto him that the Court had considered aduicely of his answers and his letters. It is true, said the Duke of Biron, I haue written some, but there are some that by an odious wicked selfe premeditated haue bene counterfeit. Those that were of my hand-writing were not my intention. I disauowed them when I wrote them. There are some that can counterfeit letters so artificially, as they that are charged therewith are confounded, and beleue they had written that which they be-lieue thought. The Marquesse of Verneuil confessed to haue written that which was not his hand, nor euer in her thought, and when hee had read the letter, shee cryed out, that her hand had betrayed her heart, hauing neuer any thought of that which was contained therein. The Chancellor would haue interrupted his discourse, but hee said this in such sort as there was no means to make any way. Hee spake of the Kings pardon which hee had granted him, as if he had relied vpon his word, not asking any other assurances. Hee told what letters the King had sent him to persuade him to come, and the policy of the President Lian to draw him thence, to decoy him, as hee sayd, calling him a Decoy. Hee saies of his friends consoling him not to come, with many other vane and foolish discourses.

The Duke of Biron delivers up the Kings
order.

The Chancellor to interrupt him, sayd, that the King demanded his Order, the Duke of Biron drawing it out of his pocket, delivered it vnto him, protesting and swearing vpon the saluation and perill of his Soule, that hee had neuer broken the oath which hee had made in taking it. It was true that hee had affected Warre more then peace, to make himselfe necessary, and to maintain the reputation which hee had gotten by the practice of Armes. It seemes he had not well obserued the articles of this Order, by the which no Knight of the Holy Ghost might take any Pension, Entertainement nor money from a foraigne Prince, nor tye themselves to the seruice of any other person during the Kings life, but should faithfully reueale all which they knew did import his Maiesties seruice. The Chancellor would haue had him to read his sentence: hee beseeched him not to intreat him with that rigour, that he knew what it did import, but the King should content himselfe with his Life, and suffer his goods to goe vnto his kinsfolkes, ending his paine with his death. The Chancellor said that hee doubted not but the King like a Prince full of bounty would let his kinsfolkes know that hee had loued him. Although the losse of life is nothing comforted by the preservation of goods, yet this gaue him some consolation, so as the fisme of his choller was suddenly dispersed. The Chancellor sayd, That hee had brought two Diuines to comfort him, and to prepare him for death. The prisoner sayd vnto them, That hee was already prepared, and had his Soule in that tranquillity, as the night before he had spoken with God, and that his guard had heard him laughe in his sleepe.

He is suffered
to make his
Will.

The Chancellor who had much forced his patience, sayd vnto him, wee will bid you farewell. What farewell said the condemned? I will come and see you againe after dinner, answered the Chancellor: As he went forth he intreated him to grant him the last consolation that remains for men that are dying, when they may haue their wils to passe after their deaths, and to suffer him to make his Testament. It was granted, and hee disposed thereof with a spirit free from all perturbation. Hee remembered his seruants and friends, not forgetting the Baron of Lux whom he lamented aboue all. He drew three rings from his fingers deliuering them to Baranson to giue vnto his sister of S. Blancart, desiring her to weare them in remembrance of him. He had about three hundred Crownes when hee was taken prisoner, a part hee playd, the rest hee gaue away to the poore. Eight or ten of his guard came to take their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. Hee gaue them Apparell, Shirts, Cloakes, and all that hee had in his Coffers. So when the table is taken away, they giue the meat that remains, to them that haue wayted. Garnier the Kings Preacher and now Bishop of Mompellier, with Magnan Curat of Saint Nicholas of the field, presented themselves to comfort him, to take from him the violent fits, which the opinion of his innocency did giue him, and to withdraw him from the affections of the world. Voisin told him that it was the course of Iustice to read the sentence, and that he must kneele downe before the Altar. Read it saies hee, I will bee as supple as a glove.

The Duke of Biron kneeles to heare the sentence of death.

It was read in these termes: The Proccesse being extraordinarily made, and examined by the Court and Chambers assembled, and by the Presidents and Councillors that were deputed by Letters Patents of the 18 and 19 of Iune, at the request of the Kings Attourney General against Charles Gentsils of Biron, Knight of both orders, Duke of Biron, Peere and Marshall of France, Gouvernor of Bourgonne, prisoner in the Bastille, accused of treason, interrogations, confessions and denials, confronting of witnesses, letters, aduices and instructions giuen to the enemy, confessed by him, and all which the Attourney General hath produced. A sentence was giuen the 22 of this Month, by the which it was decreed in the absence of the Peeres of France (being called) they should proceed to Iudgement, the conclusions of the Kings Attourney General being giuen, and the prisoner being heard by the Court vpon the Crimes wherewith hee was charged, all considered it was sayd: That the said Court had declared and did declare the said Duke of Biron guilty of high Treason, for his conspiracies against the Kings person, enterprises against his Estate, and treacheries and traites with his enemies, being Marshall of the Kings Army: For reparation of which Crimes, they deprived him of all his Estates, Honours and Dignities, and condemned him to lose his head vpon a Scaffold at the Greue, declaring all his goods movable and immovable whereto hee was confiscate vnto the Kings: the Seignurie of Biron to lose the name and title of Duchy and Peere for avery, with all other goods held immediately of the King

Hee falls into choller after the reading of his sentence,

A King to be vnted vnto the Crowne of France, decreed in the Court of Parliament the last day of Iuly 1602, and signed by Bellicourt Chancellor of France, and Fleury Councillor in the Court, and Reporter of the proccesse. He grew into choller thrice in the reading of the sentence: when they said that hee had attempted against the Kings person, he protested with great Imprecations that it was false. That hee had neuer made any conspiracie, that he had his head troubled with some enterprises of State, for that hee would not lye idly in peace, but giue some employment to men of warre. But it was about two and twenty moneths since he had any thought of it; desiring that Voisin might raze that out of the sentence. When he heard that he should be executed at the Greue, he said he would not goe thither, but would rather be drawne with foure horses, and that it was not in all their powers to lead him. Voisin said, that they had provided for it, and that the King had done him the grace to change the place of his execution, hauing appointed it in the Bastille: What grace answered the prisoner? The third point of his sentence was, that he was troubled for the reunion of the Duchy of Biron to the Crowne, the which he said, could not be forfeit to the prejudice of the substitution of his brethren, and that the King should be satisfied with his life.

The Diuines after the pronouncing of the sentence spake more boldly vnto him of death, and to free himselfe of all worldly cares as he had done of his goods, and that hee should haue no other thoughts but of his Soules health. Hee then grew into choller, C swearing that they should suffer him in peace, and that it concerned him only to thinke of his Soule, with the which they had nothing to doe. It is the order in Criminnal executions to deliuer the party condemned into the hands of the Executioner as soone as his Iudgement is read. They would haue done so with him: but Voisin went to speake vnto the Chancellor, to know if they should not distinguish him from other prisoners. The Chancellor was in doubt whether they should binde him or not. Hee asked Sillery what he thought, who vnderstanding by Voisin that the party condemned was well pacified, sayd, it was to be feared that in seeking to binde his hands they would cause him to breake the bonds of patience, and enter into new furies, for that they which are in that distresse, are distempored for small matters.

D Yet the Chancellor would haue the aduice of the first President, who was in another Chamber, for that hee had dined before hee came vnto the Bastille: Hee sayd that it was dangerous to suffer his hands free, and therefore they must binde him. E Every one was of Sillerys opinion, who considered not so much what should be done as what might be done, for the party condemned would neuer haue suffered himselfe to haue bene led bound to the place of execution but in Fury and Despaire. The Executioner (who said since that a yong hangman and not experienced would haue dyed for feare) had bene in danger to endure that which he would make him to suffer. In this liberty, his spirit was alwaies free in his thoughts for the last disposition of affaires: the Diuines intreated him to consider that hee was no more what hee had bene: that within an hour or two he should be no more: that he must leaue this life to lye for euer: that his Soule must goe before the fearful Throne of the liuing God, to be rewarded with a more happy and perfect life then that which hee had past in this world: or condemned to infinite paines, in comparison whereof, that which hee should suffer was but a light pricking, in respect of the burning flames of the Diuine Iustice.

Hee then entered into the examination of his Conscience, in the which hee remained about an hour. This action required an humble, penitent and a contrite heart, and yet hee seemed much more carefull of worldly things, and of the affaires of his house, then of his Soules health; and as it were a yong apprentice in the first prayers of his Religion, praying vnto God not as a deuout Christian, but as a Souldier, not as a religious Man, but as a Captaine, not as Moses or Elias, but like to Iofua, who, on horsebacke and with his sword in his hand prayed and commanded the Sunne to stand still. His confession being made, hee walked vp and downe the Chappell, still casting out some exclamation for his Innocency, and some execration against La Fin, asking if it should not be lawfull for his brethren to cause him to be burnt.

Hee confesseth
humblely.

Hercupon Voisin comes, who tels him that the Chancellor and the first President were very glad of the constant & generous resolution hee had to die, and that they would come presently to see him. He answered that hee had bene long resolved, and that it was not the paine of death, but the manner that did amaze him. Whilest he attended them, there A were many notes brought him, touching his affaires, whereunto hee answered without trouble or passion. Hee recommended the payment of some debts which he did owe to Gentlemen, that had nothing to shew for it; and among others, to the Ambassadour in England: when the Chancelor had dined, he came to see him with the first President, and found that as a troubled water growes cleere being settled, so the time which he had giuen him to thinke of his affaires, had taken from him the violent agitations of his fantasie, and freed his heart from the feare of death: he commanded all that were in the place to retire, and they fate downe together about halfe an houre, but their discourse is vnknowne.

He resolves to dye.

In the end the Chancelor sayd vnto him, I should doe wrong vnto your courage, if I should exhort you vnto death, the hath presented herselfe vnto you in so many places, as it is not in her power to trouble the Constancy and Patience, whereunto I beleue you are disposed. You find it hard to die in the flower and vigour of your age, but if you consider that our dayes are limited, and that they depend on the foresight of the Gouernor of the whole world, you will receiue this death as by the will of God, who meanes to rectifye you out of this world for your owne good, before that some great and long misery shall send you. As we may not desire a death which is far off, so may we not reieice that which offers it selfe. No, no, answered the party condemned, labour not (my Lord) to fortifie me against the feare of death, these twenty yeares it hath not feared mee, and knowing not where she would take me, I haue expected her euery where. You haue giuen me 40 daies C to thinke vpon it, yet I could not beleuee that it being not in the power of my enemies to take away my life, I should be so miserable as to be seized on by death, with the consent of my friends. The King (said the Chancelor) hath cut off all that might bee shamefull and ignominious. He then asked him if he would speake with any one. He sayd that he desired to see La Force and S. Blancart. They told him that they were not in the City, but there was a Gentleman of the Lord of Badous, and after that he had demanded for Preuss (Comptroller of his house) and that they had answered him that he was gone three daies before to a house of his in the Country, he then said, that he ought not to haue beene there, that he had all his blankes: adding thereunto these words of compassion, All the world D hath abandoned me. In these crimes friendship is dangerous, friends faile, and the disease is ta- ken by acquaintance, as well as by infection. He is wise that knowes no man, nor no man knowes him. At these words the Chancelor and the first President tooke their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. He intreated them to receiue a good opinion of his life, by the assurance which he gaue at the point of death, that hee had neuer attempted any thing against the King, and that if he would haue vnderaken it, the King had not bene liuing three yeares since. The Chancelor went out of the Bastille with the first President and Sillery, and stayed in the Arceuall vntill the execution was done. The Duke of Biron in-treated the Kinght of the Watch to goe after him, and to request him that he would suffer his body to be interred with his Predecessors at Biron, for although nature hath provided that no man shall die without a graue, yet men thinke curiously thereof before they die, and imagine, that as glory preferres the reputation of the life, so the graue maintaines the remembrance of the body. He that had seen him would haue thought he had not been ready to dye, so little care he had of death, or else hee promised to himselfe some vncexpected effects of the Kings mercy, or to escape by miracle. There is no such deceit as imagination frames in these extremities, whilste she flatters herself with vain hope, imagining that God doth greater wonders, and that they haue seene a pardon come betwixt the Executioners sword and Prisoners necke: Voisin asked him if he pleased to say any thing else that might serue to discharge his conscience. The Preachers exhorted him not to conceale any thing, and to consider that they could not giue him abolution but for what he should confesse. He answered, that although the King did put him to death vniuultly, yet hee had so much loued his seruice, and had serued him with so great loue and obedience, neuer diuiding the one from the other, as hee felt in his thoughts of death, those of his loue, to be so liuely and ardent, as he would not conceale any thing that he knew to be against his person or state, for all the world, no not for the assurance of his life he would not speake any thing that was not true.

He desires to see his friends.The Chancelor takes his leaue
of him.

Hee drew Voisin and his Confessors apart and whispered something vnto them, the which was presently written. Hauing continued with his Confessors halfe an houre, (being

A (being neere five of the clocke) one came and told him that it was time to part. Goe we (said he) seeing I must. He then kneeled downe before the Altar, makes his prayer, and re-comends himselfe vnto God, before he goes out of the Chappell. He asked if there were any one that belonged vnto the Marquis of Rhosny, Arnant was there, whom he willed to present his commendations vnto his Master, in remembrance not so much of him that went to die, as of his kinsfolkes which remained aliue, and to assure him that hee held him for a good seruant to the King, and profitable and necessary for his seruice, and that hee was sorry hee had not followed his counsell. Hee knew one that followed the Duke of Mayenne, and intreated him to say vnto him, that if in his life he had giuen him some cause not to loue him, yet he desired him to beleuee that he dyed his seruant, and the Duke of Eiguillons and the Earle of Sommeriues his children. Hee charged Baranton to deliuer his last words of loue and affection vnto his brethren, commanding them to keepe the faith which bound them vnto the Kings seruice, not to apprehend his misfortune, nor to come at Court vntill that time had worne out the skarres of his ignominious death. He intreated one of them that had guarded him, to go tell the Earle of Auvergne that he went to dye without griefe, but for the losse of his friendship: that if God had giuen him a longer life, hee would haue done him more seruice, beseeching him to beleuee that hee had said nothing at his arraignment that might hurt him, if it were not that hee had more want then bad meaning.

He prayes before he goes forth of the Chappell.

C The Count of Auvergne receiued this farewell as from a true friend, and with a feeling, worthy of his friendship, hee intreated him to leaue him a bafe childe of his, the which hee would bring vp with his owne. Going out of the Chappell, the Executioner presented himselfe vnto him. Hee asked Voisin what he was. It is (said he) the Executioner of the sentence. Retire thy selfe (said the Duke of Biron) touch me not vntill it be time. And doubting lest hee should bee bound, hee added, I will goe freely vnto death, I haue no hands to defend my selfe against it, but it shall neuer bee said that I die bound like a thiefe or a slave: and turning towards the hang-man, hee saide that if he came neere him he would pull out his throat. He could not endure the sight of the Executioner: Hee had reason, for they torment the body, as Diuels are executioners of the soule. And although D they be men and the instruments of Iustice, yet they are held execrable, and had no dwelling house allowed them in Rome by the Censors Law. The two Preachers led him downe, intreating him to resist his impatience, which did but distemper his minde, and made him loath to leaue the place which he could not hold against his will. Coming into the Court, hee went five or sixe paces without speaking a word, but ha, ha, ha. He cast his eyes vpon the Lieutenant Ciuill, in whose house la Fin was lodged, to whom he said, I am your fr., beware you bee not abused with Sorcerers and Magicians, if you free not your selfe of them, you will repent it.

He sends commendations to the Scaffold.

They had made a scaffold in a corner of the Court of the Bastille before the porrall going into the Garden, fixe foot high and somewhat longer, there were five steps to E goe vnto it. There were no Ornaments, no Tapistry, no distinction. The most stately death is not the least troublesome, the greater the preparation is, the more remarkable is the infamy. It is no great honor to kneele vpon a velvet Cushion, vpon a Scaffold stred ouer with Tapistry, and to haue by him an Executioner clad in blacke velvet and Crimson Silke, with the sword of Gold of Heliogabalus: the death which is least ceremonious is the best. The beholders were some at the windowes, some in the Court. There were the Prouost of Merchants, foure Sheriffes, three or foure Masters of Requests, some Presidents of the Chambers of Accounts, and some Councillors, the Lieutenants Ciuill and Criminall, and the Kings Attourney Generall. The Duke of Biron coming to the Scaffold kneeled vpon the first step, praying in few words, and his eyes lift vp to Hea-
F ven. He was exhorted to kisse the Crosse in remembrance of his Redemption. Hee was attyred in Ruffet Taffata, with a blacke Hat. Hee cast a furious looke vpon the Executioner. Voisin perswaded him that it was another, but he knew him well, saying, that they sought to deceiue him, but hee commanded him to stand by, and when it were time
hee would call for him. Hee threw downe his Hat, and cast his hand-kcher to a boy, and presently called for it againe to vse it, seeming in this act that hee had not the courage to looke vpon death with open eyes. He put off his dubler, and cast it to the same boy, but the Executioners man, got it, and kept it.

The Executioner offered him a cloth to put before his eyes, the which hee reiected, A saying, that if hee touch him, but to giue him the stroke of death, hee would strangle him. Hee sayd vnto the souldiers which guarded the Port (shewing them his naked brest) that he should be much bound vnto him that would shoot him with a Musket: what a pity is it sayd he, to die so miserably, and of so infamous a stroke? They might see by his hollow eyes, that his thoughts were distempred. At these words the teares fell from the souldiers eyes. All those of his profession sware by his Spirit, and by his good Angell, as the Ancients did by that of their Prince. The poorest souldier was cherished by him, at the least he had some good words to assure him of his good liking. The Harguebuziers did wound him at the heart, through the extreme compassion they had of him. So were the souldiers of Eumenes, moued when they saw him bound and manacled, intreating them to kill him. He asked if there were no pardon, and directing his words to the standers by, hee sayd, that he had made his soule ready to present it before the face of God, but hee tooke pity of the Kings soule, who put him to death vnjustly: that hee dyed an innocent, and that his death was the recompence of his seruice: Voisin said vnto him, that it was the manner to read the sentence. He was angry that they would make him to feele death, and to die to often before his death, for he felt himselfe to die cruelly in the repetition of the crimes of his condemnation, being sufficient that they had brought him thither where hee was ready to obey, and that they which did see him were not ignorant of the cause.

When as the Register answered him that it could not be otherwise, he gaue him leave: but vnderstanding the words: that he had attempted against the Kings person and State, he sayd that it was false. That God was his Iudge, that he would be deprived eternally of his grace, if it were true, that for two and twenty moneths past he had neuer any thought of it, and that the King had pardoned him. He talked all the while that Voisin read his iudgement, so as neither the one nor the other could bee vnderstood, the Auditors not knowing to whom to giue eare. The party condemned protesting still, and coniuring the Assisants to remember that these two and twenty moneths he had not attempted any thing against the Kings seruice. No man doth at any time condemn himselfe. You shall see few of these great Spirits, that die by their owne confessions, although they be found guilty. Some confesse the Fact, but they hold it no crime, as that yong Gentleman who was one of them that murdered the Duke of Milan, being ready to receive the stroke, he cried out, that the death which hee suffered was troublesome, but his Reputation should bee eternally glorious.

His iudgement being read, the Preachers perswaded him to call to God for helpe, and not to thinke any more on Earth, but to yeeld his Soule to the immortall disposition of the Creator, and to leaue his body to that which Iustice had decreed. Hee asked what he should doe, and takes his hand-kercher, with which he blinds his eyes, asking the Executioner where hee should set himselfe: hee answered him, there my Lord, there. And where is that? Thou fcest that I see nothing, and yet thou shewest mee as if I did see plainly: and therewith being in choller, he pulled away his hand-kercher to see: Hee blinded his eyes againe, and for that it is a kinde of grace to bee soone dispatcht, and a great cruelty to languish in the expectation of a paine, hee commanded the Executioner to make an end. He desired to die standing, according to the aduice of Yeshafaz. The Executioner answered him that he must kneele, that hee might doe nothing out of order. No no, said the Duke of Biron, if thou canst not doe it at one, giue thirty. I will not stirre. They prest him to kneele, and he obeyed, willing the Executioner to dispatch: then hee flart vp suddenly again, casting his eyes vpon the Executioner: & looking vpon the standers by, hee asked if there were no mercy: it was imagined, that either he would haue layd hand vpon the Executioners sword, or that he presumed that when he should be ready to receive the fatal stroke they would bring him his pardon, and that the King would doe him no other harme then feare him, as Papirius Curser did one of his souldiers for breaking of his ranke. The Executioner intreated him to suffer him to cut his haire. At that word hee grew into choller againe, he vnbandd himselfe, and sware that if he toucht him he would strangle him. You may see in two persons, two extreme passions. Feare retyred the Executioner within himselfe. Choller transported the Duke of Biron beyond himselfe. The one trembled for feare, the other for rage. Voisin said vnto him, that he had too much care

A of his body, which was no more his owne. Hee turned to him in choller with an oath, saying, I will not haue him touch me, so long as I shall be liuing: if they put me into choller, I will strangle halfe the company that is here, and will force the rest to kill mee, I will leape downe if you thrust me into despair. His colour did rife, and shewed a distemperature in his face. Those that were vpon the scaffold went downe. The Executioner remained amazed, fearing death more then hee that was to die.

He sweares and grooves into choller.

But this choller preuailed nothing, it was like vnto Cresspion, to kicke against the Moyles heeles. Resty horsles get nothing but purring, they are neither freed from their burden, nor from their iourney, he must resolue to goe this way, the which hee must passe at length. Voisin intreating the Preachers to goe vp againe, and to pacifie him, fearing lest hee should fall into despair, for his soule being much troubled with the violence of so tragically an end (entring into these furious motiues) was subiect to great dis temperatures. They goe vp againe, and speake some good words vnto him in his care, the which doth temper his furious rage, and calmes the choller which the Executioners presence did thrust him into: he had alwaies liued in war, he could not dye in peace. All men found these furious passions strange in the last act of his life, the which required a great constancy of minde, and a perfect iudgment to know God, to call to him for mercy, and to pray him to intreat his soule more fauourably then Iustice had done his body.

Hitherto they beleued, that although he were entring into death, yet he thought not to dye, and that he would seize vpon the Executioners sword. Suddenly hee resolues to free his passage, and having receiued his absolution, he said, My God, my God, my God, take pity on me. Then turning to the Executioner, he takes the binder that was in his hand, trusses vp his haire behinde, and binds it vpon his forehead: and with his handkercher hee blinds his eyes, and so kneeles downe. The Preachers comfort him in his last resolution, assuring him that his soule was ready to see God, and to be partaker of his glory in heaven. I said he, Heaven is open for my soule. And this done hee bends downe his head, presenting it as willingly vnto the sword, as Agis did his vnto the halter, saying vnto the Executioner: Strike, strike, ob strike. This was to dye in commanding, and to command in dying.

D The Executioners hauing seene him to rife, and to vnbind himselfe thrice, that in turning towards him being not bound, hauing the sword in his hand, he might wrest it from him, thought that there was no way to execute him but by surprize, and therefore hee said vnto him, that he must say his last prayer to recommend his soule vnto God, intreating the Preachers that were gone downe to cause him to say it. At which words the Executioner made a signe to his man to reach him his sword, with the which hee cut off his head, euen as he was speaking. The blow was so sodaine, as few men perceiued it, the head leaped from the scaffold to the ground. The Preachers prayed for the happy departure of the soule, from so vnhappy a body, the which was presently stripped into his shirt, and couered with a sheete. His heart panted, as if in rising against the head, it had said as E Apollodorus thought that his did when he dremp that one did hew it in peeces; It is for thee that I suffer. This head full of the fumes of Ambition, was the cause of the Hearts death. The Executioner struck him so high above the nape of the neck, as hee glanced vpon his Iawe-bones, and left a great tuft of haire on his neck. Being dead, hee shewed choller in his countenance, as they write of the Souldiers which died at the battle of Cannas. Euery one departed, commending the Kings Iustice, and lamenting the misery of so valiant a man, beleueing that of long time they should not see his equal. His kindnesse thought hee himselfe happily, if the glory of his life might wipe away the infamy of his death, if the shining of his first actions were not obliued with the darknesse of the last, that for a recompence of all his seruices which haue made him so famous, they might obtaine the fauour that they would neuer speake of him. But there is no law of forgetfulness, to deface the memory of that which hath bene, and of that which is. About nine of the clocke at night, he was carried to S. Pauls Church, and buried in the midst of the body, before the Pulpit, the Celestines hauing refused to giue him buriall hauing had no permission nor commandement for it. Hee was not distinguished from others by his funerall pompe, nor by the number of Ensignes (like vnto that great Captaine at Granada) but by the holy water which the Parisiens did cast hourly vpon his graue. Such was the end of the Duke of Biron.

There is no calme but hath a storme: one would haue said to haue seene him at the height of his prosperities; That hee had fixed a nayle on Fortunes wheele, that it might not turne, and yet hee suddenly cast downe. There past but one night betwixt his glory and his ruine. The Flower being so suddenly blowne, the first Northerne winde did wither it, and carry it away. His honours and greatnesse were the meanes to ruine him, like vnto Abolons long haire, by the which he was hanged. King Lewis the cleuenth did alwaies say, That pride caried ruine behinde him. A heart which knowes from whence the good comes which it enioyeth, is alwaies an enemy to Pride. So there is but a moment betwixt glory and ruine. Great trees are long in growing, but are rooted vp in an instant. And it is true, if the Duke of Biron had had a braine, he had not lost his head, and had not brought it into the hands of his Princes Iustice, whom he had so much offended.

The Marshall
Biron's vertues.

This Marshall had goodly parts, communicable to few, his valour was admirable, and happy in all his encounters; of an inuincible courage, infatigable, and neuer tyred with any toyle, continuing ordinarily fifteene daies together on horsebacke. He was not enclined to voluptuousnesse, nor much to the loue of women, sober enough, the which began to quench that furious humour, as intemperancy and greatnesse encreased, or that rest did moderate his boyling passions. He was extremely vainglorious, yea, sometimes he would refuse his meat, and content himselfe with little, to feed his fantasie with glory and vanity. Hee was of a meane stature, blacke, reasonable good, hollow eyed, and rough in speech and conuersation. Hee was aduenturous in war, ambitious beyond all measure.

His vanity and glory.

The excee of his ambition made him to braue it without iudgment. He became so presumptuous, as hee thought that neither the King nor France could subside without him. He was become ill tongued, speaking ill of all the Princes, threatening the Parliaments, and the officers of Iustice, some with death, and to dispossesse others of their places. Hee was advanced from the meane to the highest degrees of honour; of a simple souldier, he became a Captaine, then a Colonel, afterwards Admirall and Marshall, and in the end Lieutenant of the Kings Armies, and in his heart hee aspired to be Duke of Bourgundy, Sonne in law to the Duke of Sauoy, and Nephew to the King of Spaine. If Sylla were resolute, cruell, and bloody, hee yielded nothing to him therein: If hee were valiant, this man exceeded him by ten degrees, and all the Romane Princes together.

A comparison betwixt Sylla
and the Duke of Biron,

Their actions and their ends were almost alike; but that Sylla died after hee had vanquished: this before hee could vanquish, and in the midst of his course did feeble vengeance of Gods wrath. Howsoever, he had won the Souldiers hearts, to whom hee gaue all liberty, he purchased credit with them that had neuer seene him (for they that had seene and felt him wished him at the Indies) and made strangers admire his valour: The Constable of Castille in the Franche County, the Archduke at Amiens, and the Marquis of Waranbon in Artois, whom he made to pay forty thousand crownes for his ranfome, with many Spaniards which he caused to be hanged suddenly, for that they had called him Baron. Moreouer, the Kings exceeding fauours, the praises wherewith hee did publicly honour him: his admirable fortune, his comming to the restoring of the last ruines of the State, like to another Camilus to deliuer the Capitoll, had made him not onely famous throughout all Europe, fearefull to all the neighbours, but necessary for France. Behold a man that was happy, full of content, which held fortune captiue with all her treasures: he commanded the felicities of this world, he had glory, honour, riches, and those gifts which Fortune imparts to her darlings. He was raised to the top of Fortunes wheele, but he fell, for he that gouernes the helme and all her motions, could no longer endure his insolencie and vanity.

His credit, and how he was esteemed.

Sequitur superbus vltor a tergo Deus. The causes of his ruine are infinite, the contempt of piety is the chief: this ground taken away, all vices abound, and as the Seruant said to King Atræus, O Prince, follow the insatiable way of Piety, and your Scepter shall be durable: for whereas faith and holinesse hath no place, there is no happinesse; the reason is, for that without God we hold all things indifferent, the Law folly, Iustice frenzie, and faith a fantasie; we hold the words of vertue and vice to be idle, whereas the feare and trust in God, limits our passions and insatiable desires, so as gouerning our actions by a iust proportion, we cannot erre.

Shame follows
pride.

He was often times leene to iest at the Masse, and to laugh at them of the reformed religion, with whom he had bene bred vp from his infancy. For at the age of eight years, the Lady of Brissambourg his fathers sister, (being of the reformed religion) did so affect him him for his active disposition, as she demanded him of his mother, the which she granted, and from that time she made him her onely heire. Vntill the age of fixtене years, he was called Charles of Contault (for then he had an elder brother which died since at the Duke of Alancous voyage into Flanders.) And bred vp at Brillembourg, neare vnto St. Jean d'Angely, where he was nothing giuen to his booke, but wholly enclined to Arms: for which confideration, his father, the Marshall Biron, a martiall man, and then a Catholike, tooke him from his Aunt, and led him for a while with him through the countries of Xaintonge, Aulins, and Angoulmois, where he caused him to be instructed in the Catholike religion: but vpon false principles which he did learne of some Courtiers, he did often mocke at all religion. The second cause of his ruine was the alteration of his fortune. After the death of his elder brother, his father caused him to be called Baron of Biron, and brought him to Court, where at the first he had a quarrell with the Lord of Cerency, sonne to the Earle of la Vauguion, the which was ended by a combate of three against three, Biron, Loignac, & Lenissac of the one side, lue Cerency, Esfigac, and la Bastie: their quarrell grew for the Heire of Chaumont, which either of them affected in marriage, yet neither of them had her. The Duke of Epemron got his pardon, the which was confirmed through the credit which his father had then in Court. Some say, that being thus in trouble he went disguised like a Carrier of Letters, vnto one La Brosse, a great Mathematician, whom they held to be skillful in casting of Natiuities, to whom he shewed his C Natiuitie, drawne by some other. And dissembling it to be his, he said: It was a Gentleman whom hee serued, and that he desired to know what end that man should haue. La Brosse, hauing rectified this figure, said vnto him: That he was of a good house, and no elder then you are, said he to the Baron, asking him if it were his: the Baron answered him, I will not tell you. But tell me (said he) what his life, his meanes, and end shall be. This good old man, who was then in a little Garret, which serued him for a study, said vnto him: My Son, I see, that hee whose natiuitie this is, shall come to great honour, by his industry and military valour, and may bee a King, but there is a CARYT ALOOL which hinders it. And what is that? (said the Baron of Biron.) Aske me not (said La Brosse) what it is. No, (said the Baron) I must know it. In the end he said vnto him: My Sonne, it is, that he will doe that D which shall make him lose his head. Whereupon the Baron (as they report) did beat him cruelly, and hauing left him halfe dead, he went downe, and caried away the Key of the Garret doore, whereof he bragged when he was gone. They say he had conference with one Cesar, who was a Magician at Paris, who told him, That onely a black blow of the Bourguignon would keepe him from being a King. He remembered this prediction being a prisoner in the Bastille, and intreated one that went to visit him, to learne if the Executioner of Paris were a Bourguignon; and hauing found it so, he said, I am a dead man.

He went to a Mathematician
to know his fortune.

During these last ciuill wars, his Father being Commander of the Kings army, of a young Baron, he was suddenly made a Captaine, and Marshall of the Campe. After his fathers death at Epemron, he was General and Admirall of France, then Marshall and E Lieutenant of the Kings Armies: The defeat of the Spanish succours at Laon, with his exploits in Bourgundy and Picardy, made the King so to loue him, as hee onely was in credit: there remained nothing but to vse his happinesse modestly. Doubtlesse he did great seruices to the King and to the Crowne, but he was rewarded with great fauours, and advanced to the greatest dignities and honours of the Crowne, the which if hee could haue vsed temperately, euen in the height of his fortune, he had bene too happy. It is reported that his father said vnto him, seeing his haughty disposition; Baron, I would advise thee, when a peace shall be made, to goe and liue priuately at thine own house, if thou must leave thy head at the Greue.

In many things Soueraigne Princes haue a common interest: a blow giuen with the right hand is sensible to the left: A conspiracy in one place, giues example and consequence in another. Who so hinders his neighbour from punishing the felonies of his subjects, binds himselfe to the like, and may suffer the same forme, for every Soueraignes Country is apt to breed sedition and treachery, and as intercessions are odious, so the defence and protection is vnjust. Whatsoever is said, that Princes should embrace them which are persecuted, as one Element defends him that is afflicted by another, it is not to be vnderstood but of persecutions apparently vnjust. Hence growes the custome of Princes to congratulate for the discouery and punishment of treason against their Estate.

Ambassadors
sent to the King to congratulate.

All Princes that were allied to the Crowne of France, reioyced at the discovery of A the Duke of Biron's treason: The Queen of England, and the King of Scotland, sent their Ambassadors vnto the King, to congratulate that God had so happily prevented this last conspiracy. The King of Spaine did the like by Taxis. The Archduke laid all the blame vpon the Count of Fuentes, The Duke of Sauoy sent the Count of Vieque vnto the King, as well to obferue how the Duke of Biron's death had beene taken in Court, and in that great City, whereas there was diuersity of humours and opinions, as to excuse him from the imputation which was laid vpon him to be the Architect of this conspiracy.

The Ambassadors of England, Scotland, and Sauoy, were received on one day at Monceaux. The King in receiving of them made a great difference, for he received them in with one countenance. The last was not vsed like vnto the first, the King leaning vpon a window, shewed by his gesture, that he was not pleased with his excuses, and that words alone could not repara to bad effects, nor make him beleue that the Duke of Sauoy had not beene an Actor to corrupt the Duke of Biron. The Dukes Ambassador made his excuse with a great grace and boldnesse, although it be a very hard thing to discourse of a subject to one that can giue no beleefe vnto it. The Count of Vieque passing through Biron's, visited the Gouernour, and gaue him a letter from his Master, the which hee sent vnto the King, who was very well pleased with his proceeding, and writ vnto him in this sort: It was not needfull to send mee this Letter, but onely to giue me a new confirmation of your loyalty which I hold so assured, as it needeth neither that, nor any other. But the wisest do abhorre the ancient formes, whereas that is one of the principall, not to see nor heare anything from foraigne Princes, without the priuaty and permission of his Master. The King parted from Monceaux to goe to Paris, where hee dispatched the Ambassadors. That of Sauoy came to his Master, being newly returned from Verceil, where hee had visited the Duke of Saxony's brother, passing into Italy. He presented him with eight horses richly furnished, and a Har-band with a Iewell esteemed at twelue thousand crownes. Some after he went to Riouly for his pleasure of hunting, leading D'Albigny with him, to whom he made shewes of extraordinary loue. Meas conicatures were not able to pierce into the secrets of that which they treated of together; but they will burst forth before the years shall end. The Count of Vieque came to Riouly in the beginning of October. Every man said at Thurin, that his Ambassage was gracious, and that the King was well pleased with that which the Duke of Sauoy would haue him beleue: yet all Sauoy was full of Souldiers, and no man knew how they should be employed. Some said that the Duke of Biron's death would breed a new storme in France, but all the choller and threats of them that repined thereat, was but a phantastick lightning. The Count of Fuentes would haue done his best to haue bred a storme: his spirit, which hath no rest but in exercise, thinking (with Teres, father to Sitalces) that nothing doth distinguish him from the rest of his Masters Seruants but war, was so much discontented for this death, as he could not sleepe. Hee did meditate of reuenge, and the King was well aduertised thereof.

It was thought, that vnder colour of passing a new army ouer the Alpes, hee would discover some designe, and the King was aduertised from many parts, that the City of Lyons was not the last nor the least in his chollerick thoughts. That three and twenty Companies of Spaniards (in the which were at the least three thousand men) had past the mountaines, and were dispersed in Sauoy: that the Duke of Sauoy had at Romilly five hundred men, vnder the Regiment of Valdisers, and at Anilly fiftene hundred Neapolitans; that they attended some Lanquenques: that neere vnto Genoa there were thirty Companies of Spaniards landed, and that they fortified Saint Genis (against the last treaty of Peace) a fit place to execute any designe vpon Lyons or Vienne. The King therefore forelocting that if they fought any advantage vpon France, it should be rather for Lyons than any other place, hee therefore lodged in the Battions of Saint John and Saint Christeue Companies of the Regiment of Bourg L'Espinalle; and those of Nereflan, at Montuel and Sciffel.

The opinions of this new Army were as diuers as their designes were secret, yet it seemed that the Duke of Sauoy feared lest his Country should be forced again by the Kings Army; and that he should not haue so good a composition as the first, and therefore hee hee provided for all his places in Sauby, but this hatched another great designe, whereof we will speake in the end of this yeare. The King was much troubled to search into the depth of the Duke of Biron's conspiracy. Lux was not acquainted with the last resolutions, the party condemned would neuer discover his complices. All this practice was well knowne to the Baron of Lux, who came vnto the King vpon the assurance of his Maiesties word to goe and come freely: yet he was aduised not to approach neere vnto the Count of Parthenay, who would not entertain him more kindly then they had done the Duke of Biron, seeing he had beene embarked with him in the time vessel, and to consider, that Princes promise any thing to discover a treason, but they neuer trust the Traitors, and if happily they fauour them for a time, yet they haue which follows after is more violent and irreconcilable. That they vnto men of Countryman doth his Betts, when they haue drawne out the honey and wax, they chase them away with fire and smoke. The King was so well satisfied with that which the Baron of Lux had said vnto him (haueing talked long with him) as entering into his Carosse, he told the Count Siffens, and the Cardinal of Joyeuse, that hee would not for two hundred thousand crownes but haue spoken with the Baron of Lux.

His pardon past in the Parliament at Paris, and he was received in that of Dijon, with the same honours hee had before, and his charge of Lieutenant in the government of Bourgongne, and of the Country of Bresse: his wife came did conduct him in a stormy sea to safe Port, and made him to avoid some dangers, whereas any other would haue left both Card and Compass. The greatest indiscretion which the Duke of Biron had committed, (next to the giuing care to the promises and persuasions of strangers) was, that hee had written his intentions, and had imparted them to another. It is a maxime in matters of conspiracy, not to commit any thing to writing, but all must goe by mouth. They could not haue condemned the Duke of Biron, but by his owne Letters. And of all those of whom hee spake in his Letters, there was nothing found of theirs in writing: Letters serue indifferently for an assurance of the faith that is giuen, and for a proofe of infidelity.

He would dye with that content, that none of his friends should be toucht but him. Helens his Secretary endured the Racke, and his patience did misse him, but the Kings words were a more violent torture vnto him, drawing the truth from him, the which hee would not confesse vnto the Court. The Baron of Fontanelles, (who was found to haue intelligence with the Duke of Biron) was broken vpon the wheele by the decree of a great Councell. Monsieur Gouverneur of Rennes was committed to prison: Such and knowe him during the last troubles full of resolution and affection for the redressing of Birony to the Kings obedience, lamented his misfortune. The Earle of Auvergne continued two moneths in the Bastille after the execution of the Duke of Biron. The King let him at liberty and received him into fauour, after three or foure daies that hee had purged himselfe, and discharged his conscience to the Chancelor, the Marquis of Roissy, and to Sillery. He grew presently familiar with the King, as if hee had neuer beene sequestered from his presence, wherein appeared his Maiesties good nature, and his generous spirits, which doth neuer remember any iniuries.

This generous and naturall disposition to forget offences, hath alwaies bene observable in him when as hee commanded armies. The Author of the free discourse faith, That hee had some within a quarter of an houre after a battle won, the vanquished to follow among the victors, so they could not distinguish them, they came indifferently to him, hee rising and going to bed, to his wine and to his chamber, and to his Chickney, and more: for the most part petty matters of the Campes, of the still wines, who were vnto him as to the King, hee did not baire his enemies, and in this quality they received a good countenance. But the Duke of Bouillon considering what had beene done in the Bastille, vpon the petition of Henri a Captaine, would not trust to this great mildnesse, although hee had to great power assured in his hand. The King sent for him, and hee desired to see himselfe in the Chamber at Castres. The King let him vnderstand, that the pretext which hee took to flye vnto the Chamber at Castres for Iustice, was without ground, for hee was not called in question, and when hee should doe but stand there, for that hee should not haue had his name, neither could they haue knowne together of what hee should be examined from his Maiesty. He attended not to vnderstand derst and his pleasure more particularly by the President Caumont whom he refused to A send vnto him, but tooke the way to Geneva, and so to Heidelberg. The Subject may neuer capitulate with his Prince; but if necessity doth require it, it must not bee betwix two Bars, like to the Constable of S. Paul, but as farre off as he can.

The Duke of Bouillon being in the Viceroy of Turaine, when as the King sent for him, he answered him with this Letter: Sir, having understood by that of your Maie. sties owne hand, of the eighteenth of this moneth, that I had bene accused by those which had bene examined in Counsell vpon the conspiracies of the D. of Biron, and that you commanded me to repaire presently to Court to iustifie my selfe: I sent away him presently that came, with answer to your Maiefty, that I would follow instantly, the which I had done, if I had not receiued certaine intelligence who were my accusers: The which made me to change this resolution, and humbly to beseech your Maiefty to consider, that the treacherias and disloyalties against your Person, and State are so fully proued against my accusers, as it disables them to accuse me, and much lesse to condemne me. They haue not, nor cannot haue but lying tongues in their accusations; the which hauing failed them in the execution of their intention (being prevented by your Maie. sties happinesse and wisdom) they employ them, to make you suspect the second Officer of your Crown, and your household Seruant, who haue neuer sought any glory in this world, but what proceeds from your Maiesties grace and fauour, and who hath so long serued you. It is to be presumed, that hauing an intent to hurt mee, they haue intended your displeasure against me, by the most horrible crimes they could inuent. They would make me the Instrument of that which they haue promised to the enemies of your Estate, to periuade you. And seeing they cannot now suborne any others, they will accuse them, who in the like affaires haue made proofe of their innocencies, by so many circumstances, as it is not to be beleued they would haue any thought to the contrary. If they will acknowledge your mercy, to continue still culpable, changing onely their offence. Seeing, that since they are become false witnesses, I will say vnto you, my Liege, as the Psalmist said vnto God: Lord come not neere me until I be fortified. I must confesse that I see your countenance (hauing admitted such men to accuse me): seeing that your Maiefty demands my iustification, the which hath retained me, not that my conscience doth accuse me of any fault that is worthy of such an examination. Seeing it doth import your service, it is requisite I should satisfie your Maiefty, your Realme, and mine honour, and free them of my religion from the scandal which they should receiue, if my crimes were not punished, and mine innocency knowne. For the attaining whereof, I assure my selfe that your Maiefty would not deprive me of the liberty which all your subjects of the religion enioy, and the rather, for that no Iudges can bee more interested in these affaires, seeing the question is of the decay of your Realme, to augment that of Spaine, where in all your Subjects haue one common losse; but those of the Religion (whereof the Chambers doe consist) haue a more particular: the which they esteeme more deare than their liues, which is the losse of their exercise. They will therefore bee severe Iudges rather then milde. If they shall finde me guilty they will hate me more then any other, for whom they did least expect it. I most humbly therefore beseech your Maiefty, to send my accusers and accusations, thinking the imputation which is laid vpon me heavy, and the time tedious, vntill your Maiefty may bee fully satisfied of mine innocency: for the speedy effecting whereof, I will attend at Calixtus the iustification of my fault or innocency, iudging that the time which I should haue spent in going to your Maiefty, would haue prolonged the affliction of my soule, remaining accused, seeing that your Maiefty was to send me backe to the Chambers to condemne or absolve me, being the Iudges which your Edict hath giuen me. That it would please you to relinque any mind speedily, in giuing me the means to make my innocency knowne, and that by this proofe you may be reassured of my faithful service, and I shal be content, the which shall be above all things desired of your most humble, most obedient, and most faithful Subject and Seruant, Henry de la Touraine.

The Prince of Guinille commended.

The King caused the Prince of Guinille to be committed to the Duke of Guise his brother, Silley examined him very carefully, this Maiefty relying vpon his wisdom and integrity. He aduised the Government of Provinces why he did so, saying these words

A I haue committed my Nephew the Prince of Guinille, vnto my Nephew the Duke of Guise his brother, for that he had rashly & indiscreetly given care to certain propositions, that were made vnto him against my service: I will hold him in the same guard vntill that matters be made plaine, but I assure my selfe it concerns him only, wherein those of his house haue no share, neither is there any one named or comprehended with him: whereof I thought good to aduertise you.

We need not feare that the hearts of the French, although they be inconstant, will passe any more into Spaine, the Marshall of Birones head hath stoped the passage. There is no man desirous to giue care to the promises of Spaine, hauing such ruinous effects: and who doth not detest that cruell ambition, which hauing corrupted the best blood of the Duke of Biron, bred in him so violent and continuall a feuer of the minde, as after that it had afflicted him above foure yeares, there was no other remedy but by that shameful letting of blood, which made his soule all bloody, and violently to leaue his body. Those that will not be diuerted by the aspect of this head, and which imagine vnto themselves mountaines of gold beyond the Pyrenes, let them consider that a Prince, and chiefe of his party, hauing followed their desires, hath gotten nothing but ruine, after that hee had engaged his liuing, his wives and childrens, he spent five hundred thousand crownes in ready mony, and became indebted vpon his owne credit and his friends, in about a million of gold, he was in the end so disliked, hated and contemned of them, as in feare of canonizing him, the Duke of Feria did giue aduice to make him away, or to keepe him prisoner. We must resist the first thoughts of despite, discontent and rebellion, and take heed lest the desire of new fauours which we affect of the Prince, make vs not forget the former: for hence grow discontents more powerfull to draw vs to ill, then reason is able to restraine vs to good: from despite spring bad desires, which neuer encrease but by fury and blindness, and produce violent motions of ambition, which binde him to vnderake and to doe any thing, although there be nothing that may dispende the Subject from his duty to his Prince.

They did speak, write, and discourse of this death both in their Prose and Rime, some with so small reason, as they strived to finde innocency in the life, and constancy and resolution in the Duke of Birones death, although that in the last there were more chollier and violence, then constancy, whereof patience is one of the principall branches, and in the first so great guilt, as if the Court had quitted him, his conscience could not absolve him. Such as in these discourses desired rather to seem learned, then wise, repented their knowledge, and were in paine. Herein some one did me a bad office, which forceth me to adde something in this Narration for mine owne defence, and is that which I shall say doth not content slander, yet shall it be according vnto truth, or like vnto bad Musicians, who are neuer wearied themselves though their musick be vntunable.

Presently after the D. of Birones execution, I did write six lines to Lions vpon this subject, to dispende my selfe of a longer discourse which they expected, meaning to referre it for this History; whereunto I added six Verses written (as it was said) by one of the first Poets of France, vpon the heads of the Father and Son, the first struck off with a Cannon, the other with a sword. This letter comming before all aduice of so famous an accident, was imparted and copied out greedily, contrary to my intent. In the end it returned to Paris, and from thence to Monceaux where the King was. Hauing found opportunity there to speake to his Maiefty after supper, of a businesse far from this letter, whereon I dreamed no more: hauing told me his pleasure, he added these words: Go and speake with Monsieur de Villeroi, I asked if it were for the businesse whereof I had spoken vnto him; No, said he: and drawing me aside, it pleased him to heare me, and to giue mee better words then I could hope for, adding in the end, Speake to Monsieur de Villeroi, without giuing me any farther knowledge of the matter. I repaired vnto him early in the morning, not knowing what to say, but only to receiue his Maiesties intention after some complements of courtesie, he caused all them in the Chamber to retire, and then he said vnto me; You are made the author of a Letter touching the Marshall of Biron, which hath gone far out of the Realme: it contains but six or seven lines, & hath prints in it, which his King hauing well considered of, so much the more offended, that hauing made you his Historiographer, it appears plainly what your passion might be, words being the interpreter of the minds affection.

It behooued me then to protest that I had neither spoken nor written any thing against the Kings Iustice, to lament the Duke of Birones death, who in his life had not giuen uen me occasion to bewaile it, with any other then a common affection, which grieues A that so braue a Knight should forget himselfe : that hauing seene a discourse of my writing of the causes and effects of the wars betwixt the Houses of France and Austria, vnto the peace of Veruins, thinking that I had not spoken of him neither so often, nor so highly as he desired, for that all the glory of braue exploits should be referred vnto the head, especially being in the Army, he complained to the Chancellor of Belieure, and discovered his choller more plainly to De Pic, Ambassador in Swisserland, adding cruell threats to his bad words against me. Here he cut me off, and said; This letter speaks not after this manner, and I beleue you will know it by the copy. As the first three words

I did auow that which was of my stile, if I had denyed it, they could hardly haue represented the Originall: but being loath to lye vnto God, I spake my conscience, which was free from scruple and apprehension. He approved this freedome, and said; That the last line was it which had offended the King; They which haue his life, doe not beleue his death: whereunto I replied, That the copy was not conformable to the Originall, & that by an iniurious forgetfulness, or an extreme impolure, they had left out a word which did peruert the sense, and had giuen the King occasion to be offended, and that there was,
They that haue knowne his life, will not beleue his death: That besides this omission, there was nothing in the letter but might be spoken of so extraordinary an accident, and death of that quality, and that there was great difference betwixt writing of an History & a letter. And admit he had said that he went as cheerfully to execution, as he had in former times to a charge, that he had amazed death, and made the Hang-man to tremble, this did not impugn the iudgment of the Court, seeing that the innocency of the condemned is not iudged by his constancy in dying: That it is not strange nor incredible to write, that a man which had condemned his life, and braued death in so many occasions, had shewed courage in this last action.

That if they had obscured violent motions in him, a death of that fashion might well put a man of his humour into fury. This letter did also speake of that head which had caused the death of the body, saying, That the one was generous, and the other full of glorious wounds. But these termes were to be considered according to the simplicity D of my intention, which did not iudge of this head as it was upon a scaffold, but for that which it had bene in many great actions, and had purchased honourable marks of valor for his Princes seruice: That it were a point of great ignorance, or impudent flattery, to attribute glory to an act full of shame and ignominy, and to confound the light of his first actions, with the darknesse of the last. These reasons did content him, and he ended with these words, The King would not speake vnto you of it, for that he hath a good opinion of you, but thought fit that I should tell you of it. Thus much I thought fit to say for my Apologie, passion hauing moued me to make this little digression. The King hauing since bene satisfied of the truth, he returned againe into saueur.

There came fiftene or sixtene Deputies out of Dauphiné to Paris. This Prouince was giuen to the Crowne of France, by Humber Prince of Dauphiné, upon condition that the Kings eldest Son, (the presumptive heire of the Crowne) should be Soueraigne thereof from his birth. Hauing made great ioy for this blessing, and to see that which they had not seene since King Charles the eight, they made choice of some out of the three Estates of the Country to go and performe their first duty of subiection, & to know their Soueraigne Lord. terme of Villards Archbishop of Viennae, was the chief of this Ambassage, the which he gouerned and performed happily, and with honour. Hauing done their duties to the King and Queene, and let them vnderstand the charge which he had from the States of the Country, with the other Deputies, hee was led to Saint Germaines, to see their new Prince, who was vnder a cloth of Estate in his Cradle, vpon a little bed. The Count Sissim, Gouernour and Lieutenant Generall of Dauphiné, his Gouernesse, and his Nephew by him. The Archb. of Viennae spake vnto him standing, all the rest kneeled of one knee. The substance of which speech was, That the ioy of France had bene infinite by his birth, foreseeing that her felicity should be imperfect without it; and that the blessing of peace could not continue without his birth, who should be the death of all pretenses of ciuill warres, but your Prouince of Dauphiné hath faine greater cause of ioy, for that it sees in effect, that which the rest of the Realme hath but in hope. Those which haue beleued that felicity could

The Archbishop of

spoke to the Dauphin.

A could not be in the infancy of a child, seeing it requires a continuance of yeares, and a constant knowledge of vertue and fortune, meant it not by Kings Children, and about all of the first borne of the Crowne of France, at whose first birth we see all the fauour maie vpon his head, the which Heauen can poure vpon them whom it will make happy.
The same day, my Lord, that you saw the light, the Sonne did salue you a great Prince, and the Sonne of a great King, you are borne our Soueraigne Lord, and we are become your faithfull vassalls, and most humble Subiects, so as this Prouince, which amidst so many afflictions hath sighed about an hundred yeares, for the day when it should see borne that sacred Bud of the Royall Flower, holds it the greatest point of glory and felicity, not to know any power more absolute and soueraigne then yours, and to obey you before you know what it is to command. This Cradle (my Lord, about the which the Eternall Providence, which hath a speciall care ouer this Realme, hath appointed the Angels for your guard) is the throne wherein we adore in your liuing Image the inuisible Maiesty of the liuing God. The rocking of this Cradle hath sealed the felicity of France, which began to be shaken by furious and dangerous attempts both without and within. It is an extreme griefe vnto vs, that the law of this Cradle will not suffer vs where you are, and make vs so happy as to vnderstand you. And if you vnderstand not but by the language of Infants, which betraies, you shall know the affections of your peoples hearts by the reares of ioy which fall from their eies, praising God that it hath pleased him to giue them a Prince, issued from the first Crowne of the world, who carries in his heart the generosity of his father, and in his eies the sweetnesse of his mother. A Prince which in greatnesse of courage, and in reputation of braue and immortal actions shall exceed the glorie of all the Princes of the land and sea, as the Dolphin in lightnesse and swiftnesse passeth all the creatures both of Land and Sea. We acknowledge you for our Prince and Soueraigne Lord vnder the King your Father, and the Queene your Mother, and we doe now offer vnto your Highnesse our liues, our persons, and our fortunes, for homage of our most humble and faithfull subiection. These goodly words were accompanied with a rich present: it was a Cupbord of Plate, richly wrought and beautified with sundry figures of Dolphins, being valued at twelue thousand crownes. All that attended vpon the Prince had presents of some value, or else Medailes made for that purpose.

The Sonnes Present serued for the Mother. The King was the better pleased with this Deputation, for that it was the first yeare of his Sons infancy: and it is certaine, that of all the proofes of duty and affection which the subiects can yeeld vnto their Soueraigne, those are most commendable which are done without design. As Dauphiné doth acknowledge this Prince for their Soueraigne Lord vnder the King: so Bourgongne, and the Countries of Bresse, Baugy, Valromey, and Gez, (which are annexed vnto it) had him for their Gouernour: But during his Infancie, and vntill he were capable to vndergo the functions of that Charge, the power of Lieutenantie was giuen to Roger of Bellegarde, first Gentleman of the Chamber, and Master of the Kings Horse, who tooke his oath in the Kings hands: His Patent was read in the Parliament of Dijon, the Citie receiued him with all sorts of honours, and went to fetch him at the Carthouses where he made his abode, attending the preparation for his reception.

The Kings desires being seconded with so many prosperities, it pleased him of his owne bountie to take pittie of the innes and calamities of his subiects, in reuoking the Imposition of the Soule vpon the Livers (or taxes) which they called the Pan- carte. He would not that this great reliefe should surprize his peoples hearts, declaring his pleasure (some months before it was put in practice, to the end that things being first expected before they were enjoyed, might be the more acceptable. The King raised his coynes of gold and silver, the crownnes of six shillings, and six pence, the quarter of the crownne of fiftene soules, and the strange to some twenty and some Deniers, that the coynes of Silver might bee valued after the rate of three pence and four pence to the crownne. And as that which is held good and profitable at one time, is not so at another, the counting by crownnes (found in the yeare one thousand five hundred threety and seuen, profitable, and now very (noted) is now forbidden, and that of the livres brought into practice in commandment, and set on foot, as it was before, since King Philip the Thise, Francois the first, and Henry the second. There is now which should be more firme and lesse variable then the standerd of mony, and there is no crime a lesse pardonable then that which offends the Kings picture. For the effecting whereof, all coynes should be of pure metall without mixture, all good, all silver, or all copper. For, as long as mixtures shall be allowed, the Mint-men will alwaies alter the price of that which should be immutable. The abundance of Dozens in France is such, as it is impossible to purge the Realme, but by a generall decay of those that are made, which would bee the ruine and impoverishment of the poore people, or by a defence not to coyne any other hereafter but of silver.

There sprung up a new ioy for all France. The heauens which in former times did raine gold at Rhodes for the birth of Minerva, did now poure forth a great shower of ioy for the birth of the Kings first lawfull daughter. The Queene was happily brought in bed on the 22 day of November in the morning, and thanks were giuen vnto God, according to the vsuall custome. The Riuer of Saonne was ouerflowed in that fort as the townes that were seated vpon the banks, were in great danger of this inundation. The bridge at Lions was so shaken, as if it had not been fortified by the weight that was laid vpon it, the two Townes had bene diuided by the riuer. This inundation was greater and more furious, then that which ioynd the Riuer of Roine and Saonne, in the place of Comfort; but not so terrible as another which happened an hundred yeares since, in the moneth of February, with such violence as the waues past ouer the Bridge, and beat downe one of the Arches towards the Exchange.

Mynes of gold discovered.

This yeare all the Elements did contribute to the prosperity and blessings of the peace, the Earth did let the King see a new production of his treasure. They discovered in many parts of the Realme mynes of gold, silver, copper, and lead. In the Countrey of Lionnois, nere vnto a Village called S. Martin the plaine, which depends of an Earldome of the Church of S. Iohn of Lions, there was a Myne of Gold found by a Countryman, who labouring in his Vineyard, found a dirt stone intermixt with gold, whereby they gathered an insatiable assurance, that this member was not without a body. De Vic Superintendant of the Iustice at Lions, had commandement from the King to see some to worke in it. The first production was admirable, and among many goodly peeces, one was shewed vnto the King very rich, in the which the Gold did appeare, and put forth like vnto the buds of a Vine, as fine as that of Carauana, so as it might be said, that these fine thousand yeares the Sunne had made nothing more perfect in the bowells of the Earth. For it was not Gold in pepin nor in poulder, as in the running streams of the New-found Land, nor mixt with land, as in Bohemia, but in Stones and in Rocks, all pure gold, or pure silver: for alwaies the one goes with the other, perfect of it selfe without mixture of any other metalls. The King imitating his Predecessors, who had alwaies fauoured the workes of Mynes, which bring infinite commodities, made a generall Edict for the ordering of the worke and worke-men: He created a great Master and a Controulr general ouer all the Mynes of France, with priuiledges to draw in foraigne worke-men, which they could not want. Bellegard was the first great Master of the Mynes, who resigned it to Rust Beaulieu, Secretary of State. Blingin, first Groomer of the Kings Chamber, was Controulr general.

The new alliance with the Swisles being concluded, they departed forty two among them, to whom they gave power to sweare the obseruation thereof. They came into France in September, being honourably receiued in all places. The fourteenth of October they came into Charanton, a league from Paris, where they were royally entertained at the Kings owne charge, in Senays house. After dinner the D. of Montbazan, and the Lord of Montigny Governor of Paris, went out of the city with an hundred or sixscore Gentlemen to meet them, and to welcome them in the Kings name. At S. Anthanies gate, Burgelme, Prouost of Merchants, with the Sherifes, Councillors of the City, Quarter-Masters, Chief Bourgeois, and the three companies of the Archers of the city, receiued them, and conducted them to their lodging in S. Martins street: where besides good words of welcome, they found presents to procure thirty Gammons of Bacon, dried swer meats, and store of Ipocras and choice wines. The next day they dined with the Chancellor. After dinner he went to his Maiesty to the Louvre, desiring them to haue a little patience until the King sent for them. Some after the Duke of Elgillon accompanied with fifty young Gentlemen of the best houses then in Court, went so farth

A them, and to conduct them vnto the King: entering into the base Court of the Louvre, the Duke Montpensier, with many Knights of the holy Ghost, and Noblemen of mark, receiued them in the Kings name: At the staires foot, going vp to the Hall, the Count of Soissons, with many Gouvernors of Prouinces, and old Knights of the Order receiued them, & so conducted them into his Maiesties Chamber, where they did their obeysance, the King taking every one of them by the hand. Then the Aduoyer of Berne, who was their Speaker, said vnto him in his owne language, That the cause of their coming, was to sweare the renewing of the alliance, and to assure his Maiesty of their faithfull seruice. V. gr. did interpret vnto the King, who after he had answered them, and witnessed the content which he had of the declaration they had made in the behalfe of their superiors, hee told them, That they were welcome: from thence they went to kisse the Queens hand, who was in her chamber, with all the Princesses and Ladies of the Court, presenting their seruice vnto her, and the good affection of their Superiors, for the which shee thanked them.

Before the oath was taken, they entreated the King, that it would please him to heare some particular charges they had from their Superiors. The Chancellor was appointed to heare what they demanded: the which the Aduoyer of Berne deliuered vnto him in three demands. The first was, That it would please his Maiesty to augment the summe of foure hundred thousand crownes, which was appointed to be distributed every yeare among them, being not sufficient to pay their interests. The second was, That the priuiledges of those of their Nation, which trafficked in France, might be confirmed. The third was, to giue them the declarations that were promised, as well vnto the five petty Cantons, for the continuance of their alliance with Milan and Sauoy, without infringing that of his Maiesty, as to the Protestant Cantons, that they might not be forced to giue men to make war in France against him of the Religion. To the first his Maiesty made answer; That the ciuill and foraigne wars, wherewith his people had bene ruined, would not giue him means to do better yet, and that they must content themselves with that which had bene promised. The second and third were granted, and the Declarations required by them, signed. Sunday the 12 of October was appointed for the swearing of the Alliance in our Ladies Church, where the Ambassadors were conducted by Monsieur De Vic. The King being come to the Church and set in State, the Princes of Condé & Conty went to fetch the two and forty Ambassadors in the Bishops Hall, and conducted them to their places. All being set, the Archbishop of Viennne approached to his Maiesty, carrying a booke of the Euangelists in his hands; and at the same instant the Ambassadors drew neare also. Before them was Vaguer, Secretary of State at Solvire, betwixt Monsieur De Sillery and De Vic, he carried betwixt his armes a cushion of crimson Veluet, garnished with gold, on the which were two Treaties of the Alliance, the one in French, the other in the Germane tongue, sealed with his Maiesties Seale, and those of the Cantons and their Allies. After they had all done their duties, and saluted his Maiesty, Monsieur De Sillery said vnto the King; "That these Treaties of Alliance were the same which his Predecessors had made with the Seigneuries of the Cantons; and that whatsoeuer was added, was for the honour and profit of his Maiesties seruice. The Aduoyer of Berne, who deliuered the speech, said; That the Seigneurs of the Cantons, their Superiors, had held it for a great honour, that the King desired their alliance, for the which thinking themselves much bound, they had enioyned them to thank his Maiesty, and to offer him on their behalfe their most humble seruice in all occasions that should be offered, and of all might be expected of true and faithfull allies and confederates, according to the Treaties of their alliance. That they were also sent by their Superiors for the performing of the oath, to the end they might faithfully obserue what was contained in the Treary, and to beseech his Maiesty to doe the like for his part, as it belongs to good and loyall friends, allies and confederates. That by his Maiesties commandement, they presented themselves for the performance of the oath, praying God to poure out his blessings vpon so good an alliance, to the content of both the Estates: with prayers, that it would please God to preferue the King and the Dauphin their new ally, in all prosperitie, and giue him a long life and happy raigne. The King hearing him, stood vp with his hat on, and answered him with a great Maiesty. That he desired to renue the treary of peace and alliance with the Seigneurs of the Cantons, for the great esteeme hee made of the

That he did accept the offer of their succours, and did in like sort promise to assist them with all his forces and means, against any one that should seek to oppress their liberty. The which he desired them to beleue, with assurance that he had neuer failed in his promises: being ready to sweare the treaty of alliance with them, & to obserue it inuolubly, as he had giuen charge to the Chancellor to leaue vnderstand more at large.

Oration
made by the Chancelor to the Suiſſes.

"The Chancellor made a long speech vnto them to the same purpose, saying: My Masters, you haue heard from the Kings mouth, the contentment he receiued of your Legation, and the esteeme which he makes, and will alwaies make of the good friendship, alliance and confederacy with the Cantons, ancient and faithful friends, Allies, and Confederates to the Crown of France. Whereunto I will adde the ioy and generall content which the three Orders of the Realme doe in like manner receiue. The memory of former ages, and all histories may teach vs, that those Estates haue beene held most powerful and assured, which haue beene supported with most friends, and yet it is seldome seen (what need sower Potentates haue to fortifie themselves with alliance of their neighbours) but that there remains some distrust, that the greatnesse of their Allies will in the end cause the ruine of their Estates. The alliance of France with the most vertuous nation of the Leagues, hath alwaies been free from suspicion. First, there was neuer question, pretension, nor contention betwixt the two Estates, by reason of the Countries which are held by either part. The Kings of France since the Treaties, and long time before, haue alwaies desired to fauour the greatnesse and prosperity of the Nation of the Leagues, whereunto besides their naturall inclination and good will, they were moued by their owne interest and reason of State. The greater and more happy that you haue bene or shall bee, the more they shall thinke themselves fortified with so good a friend. You haue heretofore made the like iudgment of the Kings of France, and his Maiesty here present assures himselfe, that you will continue the like opinion of him, as you haue had of his Predecessors, and will still haue the same confidence, and retain the same good opinion of your friendship.

"He thinke, that your greatnesse is his owne; hee loves and esteemes you for the great and worthy proofes hee hath made of your valour and affection to the good of his affairs; he entreates you to beleue that his greatnesse and prosperity shall be alwaies yours, & vpon your loyalty, at your command, not only bound to the assistance which is promised you by the Treaty of Alliances, but also if it should chance, that any Prince or Potentate whatsoever, without exception, should attempt against your Estates, he hath resolved to let you know by the effects, that your greatnesse is in like recommendation vnto him as his owne, and in such an occasion he will neither spare his Person, nor any means which God hath giuen him. I will tell you, that as you haue found the Kings of France affected to loue and cherish you, so haue you found their Ambassadors most ready to serue you, and to employ themselves in any thing that might concern the good and prosperitie of your affaires, they did neuer thinke that which we haue blamed in some, that they should neuer confirm our vnion, but by diuiding you, and troubling your quiet: but contrariwise, I may speake confidently and with truth, that they haue done the best offices they could, to nourish peace, concord, vnion, and good correspondency amongst you, the which hath made you hitherto fearfull vnto all your enemies, and your Countrey as happy and flourishing as any others of Christendome: The actions of the Ambassadors discover their Masters intentions. The successe of things happened, doe also giue a great testimony of the good that is in this happy alliance.

"In the time of King Francis the first, of glorious memory, we did see in the years 1544, all Germany, the Netherlands, Spaine, and in a manner all Italy had conspired the ruine of this Realm of France, vnder the conduct of the Emperor Charles the fifth, with whom Henry the eight King of England did also ioyne. King Francis had not then any other friend or confederate to succour him but the Nation of the Leagues, wherewith haue fortified his Armies, he won the Battell of Cerisoles: made head against the great forces which the Emperour had gathered together from all parts of Christendome, made him to confume his Army which was entred into Champagne, and forced him to demand a peace, the which was afterwards concluded at Cresp. As the alliance with the Leagues 1602 "hath beene happy for France, so we may say that the alliance of our Kings, hath brought char. happinesse to your Nation, as when they haue seene France vnited and in League with the Cantons, neither the Emperors nor any Prince of his house or others, durst attempt to make warre against you, and yet before Maximilian the first and his Predecessors you haue beene forced, for the preferation of your liberty, to hazard many battells, in the which by the grace of God you haue gotten the victory. We hope, and we promise with the help of God, that this good fortune shall continue on either side, if we do follow the wife counsels and resolutions of our forefathers, remaining well vnited together, and not giuing eare to any thing that may breed alteration, or a coldnesse in our alliance, if we perseue it carefully in the same faith whereon it is grounded, and doe cherish it by all the good offices which true and faithfull friends, allies and confederates, may expect. It is the oath and promise which you make presently vnto the King. It is the oath and promise which the King doth make presently vnto you, and will religiously obserue. These words being ended the Chancellor inuited them to the oath.

"Which done, the Ambassadors presented themselves to sweare the oath, laying their hands by order of their Cantons vpon the holy Euangelist, to euery one of the which, the Chancellor sayd. You sweare and promise vpon the holy Euangelist, in the name of your Seigneurs and Superiours, well and faithfully to obserue the Treaty of alliance made betwixt his Maiesty and your Superiours, without any contradiction or breach directly or indirectly. The order which the Ambassadors held in the oath was, first, The Cantons of Berne, Lucerne, Zurich, Schwitz, Vonderwald, Zug, Glais, Basle, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffuse and Appenzel. And of allies, the Abbot of Saint Gall, and the Towne of Saint Gall. Of the Grisons, the Canton of Grise, the Cades, the Canton of Droituera, Valais, Mulhus, Rotweil and Brenne.

swore oath.

"After all the Ambassadors had taken the oath, the King likewise sayd: That hee did sweare and promise to obserue the Treaty as it had beene agreed. Which done, they dined in the Bishops Palace. The Prince of Conde sat at the boards end, the Princes of Cony, Soissons and Montpensier, the Constable, the Dukes of Neuers and Elquillon, the Earles of Auvergne and Sommeriue, with many others were on the right hand, and the forty two Ambassadors with some French Gentlemen on the left. About the end of dinner, his Maiesty (who had dined apart) came to see them, commanding euery one to keepe his place, then he called for wine, and dranke to all his friends and allies, and so went presently to the Louvre: towards euening bonfires were made and twenty peeces of cannon shot off in signe of ioy. During their aboad at Paris they were feasted by the Prouost of Merchants, the Count of Soissons, the Constable, and the Duchesse of Longueuill, and the Friday after the ceremony of the oath, they tooke their leaue of the King, who gaue to euery one a chaine of gold, with his picture, and what was appointed for their voyage, stay and returne, and so they returned into their Country.

"In the Iurisdiction of the Town of Langres (in a village called Aprez) Claude Berenger, Lord of Pont, and Guillemette of Metz his wife made their residence, haueing also a Nephew of the sayd Berengers with them named also de Pont. This woman being suborned by a Chanons ballard of Langres, named Chauuitty, Nicholas Iourné and Iohn Fernet, called the youth, to satisfie their fleshly lust without suspicion and at more liberty, they reſolued with her and a maid of hers to make away her husband and his Nephew.

"This plot being layd, they found an easie meanes for the execution. These three Adulterers seeing the Gentleman gone to Langres, goe a hunting with his Nephew, whom they flew in the thicke of a wood, and threw him into a deepe hollow place betwixt two high rockes, out of the which hee could neuer be drawne. These murderers seeing themselves rid of this poore young man, reported vnto the Gentewoman what they had done, concluding with her to cut her husbands throat at his returne from Langres, the which they put in practice the same night that hee returned, for this poore Gentleman haueing receiued a kisse (of this daughter of Indas) being very weary, went to bed and slept, the which she knew, and presently brought these murderers into his chamber, who comming easily to this poore young mans bed, being asleepe, they cut his throat, and bury him abroad among the Rockes.

"After this murder they giue it out, that the Lord of Pont was slaine in his voyage to Langres. His wife put on a mourning weed, and makes a counterfeite shew of heavinesse:

nelle: but God suffers not such offences to bee vntreuealed, a poore man found out the hole where they had buried him, and gaue notice thereof vnto the Iustice, who went to the place, and caused the Gentlewoman to be brought thither, who at the first seemed not to know him, but seeing that he was knowne by euery one, and vanquished by apparent signes, which they shewed her, in the end she knew him. But the Officers did not proceed against her with that dexterity that Lugely did to the wife of Claude Anthoine Merchant of Vines at Paris, who had also caused her husband Anthoine to be flaine coming from a house of his, by souldiers whom one named Lameau (her Adulterer) had suborned, for the wife of the said Anthony was hanged, and Lameau broken alive at the place Maubert: but this Gentlewoman De Pons, seeing the Iustice to proceed against her by informations, and that they ment to apprehend her, she made an escape with all her complices and her seruants, and could neuer after be taken; yet through their contempt their process was made, and all of them were hanged in picture.

The other accident hapned at Paris, of a Gentleman which slew his wife and her Adulter lying together, in this manner. This Gentleman called Seigneur Scipio, being advertised that his wife (a faire yong Gentlewoman) did abandon herselfe to lust, and defiled his bed with a yong man: he admonished his wife, and said vnto her, That he did willingly pardon what was past, but if she returned any more to her sin, he would kill her with her Ruffian, if he found them together. The Gentlewoman scornes this aduice, and another giuen her by a wife and vertuous Gentlewoman; That if she did not cary herselfe more discreetly, without doubts her husband would doe her a shrewd turne. She answered her, That her husband was too very a foole to attempt it.

A pardon promised to all that were of the Duke of Biron's conspiracy.

Seigneur Scipio advertised of the impudency and lewd behaiour of his wife, takes his horse, and make a shew to goe into the Country: his wife goes to the Sermon at Saint Germaine l'Auxerrois, Scipio returns, and thrusts himselfe into his closet vnknowne of any one. The Sermon being done, she returned presently to her house, and advertised her Adulterer of her husbands absence, who failed not to come at the assignation he gaue him, and then they went into the husbands bed: who coming out of his closet, found them naked together, and flue them; the adulterer had thirty wounds, and the woman feuen and twenty: and so their deservable fin was known by the view of their dead bodies, the which were brought before the Iustice, being a lamentable thing, and pitifull to behold: The husband did easily obtaine his pardon the which proceeds from the Kings bounty. It is a iust griefe the which may suddenly transport a husband, finding his wife with another, as these poore infortunate wretches were. The King about this time pardoned all those, that had bene of the Duke of Biron's conspiracy, so as they came & declared themselves within two moneths, and caused their pardons to be confirmed.

The situation of Geneva.

The discourse of the enterprises and intelligences which the D. of Sauoy and his father haue had, to surprise the City of Geneva, with their pretensions, and their defence on the contrary side to maintaine their Liberties, would make a good volume. They relied vpon the publike assurance of the Treaties of Veruins, Paris and Lions, in the which they held themselves to be comprehended, and thereby assured from all the designs of their neighbours. The Duke of Sauoy did not hold himselfe tyed by the peace, nor to seeke the meanes to become Master thereof, and to reigne there as his Predecessors had done, and that there was no danger to breake his faith with people of a contrary Religion: This City doth so much import his Estate, as it deserves, if not to breake the peace, at the least to straine and wrest it. It is situated at the end of Lake Lemane, which serues for a ditch on the North part: The riuer of Rhofne passeth by the towne on the West side, and vpon the East and South is the County of Sauoy, the great and rich plaines of the Bailiwicks of Thonon and Ternier, and the Countreys of Chablais and Faucigny. The Duke had great pretensions to it, as souereigne of the County of Geneva, and Vicar perpetuall of the Empire. He maintained, that if the Bishop of Geneva had some absolute authority, it was a preiudice to the Souereignty, the which had alwaies remained to his Predecessors, as Earles of Morienne or Duke of Sauoy.

The Dukes pretensions.

The City of Geneva (who to maintaine her liberty findes all propositions of seruile trouble some and strange, hath alwaies decreed the Sauoyards command) sayes; That the Bishops of Geneva haue bene alwayes soueraigne Princes of their City, and that the Earles of Sauoy and Geneva, haue often done homage to the Bishops of Geneva, for the

A the Baronies of Ternier, Remilly, Montfaucon, and for the County of Geneva. That the Duke of Sauoy can pretend no right, as Vicar perpetuall of the Empire, being granted by surpris, and reuoked after examination of the case by the same Emperor, who vpon complaint made vnto him by a Bishop of Geneva, called Arduin, declared that hee had bene surprisid in that behalfe, and disanulled all that he had giuen to the Earle of Sauoy his cousin, forbidding him to contradict this reuocation, vpon paine of his indignation, and a thousand markes of pure gold. The parties differing vpon the maine point, the question could not be decided without proofe. The Duke would haue no other production, but his title of Duke and Souereigne of Geneva, to maintaine the which he besieged the Towne, and brought it to extremity, as hath bene shewed elsewhere. It is true, that without the Kings protection this City would not long resist the forces of the Duke of Sauoy.

The defence of the Genevois.

The Inhabitants haue bene reduced to that Estate as they might say as the Capouans did vnto the Romanes, imploring their ayde against the Samnites: It is a grieuous and miserable thing, what our misfortune forceth vs to confesse (fathers conscript) to be brought to that extremity as hereafter we must abandon our selues, either to our friends, or to our enemies. If you defend vs, we shal be yours; if you forsake vs, the Samnites. Being abandoned by the King, there is no defence for them but will proue weak against so mighty a Neighbour, who shall bee alwaies assisted by the greatest forces of Italy and Spaine. And if they be succored by them of Bearne with whom they haue an equall alliance, they shall run the hazard of Common-weales, which in the end haue bene recompenced with a forced subiection. The Suisses propound not bare words in their amities, they ground them vpon equality of profit. The humor of this City is to be free, there is not any Citizen but speaks freely to any Prince how great soeuer, as Demosthenes said, when they talked of the milde and easie command of Antipater, We will thus no more after how gentle soeuer. The Inhabitants of this City haue an hereditary hatred against the Duke, the which is so rooted in them, as if hee did presse them by force to the extremities of a siege, they would resolue with them of Xantho to mingle their ashes with the smoak of their houses. The Duke hauing attempted what he could by force, resolues to surpriseth them now by policy. He made an enterprise as full of proofes of his courage, iudgement and good conduct, as of his misfortune.

It had bene long in hand, and yet nothing was discovered, yet was it well known, that he had caused ladders to be made. That from all parts he drew vnto him men of resolution; that he had good numbers at Chambery well payed, and wel entertained, attending the full ripeness of this designe, and yet they knew not how he would employ them, preparing onely their hearts and armes for the execution of their Princes commandements, referring the conduct thereof to his wisdom. Yet could they not beleue that this designe was against them of Geneva, for that he treated with them of the liberty of traffike, hauing some few daies before, sent President Rochette to let them vnderstand, that it was expedient to treat of some manner how to lise for the ease of the people.

They were so well pleased with this motion and his assurances, that although Cities of this condition do not easily beleue them that make warre against them, yet they were lulled asleep therewith, and neglected their preservation, thinking that there was nothing of more power to defend them, then the Treaties of peace betwixt France, Spaine and Sauoy. In the which they thought themselves to be comprehended vnder the name of Allies and confederates of the Cantons. In like sort the Dukes subiects went so freely to Geneva, as the Eue before the execution, certaine Gentlemen who knew something of this designe, being come into the City vpon their horses, said, That they would come the next day to conclude the bargain; and others had vied the like speeches for other Merchandize, believing that a heavy duty was assured: but Heaven which laughs at the presumptions of their Imaginations, had resolved to humble them.

The Governour of Lions had speedily intelligence, that the Duke of Sauoy was come on this side the Alpes, and that hee had brought scaling ladders: hee advertised the King thereof, and made promise for the City of Lions, of which Lieutenant General for the Duke on this side the Alpes, had drawne them downe, and lodged them in Townes nearest to Geneva. The Duke was at Chambery the time of the execution was referred to the General. The troops began to march about six of the clocke.

Gouverneur

Governor of Bonnes had been a chiefe actor in this designe, holding it so certaine, as he said, It would die if he did not live in Geneva. D'Albigny had set guards vpon all the waies to Ray all passengers, that no report might go before them, and that the Duke of Savoies marching might be vnknowne, to whom they represented the execution to be so easie and certaine, as he would needs be there himselfe in person to reape the fruit, and the triumph which his grand-father had begun. He pass the Alpes but with five in his company, and came the same day neere vnto Tremblieres, a village but a league distant from Geneva. They which should execute the enterprise and giue the first attempt, went along the riuer of Albe, that the noise of the water might keepe the Sentinells from hearing them as they marched. Two things hapned that were prediCTIONS of bad successe. There appeared vnaccustomed fires in the ayre. A Hare crossed them many times in their way, and gaue them a false alarm. Many things were seene that night that troubled their imagination, causing them to take Groues for Squadrons of men, and Thistles for Lances, as it hapned once before Paris. About eleuen of the clocke at night, they discovered certaine stakes, on the which the Serge-makers of Geneva did drie their Serge. Those that were in the foremost ranks would haue charged them, thinking it was some Ambuscado. From thence they passe along the riuer of Rofne, placing the body of their troopes in the meadow of Plainpalais. Brigade with those that were appointed for the escalado, follow D'Albigny, who leads them into the ditches by the counterscarpe, on the side of the Coartiere, without being discovered by the Sentinells, although the Duckes in the ditch made what noise they could to awake them of Geneva, as the geefe had done at Rome against the Gaules. They passed the ditch vpon hurdels, and planted three Ladders against the wals, they were of a strange inuention, being portable vpon Moyles, and to be make a long and as short as they pleased, and yet were as strong as if they had bene but of one peece. If they had bene as fortunate, as they were well furnished of all things necessary, they had executed their designe happily. They had made prouision of hatchets, hammers, and pin-cers, to cut in sunder chains of Iron, breake open lockes and to pull out great nailes and barres of gates. They had many Petards, and few that could vfe them.

Fortune, which is powerfull in such enterprises fayled them, after that place had brought them into the middle of the towne, and made them Masters of the freets above two houres. There were almost two hundred men mounted by one of their Ladders. Briguelot was the first, carrying himselfe more valiantly then wisely. Having recovered the wall, he surpris'd the souldier that stood Sentinell, he got the word from him, slew him, and cast him into the ditch, staying in his place for him that went the round, that he might doe as much to him, the which he effected, coming to give the word in his eare. The boy which carried the Lanthorne fled, and advertised the Court of guard what hapned to his Master, wherewith notwithstanding they were not greatly moved.

This was betwixt one and two of the clocke, attending the houre offoure, for then they had propounded to begin the execution, meaning to give more time to them that were to second them, and to haue the day draw neere, for thain all executions of warre which are done in the night, there is confusion. The affailants had a good hoores respit to mount, and as much time more before they incourted any that made resistance. If D'Albigny had bene within to vfe the benefit of the time, and to dispose more wisely of things, then Somas, Brigantes, or Attignas had done, they might boldly haue said the towne had been won. Halfe an houre after two of the clocke, a Sentinell in the tower of the mint, hauing heard some ruffling in the ditch, foot off his peece to giue the alarm, and forced Brigantes to discouuer himselfe, charging all that were at the count of guard of the new gate, to plant the Petard there, and to make an entry for the body of the army which was in Plainspalais. They forced the count of guard being 25 men: but against the Maxims of warre, which commands them to kill all, they let one escape, who ran away and let downe the portcullis, to make their Petard unprofitable. The towne was full of cries and fearful exclamations, whereof the Spaniards shoud haue made their profit, and increased their courages, as it did daunt the inhabitants, who knew not which way to turne, some crying to one gate, others running to another. But the affailants left themselves in the appearance of so happy a successe, that without thought they giuen an alarm at some gate to diuide the forces of the Towne. Those that were within had no vfe of their hatchets, hammers and pincers: they did forget to fire some houles, and they were hurried with

A dulnesse of spirit, thinking more of booty & spoile, then to make perfect their conquest. In the meane time, the Consul cries as they did sometimes at Rome: Hee that loves me, let him follow me. Some Countrymen of the neighbour villages which kept guard in the Towne-house by turnes, being led by some Capitaines and Townesmen, presented themselves to the new gate, they were valiantly repulsed, and yet the first thor they made, slew their Petardier, who was bulke about his Petard.

This first charge had not dislodged them, if the whole strength of the Inhabitants had not come, and charged them so furiously, as they began to give way, shewing neither conduct nor courage. Necessity which breeds assurance, even vnto them that are borne without courage, made the Townsmen so resolute in this defence, as the Sauoyards did presently turne their backs. The nimblest were forced to returne to their ladders, which now could no longer serue them, for a Cannon planted vpon the Bulwarke de l'Oye, against the ditch, had broken them in such sort, as they left foure and fifty dead vpon the place, along the Curtaine of Corrairie, and thirtee that were taken alieue. If the townsmen had had souldiers enough to haue made a fallie in this confusion, those that were at Plainpalais had not returned in so good order. There were thirtee taken alieue, vpon promise that was giuen them that they should be prisoners of warre, for else they would haue preferred an honorable death, before any promise that was made them, to take them alieue, and to disarm them. Assignac was amongst them, who fought courageously, and gave the order of Saint Maurice (which he wore) to his seruant, willing him to save himselfe, being resolved to dye with his sword in his hand. It had been better for him to haue been slaine at the combate of D. Philippin, then to bee referred for so ignominious a death.

The Seigneury would not intreat them as prisoners taken in the warre, but like theeues that had entred the towne by surpriſe againſt the Law of Nations, and the publike faith. They ſaid that the Duke was too noble a Prince to adow ſo wicked and treacherous an A&C. There were many opinions vpon the Iudgement of their death. The moſt moderate concluded to haue them put to ranſome, others to keep them priſoners, that they might ſerue for exchange if ocaſion required, through the continuance of the warre : but the moſt violent ſtirred vp the people, repreſenting vnto them their Religion, the rauiſhing of their wiues and daughters : the murder, ſack and perpetuall ſlauiery concluded againſt them, and the lamentations of their widowes and children that had been ſlaine, the which being well conſidered of, made the mildeſt opinions ſeeme vniſt. So as they were condemned to be hanged. They requeſted their heads might be cut off like Gentlemen, the which was granted them, but it was after they had been ſtrangled. The threecore and ſeuenteeene heads, as well of thoſe that had bene charged, as of the others that had bene ſlaine, were planted vpon the Gallowes, and their bodies thrown into the riuer of Rhodan. On the Tueſday after they made a generall ſalt for their deliuary. They preſently ſent for all their neighbors for ſuccors. They publiſhed in all places, the wonders of this deliuary. & they wrote vnto the Governour of Lions, in this manner.

My Lord, you have vnderstood heretofore, by many of our letters, how his Highnesse of Saucy, notwithstanding that he knew, and had confessed, that wee were comprehended in the peace made in January 1600 betwixt his Royall Maiesty of France and him: yet he hath oppressed vs in, Iudry forts, not only by the detaying of our Reuenues; forbidding of trafficke and other violences and extortions, yielding nothing to the many and just admonitions of his Maiesty; but also hath attempted often to invade and surprise vs in this day the 12. of this month, about midnighthead brought before our towne, on the ditches of Plainpalais, about 2000 choicemen, horse and foot; and had cast about 2000 iron mortars, were vnto the old gate of Corraziere, and hauing planted Ladders one within another, he had caused them to mount about three of the clocke on the Sunday morning the 12. of this month, incouraging them; being himselfe in the ditch; so as being entered in the towne, some went to the new gate of Plainville Perard, and so drew in the body of their troopes, which inside a Rand in the meadow of Plainpalais others would haue forced vpon the Mint-gate, and so haue entered into the middle of our towne. But he pleased our good God to looke vpon vs with a fauourable eye, and to giue courage to all such as they haue repulst them foralinty; as they haue slain the best part of them: so

Many iudged of the end of this enterprife by the beginning, and were more diligent to write then they had beene to execute it well. The King had intelligence, that the Duke was Master of the Towne, and the manner of the execution was represented with so great ease and happinesse, as there was lesse reason to doubt it then to belicue it. The truth was not known but by letters for the gouernor of Lions, the which came before any discourse that was published by the Towne that was deliuered. The Duke repast the mountains in post, his troops remained a League from Geneva in three places, at Tounon, Fossigny and Ternier. He commanded his Ambassador to give the Senate of Berne to vnderstand, that he had not made this enterprife to trouble the quiet of the Cantons, but to prevent L'Esclat dignities from being Master thereof, who intended to deliuer it vnto afterwards vnto the King, who had beene too mighty a Neighbor, and would haue giuen them altogether occasion to feare him. The issue of this enterprife did shew, that God will not haue Treason violated, for the assurance whereof his Name hath beene inuocated, notwithstanding any pretext of Religion. Witnesse Lewis King of Hungary in the vnfortunate battell of Varna against the Turkes, where he had broken his Faith.

The King aduertised of the successe of this enterprife, he sent word vnto the Magistrate of this Common-weale, that if their enemy did attempt by a seiled siege, or by open War any thing against them, he would assist them, and employ all his forces for their defence, commanding the Gouernors and Lieutenants General of the neereft Provinces, to assist them all they could. The Cantons of Berne and Fribourg allied to Geneva, being aduertised of this attempt, sent twelue hundred Swisses, and the King who had an enterest there should not fall vnder the command of any other Prince or Common-weale, sent also five hundred French. All prepare to Warre, the Geneuois made some courtes into the Duke of Sauoyes Country, and disprised S. Geny of Aouft, they imagined vpon a little good successe to extend their limits vnto Mont Cenis. The King commanded De Fic his Ambassador in Suisseerland, (who returned then to his charge) to passe by them, to assure them, that he was not of their humors, which frame not their affections, nor bind not the duties of friendship but vpon good euents, louing friends no longer, then they draw profit from them. That he would neuer faile them for their defence and protection, desiring to know of them, what means they might haue to make an offensive warre, to the end, the success he should send them, might be profitably employed. They receiued De Fic with a publicke applause, sending forth the French Horse and Foot, to meet him: but as hee was deceiued in this vnspected Ceremonie, so were many others which thought that he came to encourage them to warre. They heard his Propositions in apriu conference, exhorting them rather to a long and durable peace, then to a short warre. They intreated him to propound the like in their generall assembly, which no man else durst doe, euery one holding it a Crime, and a signe of Basenesse, not to preferre the Councils of warre, before any accord, and not to enter in a hostile manner into the Dukes Country. Some which had neuer seene war, but in the Idea, conceiued victories in their imaginations, building vpon the Snow of Mont Cenis. That it would not continue about fix moneths, that the warre would be no lesse profitable for the good of their Common-weale, nor lesse happy, then it had been to their Neighbors, in the time of Duke Charles: and that all that had any interest in their preservation would assist them. That all those great Spirits which delighted in the exercise of warre, would come and offer them their Armes and Lises.

De Fic through the truth and excellency of his discourse, gaue them to vnderstand, that peace was so necessary for them, and warre so preiudiciall, as they had great reason to imbrace the one, and to shie the other. That although the causes of warre, be alwaies goodly, and the means made ease, yet the effects were no lesse terrible, the successe being not alwaies answerable to their hopes. That a foraine Warre was profitable, and to be vnder-

A taken when as Ciuill Warres could not be otherwise auoyded: but a well seited Estate, which hath alwaies liued happily by Peace, should not seeke these stormes, nor take delight to beate warre with her Neighbours. Thus hee perswaded them to imbrace peace, confirmed by an equal commerce of all commodities, and which should roote out all occasions of Warre. They entred into some truce with the Duke, but hauing required assurance for the obseruation thereof, it being not honourable, they proceeded no farther, and the Duke gaue them to vnderstand that it was indifferent to him, whether they were his friends or enemies. The King, who is a Prince full of iustice and integrity, foreseeing that this warre would not be ended by them that did begin it, desired to maintain the peace which was so necessary for all Christendome, for the which he had layd aside Armes, when as he might hope for most fruit for the increase of his Estates. His Ambassador therefore in Suisseerland perswaded the Cantons of Glaries, Basle, Soleure, Schaffhouse and Appenzel, as least suspected and interested, to be the mediators of this Accord. There was some difficulty, but the Siegneury tyred with a warre, the profit whereof could not repaire the ruines which the want of Peace should cause, and hauing eyed that all the profit they could hope for, depended on their neighbours success. That hope which is not maintained but by forraigne supports, is alwaies ruinous: That they had no means to reuenge the wrong that was done vnto them: that there was no likelihood that the Catholike Swisses would breake with the Duke of Sauoy for their respect: that being so neere they must of force apply themselves to some quiet and equal kind of liuing: they yeelded to the perswasions of their friends and Allies, and by their aduice relinquished many demands which their Councell had refused, and the Duke had reiected as vnjust and dishonorable.

The Conference of the Treaty was at Rouilly with D'Albigny; and the conclusion at Saint Iulian, betwixt the Deputies of either part. If the issue hath beene happy and profitable to both parties, they are bound to none but the grace of God and the Kings wisdom, who desiring to entertaine the publicke quiet, hath made a peacefull vnion of those wills that were so much diuided: for at his instance the Swisses had layd aside more Muskets and Pikes which they had provided, then had been sene in Sauoy in ten years before; and they of Geneva did moderate their demands, not so much for any respect of their enemy, as to please the King, yet the malicious gaue it out, that the King had incensed them to war by his Ambassadors. The Consulate of Lions had obtained of the King (at the Queens intreaty, and in consideration of the honor done her at her entry) a Priuiledge, by which none might come to be Sheriffes, that were not Town-born children: it was the same prerogative which Pescennius Niger had giuen vnto the Romanes, forbidding any person to be admitted to publicke charges that was not borne and bred a Romaine. Euery Priuiledge which causeth an inequality among Citizens (liuing vnder the same Lawes) is the Apple of discord and cause of diuision, like vnto that of the Bianchi and Neri at Florence. A great town hath euert too many seeds of diuision, without seeking new. Most commonly the rich are intolerable to the poore, and the poore enuy the happinesse of the rich: there is alwaies some question betwixt the great and the small.

This new distinction of persons must needs cause dangerous innovations in a City, where the inner part is more to be feared then the outward. Those which pretended to bee from their beginning, by birth and affection, of the Country of Lions, seeing themselves perpetually excluded from the most honourable charges within the City, had recourse vnto the King, laying before him the inequality of this Priuiledge, the disgrace which they receiued, and the ruine which should fall vpon the City, when the Inhabitants should abandon the place of their abode, and that they might not remaine in a place where without offence or any iust cause, they were for euer deputed of that little Honor they might hope for, after they had serued the Publike in many burthenome charges. Those which were originally borne at Lions sayd, that the Inhabitants of the Country comming thither, labored more for their owne profit, then for the good of the publike, and did not much affect the publicke good, if they did not hope for their owne private commodities, hauing no hands but for themselves. That it was neither profitable nor commendable to impart the chiefe Honours, and to commit the gouernment of the City to new men, for many reasons which haue beene set downe by the wife, but especially lest they confound the ancient Order and Government with strange Customes and Manners.

The King will not issue this privilege to be the cause of any division.

The King declares that his meaning was not to exclude his subjects but strangers only from a Office of Consul.

The Chancellor's speech.

Intention to make silke in France.

The profit of the art of silke.

The King considering that a small matter doth trouble a multitude (as the encounter of a ditch doth disorder the ranks of an Army when it marcheth) he gave them to understand that he desired they should agree together, sending them to La Guiche Governour of Lyons to reconcile these wills, divided only upon this subject, but united in all other points that concerned the obedience and service of his Majesty. This division began to decrease when as they understood that his Majesties pleasure was to content both parties, to reduce things to the ancient order wherein they had lived happily, and not to suffer the good correspondency which had been betwixt the Inhabitants of one City, to be lost by the quality of this privilege, the which by fruitlesse innovations did alter that which the Ancients had allowed and maintained.

The King therefore commanded that the reasons of either part should be carefully examined and considered of in his Councell. The President Janin was reporter of this controversy. The Councell having understood the Kings intention, and considered of the Governour of Lyons advice, thought that as they might not change the ancient customs in the which they had lived well, so it was just and reasonable to gratifie the Original families of the City, for that they had suffered most in these last troubles, and had opposed themselves most resolutely against the faction. They therefore thought it good that there should remaine a distinction with some mark or prerogative of Honour, reserving the charge of Provoost of Merchants for such as were Citizens born, & that those of the country which had continued there for ten years Heads of Families, should be capable of the Consulship, to enter indifferently with them that were borne there. By this declaration both the one and the other had part of their demands. The King sending them backe, recommended vnto them obedience, and respect to their Governour, and Concord and Unity among themselves. And for that in the last Consular Elections there had been something done indiscreetly, the Chancellor vsed some words upon that subject, both grave, just, and worthy the greatnesse of his charge.

It is my opinion (sayd he) that as the king hath an interest, that none should be chosen for Magistrats of a Towne, but those, of whose Loyalty his Majesty is well assured, so the more the liberty of election is left vnto them, the more obedience should his Majesty, the Governours and Lieutenants Generall of Provinces finde in the Inhabitants, in that which it should please him to command them.

The King desiring to increase the commodities of the Realm, and to enrich his subjects, having tried in his royall houses of Fontainebleau, Madril, and the Gardens of the Tuilleries, that silke wormes might be bred and brought vp as happily in France, as in any part of Europe, he resolved to adde the art of silke to the felicities of the peace, a speedy and fit remedy to auoyd the transport of gold and silver. Hereupon he had the advice of Commissioners deputed for the establishing of the trafficke, the which hee had chosen as well out of his Councell, as of the Soueraigne Courts of Parliament, Chamber of Accomptes, and Court of Aydes. They gave his Majesty to understand, that for the more speedy bringing in of this new worke, he must of necessity begin by the planting of Mulberry-trees, to feed the wormes that weare and make the silke. And therefore some expert in that Art, did binde themselves to furnish a great number of white Mulberry-trees, and graines to make Nurseries, in foure parts of the Realme, at Paris, Orleans, Tours, and Lyons, who were bound to make their diuisions by the first day of Aprill this yeare, with instructions how to sow and plant trees and Kernels, to gouerne the wormes, to draw and spin the silke, to prepare it, and make it ready to be sold. There could not bee found in this age a more profitable husbandry. The people of Languedoc, Prouence, and Dauphine haue found this labor so successfull within these few yeares, as the onely reuennue of silke doth now bring more money to these Provinces, then the Corne, Oyle, and Weade, although they haue great abundance. It doth also begin very happily at Lyons, and if it continue, this City will be as famous for silke, as Tire and Bulis were for Scarlet.

As the profit is great and pleasing, so the practice is not painful, for one man is sufficient to employ the leaues of three great Mulberry-Trees, to nourish and entertaine halfe an ounce of Wormes; women and children are as capable as men. It is done without any diuersion from their labour, and almost without any losse of time, at such a season of the yeare when as the fruits of the Earth require rather the fauour of Heauen, then the industry of men. It is not done without a perpetuall admiration of the wonders of that

A Soueraigne hand of the Almighty, by whose order we see these little beasts without flesh, blood, bones, veines, sinewes, or arteries, without scales, or bowels within, without teeth, nayles, or prickles, and without filke, haire, eyes, or eares, to make therein forty daies which all the industry of man could not doe in forty yeares. They are the workers of a stuffe which serues for an ornament in the house of God, and in those of Kings, and furnish the chiefe ingredients for a most wholesome confession, for the cure of melancholly, which is that of Alkermes, which is made by the infusion and decoction of filke in the iuice of Kermes.

The King went to Metz and tooke the Queene with him. The cause of his voyage was the bad intelligence betwixt Sobole commanding in the Citadell, and the Inhabitants of the Towne. The Duke of Elspemont shewed in this trouble, as in many other more dangerous, that of the two best things of our life, happinesse is the first, and wisdom the second. Sobole was one of them to whom he had yielded a part of that great and incomparable fauour which hee had during the reigne of the deceased King. Having the gouernment of Metz from the King, he made Sobole his Lieutenant of the towne and Citadell, in whom he had as much confidence, as he had vowed his affection vnto him.

As the great troubles in the yeare 1589, had made France like vnto a troubled river fit for Ambitious men to fish in, so those which held places of importance began to raise their authorities as high as the liberty of the time, and the forgetfulness of the French would suffer them. Two or three yeares after the Duke of Elspemont was troubled in Prouence, and his credit crackt with the King. They say that Sobole began then to cary himselfe more proudly then he was wont, vnto no moderation, which is the perfect ornament of prosperity. He suffered himselfe to be called Gouernor. A title which added nothing to his profit and commodity, and did breed him lealouise with his equals, bad opinion in the iudgment of his superiors, and hatred and feare in the hearts of his inferiours.

There was another occasion which made his carriage more odious, which was the pursuit he made against the principall of the towne, for treason and conspiracy. They were freed from prison being innocent, but they tooke this resolution to free themselves from the command of Sobole. It is the humor of the people to write any good they haue received vpon the water, and to ingraue the wrongs are done them in brasse. The duke of Elspemont passing by Metz to goe to the Spaw, heard great complaints against Sobole, the which he did but heare, finding that there was some lealouise of his abode at Metz, for as often as he sent for him to eate or play with him, and to bring his brother with him, the one or the other remained still in the City. Yet the Duke of Elspemont entred into the Citadell, and was received with all the honours hee could desire, Sobole presented him the keyes at the gate, protesting of his affection, and complaining of those which said hee would refuse him the entry: the souldiers stood with their pikes vp, and their Harguebuzes and Muskets vpon their shoulders, and the Halbards behinde them.

The Duke of Elspemont returned to Court, to understand the Kings pleasure touching these troubles. He made a second voyage to Metz. Their murmuring against Sobole was turned into publike complaints, and their complaints into Barricadoes betwixt the Citadell and the towne: the Inhabitants were transported with so strange a passion, as they submitted themselves to any thing, so as they might not be commanded by two the Brethren. This commotion had not lasted long: it had not beene supported. The presence of the Duke of Elspemont gaue them courage, who else would haue beene much amazed. The King first sent Boissise, and then Varenne, both which serued his Majesty according to his intentions, and disposed Sobole to doe whatsoever he should command him, declaring notwithstanding that he would not deliuer the place but to himselfe. This was the occasion of the Kings voyage, who went thither in a very vnseasonable time. Vpon the brute of his going, many Princes of Germany sent to take vp their lodgings at Metz, who notwithstanding (hearing that the King would make but small abode, and the time being troublesome) came not out of their Stoues, so as there came not any but the D. of Deux Ponts, the Landgrau of Hesse, and the Prince of Brandenburg. The King finding the hatred betwixt Sobole and the Inhabitants to bee irreconcilable, was aduised to give the charge of the Citadell to Arquien, Lieutenant of the Coronells company, of the Regiment of his Majesties guards: and the Lieutenancy of the gouernment of the Towne and of the Country of Messin to Montigny his brother, to hold them as Lieutenants of his Majesty in the absence of the Duke of Espernon. The King would not enter into Metz before A that Sobole was out of the Citadell. Some thought he would not haue bene so obedient, but he shewed he had no disgrace beyond his duty. This was a disgrace vnto him. Hee blamed his fortune, and Fortune accused his bad carriage. The way hee tooke to maintaine himselfe, ouerthrow him. Men must hold great Commands like simple Commissions, and not as Inheri- tances. They must desire them without Passion, and receive them without Insolency. The King past the feast of Easter at Metz. Where he heard the Iesuits requests for their re-establisment. They could not find a better opportunity to speake vnto the King, then that which Varenne (Controller general of the Posts of France) gaue them, giuing them intelligence that the King would come to Metz and there spend the Easter. Hereupon foure Iesuites of Pont a Mouzon, were deputed to goe and doe their duties vnto his Maiesty, and to renew the request for their returne vnto those places from the which they had bene expelled. They came to Metz on the Wednesday before Easter day, and the next day in the after-noonne they had audience in the Kings Cabinet, where as the Duke of Espernon, Villeroy, Genre, and Varenne were present. The King receiued them graciously and would not suffer them to kneele, but commanded them to stand vp: and although he takes no delight in long speeches, knowing that they come prepared with goodly words. Yet he heard father Ignace Armand with patience and attention, who made a long and eloquent Oration.

"Sir, since it hath pleased God to make you victorious, and a peaceable possessor of C the Scepter and Crowne which is due vnto you, and that wee had the happinesse to read, and know in your Maiestie those great perfections, which since the memory of man haue not bene found in any great Prince or Monarch, and especially that great clemency, and assured marke of a Noble and generous minde, the which after so many victories and triumphs you haue vsed towards them which had most offended you, wee then conceiued a great hope that you would shew the like clemency and mildnesse to vs.

"But as all things in this world are mutable: When as wee thought to doe you humble seruite, and to yeeld you the obedience which subiects owe vnto their King and naturall Prince, there fell out an vnfortunate accident which troubled all our designs, and seque- D ding vs from you, tooke from vs the meanes to doe you the seruice which we pretended. Yet we can assure you with truth, that notwithstanding all the crosses and contradictions, or the false reports which haue bene raised vp against vs, both within and without the Realme, we haue neither lost the affection we owe to our deare Country, nor our desire to your seruice, nor the hope we had in your clemency and naturall bountie: Assuring us felues that time in the end will discouer the truth, and mollifie all offenses which the misery of ciuill warres haue bried.

"This hope hath much increased since your coming into these parts, which makes vs now to prostrate our felues at your feet, and to beseech your Maiestie nor to deferre the grace any longer which we haue so often demanded, & to giue vs occasion to preach throughout E all the world, that our hopes were not vaine, being supported by the bounty of so great a King, receiuing vs in the end as his most humble subiects, and most desirous to employ our felues for his Maiesties seruice, there being nothing that can be more grieuous vnto vs, then to see our felues in disgrace with the King, and not able to assist our country with those poore meanes which God hath giuen vs, and according to the vocation whereunto we are called.

"We doubt not but they haue laboured to make vs appeare before you, otherwise then we are, by the imposition of the foulest and most odious crimes, which a subiect might commit against his Prince and country, the which we detest as execrable; and if we had once thought to do them, we should thinke our felues vnworthy, I will not say to be re- F ceiued into our country, but to liue vpon the earth.

"They haue in like manner sought to blame our institution allowed in a general Coun- cell, and by so many Popes, and receiued by the most Christian Kings your predecessors, as if it yed vs to obey our General in all things, yea in that which should be contrary to God and reason. Yet I cannot beleuee Sir, that euer any such opinion could lodge in the hearts of those that haue the least knowledge of our institution, being contrary to our constitutions, which do alwaies except in the obedience due to our Superiours, all that which

A which may not be done without offence to God. But how were impossible, that of so many which enter into our company, and all desirous of saluation, any one should remaine, if they should see that such an impiety, (not obedience) should haue place: was it euer heard of any one that left vs (how great an enemy to vs) that there was any such thing, and that this obedience did derogate from that which we owe vnto Kings & Magistrates, or that it doth command vs to giue counsell to any one that may bee preiudiciall to your Maiesty and State? Many haue also sought to persuade you, that wee did sollicite chil- dren of good houses to bee of our company and religion, to haue their goods and ioyne them vnto ours: It is contrary to the courtesie wee hold in the reception of those which de- fire to serue God in our company, receiuing not any one before we haue made a long tri- all of their vocation, whether it bee by the inspiration of God, or perswasion of men, and that many times for three or foure yeares. If they finde this vocation not to bee of God, they are refused, being an essentiall lert to their reception, and there is not any thing which Superiours recommend more to them of this company, then to bee very carefull not to persuade any one to enter into a religious estate, but onely to excite them to ver- tue and learning, leauing that to the holy Spirit, which is of the perfection of the Gospel, and of the counsell of our Suuion: and for prooffe, the number of them which are in France, is so small as it makes not the twentieth part of them which are of other religions.

"As for that which is said, wee pretend to enrich our felues by their meanes which are receiued into this company, it needs not many words to discouer this fallhood. E Every man knowes the reuenues of our Colledges, I thinke that few men can vaunt that they are much enriched. One thing I can say, that hardly shall you finde one of our Colledges in France, whose foundation is sufficient for that which is necessary to support the charges, and you shall finde many which for the most part liue of almes. That of Paris the chiefe City of your Realm, comprehending the legacies of the Presidents Saint Andrew, and Hannetquin with all others, hath neuer had aboue a thousand Crownes rent, which will hardly serue to entertaine twenty persons. Such a Colledge requires at the least three- score, for all the sciences and faculties whereof wee make profession. Many of this great City haue entred into our company, and some of good houses, the which haue not left vs a foot of land. If they haue giuen vs any almes in money, to supply the want of our foun- dation, the greatest summe doth neuer come to the eight part of their goods, the which hath bene alwaies fought with the good liking and consent of their Parents. If our Col- ledges haue sufficient foundations, we desire no more. And if any one of our body dispo- seth of his goods, the application is left free vnto him, and commonly if his kinsfolkes bee poore, he leaues them all, if they be rich, he employes some part to goodly vses, and to Hos- pitals, with the liking of his kinsfolkes. We were in truth very miserable and voyde of sense, if hauing quit all the commodities which we had by succession, or might gerby our industry, we would seek them in Religion. And how were it possible we should be so greedy to affect them, hauing nothing in petticular, and if wee had a hundred times more in common, we should reape no greater commoditie for our own particulars, the ouer- plus being employed according to our constitutions to entertaine poore Schollers, & in other works of charity. They also importune your Maiesties eares continually, and say that we meddle with matters of State. The cause of this opinion and presumption is, for that sometimes Noblemen and Prelates, vouchsafe to vie vs for matter of Conscience, and to direct them in their deuotions and spirituall exercises, whatsoeuer they doe or appoint af- wards, is attributed vnto vs, although we haue had no communication, nor haue medled in the businesse. For in truth Sir, there is nothing so contrary to our estate and intention, nor more forbidden in our company, vpon grieuous paine, then to meddle in like affaires.

"These be Sir, the chiefe points which are objected against vs; and if there be any other, F whereof it shall please your Maiesty to be better informed, we promise to so to answer, by writing or by mouth, as you shall rest satisfied, and see plainly that they are but inuenti- ons, forged either by them which affect vs not, or by such as haue no knowledge of our institution and manner of life. But wee will answer more plainly to the view and contentment of all the world by our workes, when it shall please your Maiesty to vn- binde our hands. Then shall euery man see plainly, what wee say and promise: and your Maiesty shall witness, yea they which are most contrary vnto vs, that wee haue bene true.

 " name we demand it, and who without doubt demands it for vs, after so many prayers
 " which wee haue offered vnto him, shall haue such power with your Maiesty, who by his " Christian pietie will neuer depart from that which hee shall know to be pleasing, to that

The King answered them very graciously, I wish no harme to the Iesuits, and all the ill that I wish to any living creature, let it happen vnto my selfe. My Court of Parliament hath done something against you, but not without good consideration. He received that in writing which they had deliuered by mouth, deliuered it to Villeray, and hauing considered thereof, he declared vnto them expressly how desirous he was, and what care he would take for their returne. If your businesse (said hee) were not in the Popes hands, I would dispatch you presently, but you know it is not expedient to doe any thing without him. I will haue you: you are profitable for the publike and for my estate. He added moreover, that being at Paris he would thinke seriously of their affaires. They demanded if his Maiesty would not be pleased that the three Princiuals of their company in France, accompanied by three others should attend there at his returne, and receiue his commandements. There needs not so many, said the King, it shall be sufficient that you and father Cotton come. The King made this voyage partly to pacifie some trouble growne betwixt the Cardinal of Lorraine, and the Prince of Brandebourg, for the Bishopricke of Strausbourg, and this was the cause of their quarrell. The Bishopricke of Strausbourg being voyde by the decease of their Bishop (who was a Catholike) the Cardinal of Lorraine obtained the grant thereof from his Holinesse. But for that they of Strausbourg since the fittes in Germany, had held the confesion of Aushourg, the deceased Bishop had retired himselfe out of the City, and liued at a house of his in the Country in his religion, and yet notwithstanding hee receiued his temporall reuenues from them of Strausbourg. On the other side the Mar-

A controuersie betwixt the Cardinal of Lorraine and Prince of Brandebourg
 for the Bishop-ricke of Strau-bourg.

A quise of Brandebourg, Election of the Empire, had obtained an election from them of Strausbourg for one of his Sonnes, who being named to the Bishopricke, and refused by them of Strausbourg, he wilkeney the Bishops rights without any other ceremony.
 The Cardinal on the other side having received the accustomed order therein, demanded the Bishops rights of them of Strausbourg, such as his Predecessor enjoyed, who died a Catholike, and according to the Article of the Treaty, set downe by the confession of Aushourg. Hereupon they of Strausbourg made some difficulty, and the rather, for that being neighbours vnto the Duke of Lorraine territories, they haue often many controuersies to decide, as it doth commonly fall out betwixt neighbors. They had also given their consent to the nomination of the Prince of Brandebourg for Superintendant or Administrator, that is to say, Bishop after their manner: for the selfe and other pri-uate reasons, they refused the Cardinals demand.

The Prince of Brandebourg gets possession, and prepares to withstand the Cardinal, all things tending vnto Armes. Many and great leaues of them were made on either side.
 Those of Strausbourg were also in Alarme, seeking to prevent all disorders if it were possible, yet fauouring the Prince of Brandebourg more than the Cardinal of Lorraine.
 The Emperour had written vnto them both, declaring that his intention was, that neither of them should haue wrong: The King was intreated to interpose his authority as a Friend to both parties, for the auoiding of all scandall. The Prince of Brandebourg, named the Bishop of Strausbourg, was come into France some months before: And they say he remained some dayes at Troyes, vntill his Maiesty had assigned him a time and place to haue the Honour to come and kisse his hands, the which was done at Loges neer to Saint Germane in Lay, where the King gaue him audience, and so the said Prince was dispatched, with promise of all fauor, to compound the controuersie betwixt him and the Cardinal.

During the Kings abode at Metz, the said Prince of Brandebourg came accompanied with the Lantgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Deux Ponts, and a Deputy from the Archbishop of Treues, Elector of the Empire: and by their aduice it was determined, that the Cardinal should haue a portion out of the said Bishopricke, and the rest should remaine vnto the Prince, and by that means they should continue friends as before.
 Thus a Peace was made betwixt them, the which might els haue bene preiudiciall to the whole Empire and to all Christendome. The King went from Metz to Nancy to see the Duchesse of Bar his sister, and the Duke of Lorraine. At that time a marriage was concluded betwixt the Duke of Deux Ponts and the Ladie Katherine of Rohan, remaining then with the Kings Sister, and so hauing provided for all things necessary for the frontier, he tooke his way to Paris the 7 of April. It is a signe of a happy Reigne when the subiect reioyceth to see his King: Prouence had been possit with this desire fifteene yeares, being the only Prouince of all France that had not yet seene the King. He was expected there with great impatience, hauing promised after his returne from Metz to go thither. As it was reasonable to giue comfort to that Prouince, so was it necessary to fortifie that Coast, and to haue an eye to the designs of the sea army of Spaine, which vnder colour of attempting something vpon Alger, might fall vpon that coast, by which the Emperour Charles the fifth held it the easiest to invade France.

At the same time (report which carries all things abroad without distinction of iudgment) did publish throughout all Europe, a newes happily false, which was, that the King had bene extremely sicke. He was indeed sick, but not so extremely as they should so iudge of him. He was soone restored to his natural health, and returned to his ordinary manner of liuing. The actions of Princes must be alwaies great, not busying themselves in making of Lanthornes, like to that King of Macedonia. They must alwaies hold their Subjects in this opinion, That in doing nothing, they doe some great worke.
 It was a great precept which the Emperour Charles the fifth gaue to King Philip his Son, alwaies to exercise himselfe in some vertue, agreeing with the duty of a King, to hold the Subjects as it were in admiration of his effects, and not to giue their thoughts at any time to fill them with other affections. When occasions of war cease, he must apply himselfe to those of Peace, as to the administring of Iustice, and ordering of his Realme.
 To conclude, all the actions of a Prince must tend to the good and health of his people, for whom he liues, and more then for himselfe, as the Sunne doth not shine and giue heat but for men and the elements. During the war, no man enquired what the King did, his great affaires provided store of worke, the end of one enterprize was the beginning of another. Now that these tedious stormes are appeased, that the waues are smooth and the Sea calme, that Peace giues him a rest worthy of his labours, that so many paines past make his pleasures more sweet, and that the reward of Vertue makes his triumphs seeme more glorious, there passeth no day, but some one asketh, What doth the King? They need not hardly for an answer, hee is alwaies in action far from idleness. The chiefest aduantage is neuer to be without action, he hath bene so bled vp from his Cradle, he cannot be otherwise: Dees neuer become Drones, great spirits do neuer degenerate, we shall see him on horsebacke at the age of Maffius, he will be fearfull to his enemies at that of Agesilaus; hee will show himselfe in the head of his armies at the age of 80 yeares, like vnto Phocion, his valour will neuer grow old no more then his memory. He contents himselfe notwithstanding to enioy the fruits of peace, and not to thinke any more of war, unless hee be wronged. One of the greatest contentments the peace doeth yeeld him, is that of his buildings, and there is no exercise more worthy of a King then to repaier the ruines of time, if they bee buildings which regard the glory of the Prince, and the common profit of the people, when as the morter is not made with the blood and sweat of his poore Subjects. At one time the King had Mansions in diuers places; in the great Church of Orleans, at Fontainebleau, at S. Germaine, at Monceaux, and at the new Bridge at Paris. All great workes, whether that we consider the building by the designe, or the designe by the building. Among many maruells of his life, that was admirable. That hee did build and make war both together. The first day hee entered into the Louvre hee did designe and set downe what he hath since continued. Hee hath made S. Germaine and Fontainebleau (two houses of the Kings his Predecessors) royal and stately Palaces. He finished in the hottest of the wars and foraigne tempests, that which they had vnderaken in a calme and peacefull season. They were buildings whereof wee may truly say, That the workmanship exceeds the matter, wherein he was serued with as great affection and promptitude, as we way obserue good order and iudgment; and will be the more durable, for that the workemen received commodity, and the Labourers did not sweat for nothing. Many gallant Spirits found out ingenious inuentions which our age admires, and the forepassed haue not knowne. Waters had not yet bene raised higher then their Springs. This present age, and those which are to come, owe this industry to Montoni, President of the Minte in the generality of Lion. This aduice affection in the King to royall buildings, made subjects (by an honest and commendable imitation) to raise the ruines which did generally shew a hideous face, and mournfull markes of horrible and furious effects, both in townes and country. The pauerd Caufies which are continued in diuers Prouinces, the Bridges, which by the motion and care of the Marquis of Rosny are built vpon Riuers, where neuer were any, witness with what curiosity, the King sought the ease and commodity of his people.

Exercise of Noblemen at Colours.

We haue seene what the King does, wee must also know whereunto the Court is inclined. How can they liue without warre that thinke it a dishonour to dye in their beds? who are accustomed to triumph our idleness, and rest not but to take new breath? What doe so many Noblemen, which cannot endure rest but with impatience? Some goe a hunting, others dwell and dye among Ladies: many giue themselves to the knowledge of tongues and the Mathematickes: the most quarrellous strip themselves into their shirts, notwithstanding any prohibition of Duells or Combats: the most temperate retire themselves from great expences. Some there are, who loath that ease should triumph over their reputations, goe out of the Realme with the Kings permission. It is a figure of a great and noble courage, to goe and make war vpon a foraigne Theater, and to see the diuersity of people and nations, that he may settle his iudgment, and arme himselfe with experience. When we speake of them that haue well employed the ease and liberty of peace, we must remember the Duke of Neuers. Hee went into England, Flanders, and Hungary, and through a great part of the North. Hee past to the King of Denmark, who for the respect of those two great & famous houses, of Gonzaga, allied to the greatest houses of Europe, and of Neuers, which carries the title of D. of Brabant & Limbourg, but much more for loue of this crown, received him with great & famous honors. The

A league concluded betwixt the Venetians & the Grisons.

An Ambassador sent from Venice.

The navigation of the French to New France or Canada.

The King was aduertised, that the Seignery of Venice would renew a negotiation which they had attempted and left vnperfect twenty yeares since; which they now sought to conclude. De Vic, Ambassador for the King in Suisseerland, having discovered, that both parties had begun without the King, gaue them to vnderstand, that they could not finish nor conclude that without his Maiesty. The Count Fuenter did also crosse it, for that this new League should make him to lose the hope of that which the Spaniard had pursued so many yeares. As soone as the King had giuen them to vnderstand that he was well pleased therewith, it was concluded: neither party respecting the threats of the Count Fuenter, who sware that he would take from the Grisons the trafficke which they had in the Duchy of Milan, and the reliefe of Corne which they received from thence. The Articles of this alliance are set downe at large in Peter Mathew. The Count Fuenter discontented with this league, made the Grisons repent it, hauing cut off their commerce, and all commodities which they drew out of the territories of Milan, without the which they could not wel liue. The two Countries ioyne together, and the barrenness of the one is supplied by the fertility and abundance of the other. To bring them vnder the yoke of Spaine, and to force them to breake with the Venetians, hee built a fort at the entry of their Country, whereof shall be spoken hereafter.

An Ambassador sent from Venice into France about the same time past by Lions, a graue and wise man, and well practised in affaires of State. The Gouernor of Lions did visit him, and among other discourses vnderstood from him, that the Seigneurs of that Common-weale did hold themselves more bound vnto the Count Fuenter, then to any man liuing, for that they had made vse of his threats to sharpen their courages, which time had made blunt and dull. His braueries had made them to take resolutions for the good of the State, which they had neuer dreamt of, drowning their counsellors in the delights of Peace, and presuming that they should not feare any storme in so great a calme, but hauing seene the Counts humour to stir vp war in Italy, and that he bragged he had Instruments to draw them in, that had no will to dance, they had so well provided for their affaires, as they feared his hand no more then his tongue. The last yeare the Lord of Pont had bene in new France (called Canada) from whence he had brought two Sauages, which hee presented vnto the King: they learned of them that the great Riuer which they thought to haue bene but a Gulfe (for that it is eighreene leagues broad where it enters into the Sea) was about 400 leagues long, and past through many goodly Countries and Lakes, into the which many other goodly Riuers did run, and that hee might goe vp into it in Canowes, which the Sauages did vse to saile in that Riuer. He resolved with some other Sea Captaines (with the Kings good liking) to returne, and to search into the heart of the Country by meanes of the Sauages, as well as hee had discovered along the Sea Coast, where is nothing but rocks and high mountaines, and sands full of Pine trees, Sapins, Cipres and Holly. Hee parted from Honfleur the fiftenth of March, carrying the two Sauages backe with him, and the eighteenth of Aprill he came into the great Riuer of Canada, where having entred a hundred leagues, in the end hee came to Tabouac the twenty fourth, where he found many Sauages in Cabines. Going on land, he went with some of his Company to the Cabin of the great Sagamo, called Anabacijon, where they found him with some fourescore or a hundred of his Companions, which made Tabagie (that is to say, a Feast) who receiued them very well, according to their custome, and made them to sit neare him, the Sauages being placed one by one on either side of the Cabin. One of the Sauages which he had cried with him, began to make his Oration, of the good reception which the King had made them, and of the good vsage which they had receiued in France, & that his Maiesty wished them well, and desired to people their land, and to make peace with their enemies (which be the Iroquois) or to send them forces to vanquish them. He told them of the goodly castles, places, houses and people that he had seene, and the manner of liuing of the French. The Sauages gaue him audience with great silence. When he had done speaking, the great Sagamo began to take Tobacco, and gaue some vnto the Seigneur of Pont Graue of S. Malo, and to his company, and to some other Sauages that were neere him, hauing taken it well, he began to make his Oration to them all, speaking deliberately, saying sometimes a little, and then beginning againe, he said, That in truth they had reason so he greatly contented to haue such a King for their great friend: Whereunto all the other Sauages answered red with one voice, ho, ho, ho; that is to say I, I. Then the Sagamo said againe, That he was very glad the King of France should people their Land, and make war against their enemies: That there was no Nation in the world to whom they desired more good, then unto the French. Then he gave the Sauages to vnderstand, what profit they might receive from his Maiefty.

After that he had ended his Speech, De Pont and his company went out of the Cabin, and then they began to make their Tabagie, or feast, which is done with the flesh of Orignac, which is like vnto beefe of Beares, Sea-Wolves, and Beavers, which is the ordinary meat that they haue, with great store of Wilde-fowle. When they cate they sit of either side of the Cabin, euery one hauing a dish made of the barke of Trees: the meat being foddren, there is one that giuesto euery one his portion in his dish, where they cate very grossly, for when their hands are greasie, they either rub them vpon their haire, or vpon their Dogs, (whereof they haue great store to hunt withall) before they cate, they daunce about their Pans, and after they haue eaten, they returne to their dauncing, euery one taking the head of his enemy which he hath slaine in battell, the which hangs behind him. They made this Feast together, for the victory which they had obtained of the Irocois, of whom they had slaine some hundred. Three nations of Sauages were there assembled, that is to say, the Eschechemins, Algonmequins, and Montagnez, to the number of a thousand, all enemies to the Irocois, against whom they make cruell war by surpris, for that they are more in number then they.

The eighteenth day of the Month, the said Sauages which were then at the point of S. Mathew, came to campe at the Port of Todoufac, where the Frenchmen were. At the breake of day the great Sagamo, going out of his Cabin, went about all the other Cabins, crying with a loud voyce, That they must dislodge to goe to Todoufac, where their good friends were. Suddenly euery one pulled downe his Cabin, and the great Sagamo began first of all to take his Canow, and to carry it to the Riuer, in the which hee embarked his wife and Children, with great store of Furses, so as they were neere two hundred Canowes, which goe exceeding swiftly, for although De Ponts Ship-boate was very well manned, yet they went faster then it. There are but two persons that doe row, the man and the woman. Their Canowes are eight or nine paces long, and one broad, they are very subiect to ouer turne, if they be not well guided: they are made of barkes of trees, strengthened within with little hoopes artificially made, and they are so light, as a man may carry one easily, and euery Canow will carry the weight of a Pipe. Their Cabins are low, made like Tents, covered with barkes of trees, leauing a hole open in the top, to let in the light: they make many fires in the middelt of the Cabin, whereas sometimes they are ten families together. They lye vpon skins one among another, and their Dogs with them. All these people are of a pleasant humor, they laugh most commonly, yet they are somewhat Saturnists: they speake deliberately, as if they would be well vnderstood, and stay suddenly, studying a good space, and then they speake againe. They vse these customes in their Orations in Councell, whither none come but the principall which are ancients: the women and children assit not. All these nations endure so much sometimes, as they are in a manner forced to cate one another through the great cold and snow, for the bealls and fowle which they vse, retire themselves into the hotter countries. They are apt enough to learne to till the ground, or any other worke, if they might be taught. Many of them are of good iudgment, and will answer directly to any question. They are full of reuenge and great lyars, in whom there is no trust, they promise much and performe little. For the most part they haue no law, and beleue that after that God had made all things, he tooke a number of Arrowes and stickt them in the earth, from the which sprung men and women, which haue multiplied in the world vnto this day, and are growne in this sort. That there is one God, one Son, the Mother, and the Sun which shines, which are foure, yet that God is aboue all, and that the Son, and the shining Sun are good, by reason of the benefit which they receiue, but the Mother is nothing worth, for that she eates them. In like fort they hold, that the father is not very good. They haue an infinite number of other foolish opinions, & they haue certaine Sauages among them whom they call Pilestons, which speakes visibly vnto the Deuill, and tels them what they should doe, as well for matters of war, as other things: to whom they obey at their first command. They also beleue that all their dreames are true, and many say that they haue

A scene and dreamt what should happen, but to speake truly, they are illusions of the Deuill which abuse them.

They are all well proportioned, without any deformity of their bodies; and nimble. Their women are well fashion, repleat, and somewhat full: they are yellow by reason of the painting wherewith they anoint themselves, which makes them of an Olive colour. They apparel themselves with skinned one part of their bodies is covered, and the rest bare. In winter they cover themselves with good Furses, whereof they haue great store, where there is great store of Snow, they vse a kinde of Racks, the which is twice or thrice as big as that of France, which they rye vnto their feet, and so go in the snow without sinking, for else they could not hunt nor goe in many places.

They haue a kinde of marriage, when a maide is fourteen or fiftene years old, she may haue as many seruants and friends, and accompany with as many as she please; then after five or six years she will take whom she likes best for her husband; and liue together till death, vntill after some time they haue no children, then the man may be married, and take another wife. After they be once married they are chaste, and the husbands are for the most part iudicious, giuing presents to the father or kinsfolkes of the woman whom they haue married. As for their Interments or Funerals, when a man or a woman dieth, they make a pit, into the which they put all the goods he hath, as kettles, furses, hatchets, bowes, arrowes, apparell, and other things, and then they put the body into the pit and couer it with earth, on the which they lay great peeces of wood, and one peece they set right vp; the which they painted red on the top. They beleue the immortality of the soule, and say that they go to reioyce in other Countries with their kinsfolkes and friends when they are dead. The Seigneure of Pont hauing spent some time to discouer the great riuer of Canada, and some other particularities of the Country, returned the 24 of August, and arrived at New-hauen the 20 of September. The great Turke (seeing the great exploits which the French had done in the wars of Hungary and Transiluania) had often entreated the King not to suffer any French to goe to the wars of Hungary, and to rye him to make a strict prohibition, he granted all and more then his Maiesty could desire for the reparation of publike and priuate iniuries, against the liberty of the commerce, and the safety of the navigation in the Leuant Seas, the which were greatly molested by Pirats.

He sent a Chaoours (which is a Generall or a Conductor of a Carauane) vnto the King in September, with very kind Letters, and a style not vntoall for the Princes of the house of Ottomans, who speake as Turkes, and glory to speake proudly and imperiously to the Potentates of Christendome, giuing him this title: To the most glorious, magnanimous, and great Lord of the beliefs of Ismus, Elected amongst the Princes of the Nation of Messias, the Compounder of Controuersies which happen among Christians, Lord of greatness, Maiesty and riches, and cleer guide of the greatest, Henry the fourth, Emperor of France, that he may end his dayes with peace and happinesse. The Letter I omit for breuities sake, being not greatly pertinent to this subiect. And for that the great Turke was informed, that the Pirats of Algier and Thunis, made markets of the French which they tooke, and sold them vnto the Moores (who were alwaies cruell and mercilesse vnto the Christians, being forced to endure all without complaining, and to murmur against the figour which Fortune allows the Master ouer his state) hee writ to Amel King of Fez, and intreats him to preuent this sale, as against the Iustice that was left them by their Prophet, and to set all the Frenchmen that were in his dominions at liberty. The King laboured to conuert the war of Hungary into a long truce, or an honourable peace for the Christians. He disposed Mahomet thereunto by the dexterity of his Ambassador; and if the house of Austria had trusted that of France, they had reaped the fruits of this negotiation. Mahomet shew that he had a desire to lay aside armes; presented the Emperour with armes and horses, and to Matthias the Archduke he sent a rich Roabe for a present.

There was no take in Court but of the quairrell betwixt the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny; the which was very hard to reconcile: It grew vpon words reported and disauowed. The Count Soissons was much offended; many framed diuers metheors in their heads; vpon the consequence of this question, some there were that made damnable vowes, the which were as odious and as punishable as those sellers of funerall suffrages that were punished by the Senate of Athens, vpon the accusation of Demades. The King foreseeing that his seruice did suffer in this diuision, gaue him to vnderstand by the Chancellor and Sillery, and afterwards by the Count of S. Paul, and the Duke of Mont-Abalon, that he desired this trouble were ended and he satisfied: he answered them all after one sort, That he should hold himself unworthy of the honour to be as he was a near-kingman to so great and courageous a King: if he had no feeling of so bloody an injury. The King considering that this quarrell did nothing advance his service, he made himselfe the instrument of this reconciliation. Hee sent for the Count Soissons, and the Marquis of Rhosay to the Louvre. They came both well accompanied. The presence, authority, and intreaty of his Majesty, was of force to smother the remembrance of all injuries, and to reconcile their wills. Let vs now see what they have done in the National Synode held at Gap, held by them of the reformed Religion, whereas many believed, that in giving audience to Ambassadors, and receiving Letters from foraigne Princes and common-weales, they had done more then their condition would allow, and had taken the way to make an Estate in the Estate. I will say no more. The passion of Religion might diminish the belief of the truth. The Synode began the first of October: It treated of things touching doctrine, discipline, and the government of Churches, giving a good testimony that there are among them men full of zeale to the advancement of their religion, and who in their resolutions can ioyne wisdom with doctrine, causing them to blush that have so much suffered the ancient constitutions of the Church to degenerate, and have so much neglected the government and discipline, as the Synodall assemblies of Diocesses, so necessary and profitable, are nothing but vaine and fond ceremonies, where they doe onely exhort them to doe well hereafter, not caring to correct or amend the ill that is gone and past.

Of many meanes which the Church (in her infancy) did use to preferre this spirit of peace and charity, which gave life vnto all the members, and entertained the cymmer and bond of the whole building, that of these assemblies hath bene held the most fruitfull, and should be made twice a year, if they will follow the Canons of the Apostles, and the Decrees of Nice and Sardinia. There they conferred of the order and direction of all affaires.

There the Pastors taking knowledge one of another, entertained their friendships, renewing the bonds of their affections. It served for a blood letting and a good purgation for bad humors in a corrupted body, to preferre and keepe it in health, purity, and charity of the Faith. There they shewed the power of the spirituall sword vpon the incorrigible, who in the end found the pappes of the Church drye for them, when through error, malice or obstinacy they made themselves unworthy of the sweetnes of her milke. There in the end they did straine the strings of the policy and discipline of the Church, the which being through negligence growne slacke, made no sound nor harmony. In this assembly of Gap (after that all the Deputies of the Prouinces of the Realme had shewed their Commissions) they began by the Inuocation of the name of God, the which was followed by the reading of the confession of the faith, wherein they did expound those things that were not plaine enough. The common desire of the Ministers to see the schisme pacified that was betwixt them and the other Congregations of Germany, England, and the Low countries, made them resolute that the assembly should write vnto the Vniuersities, both Lutherans and Calvinists, to desire some meanes to reconcile the contrarieties in some points of their confession.

This Assembly began by a declaration that the Bishop of Rome was Antichrist, foretold by the word of God. The Ministers haue for a long time written and preached it, and the Catholike Doctors the contrary. They now made this opinion an article of Faith, & added it to their confession for the 31. And for that many said they were molested because they tearmed the Pope Antichrist in their publike or priuate discourses, they were exhorted to persevere in this confession as one of the principall causes of their departure from the Church of Rome, and charged their Deputies in Court to beseech his Majesty not to suffer them to be hindered in making a free confession of that which they believed. The Pope complained vnto the King by his Nuncio, who no lesse affected to the holy Sea then his Predecessors, who had received the glorious title of Christian, was much offended, forbidding the Ministers to proceede any farther, and not to vomit forth those bad words, from whence might spring a new kinde of poyson.

The confession of faith being read and examined, it was sworne by all the Deputies in the

At the name of their Prouinces, with promise to continue, and a protestation that it was the same doctrine that was taught in their churches. Which done, they entred into the examination of their discipline: It is the order which should be held for the administration of the word of God, prayers, and the decency of Ceremonies, whereof their assemblies are very bare, and yet notwithstanding being purged from superstitions are very necessary and maintaine religion, as the barke preferres the tree, without the which it withers and dries away. In this reading of the discipline, it was obserued, that some Prouinces had particular formes and ceremonies, in the election and reception of Ministers. The assembly judging by the aduice of the Apostle, that wee must haue but one rule and one forme in matters of Religion, they ordained that all Churches should follow the same forme, in the imposition of hands vpon Pastors, by the which he that should be presented to be received should kneele, and this imposition should be vpon the Sunday, or some other day of solemne assembly, in the presence of the people, and not in Consistories, or Colloquies.

And for that it was shewed that many Ministers in their preaching, used more the authority of the Fathers, then that of the Scripture, the Assembly threatened them with suspension which straying from expositions conformable to the word of God, were carried away to those of the Fathers, or scholasticall Doctors, or deliuering allegories, or discourses of Philosophy, produced the words of the Fathers in the Pulpit, namely, in the time of Lent, or the like season, or tooke the text of Catholike Preachers.

They did also disallow like disputations in Synodes and Colloquies, vpon controversies of Diuinity, lending them to the Schooles at Saumur, there to be argued according to forme of Syllogisme, which is the instrument of disputation. They also thought these contentions among Pastors to be dangerous, and necessary to restrain them that would bring them in vfe.

The Discipline hauing bene read and sworne by all the Deputies, in the name of the Prouinces, with a solemne protestation to obserue it strictly, and to cause it to be obserued in all points, and in all their Churches, they produced the acts of the last Synodes, to see what remained to be executed. Then they past Appellations made by priuate men, greceiving at the Decrees of Prouinciall Synodes, after which they iudged of censures, suspensions, and other corrections, whereunto they added that which concerned the prouision and establishment of Ministers, in those places where they were demanded, and whereas the assembly thought them necessary.

Afterwards they treated of the generall affaires of the cause. The petition of the brethren of the Marquitate of Saluces, banished from their houses for the profession of this religion, hauing bene read, the Assembly answered; That they should be maintained and confirmed in the vniion of the Doctors and discipline of other Churches, and to that effect petition should be made vnto the King, to recommend them to the Duke of Saoy, that they might enioy the liberties granted by the Edicts.

Vpon this question, if in suites depending before the Iudges of another religion, they should vse these words, Friendes, reformed Religion. The Synode said; That petition must be made vnto the King, not to force them to say or doe any thing contrary to their Consciences, exhorting all men of this religion to forbear this word of Reformed, as contrary to the freedom and liberty of their confession.

They of Xaintonge propounded another if it were lawful for a priuate man to appropriate a place for his buriall, and to set it vpon pillars or otherwise, and if it be lawful for Noblemen or other, to set vp their armes in Temples which are built. The Synode answered, That for Sepulchers, all should be obserued according to ancient simplicitie, without appropriating any thing in particular, witnessing their communion with the Saints that were dead, as well as they desired in the happy resurrection. As for Temples they should obserue the same modesty and simplicitie. The assembly casting their eyes vpon spirituall and politike matters, they did carefully consider of that which concerns Schooles and Vniuersities, as the Nurseries of Ministers, and Pastors of their Doctrine, hauing nothing in religion more important then the instruction of youth, the which is made apt to any thing we please, wherefore they ordained, That all the Prouinces should entertaine a certaine number of Schollers in the Vniuersities of this Realme, the which should not be admitted to the Ministry in their Prouinces without good and sufficient testimony ny of their manners and doctrine, from the Pastors and Professors of the Vniuersities A where they had studied. The Vniuersities are also exhorted to haue common Libraries, and especially the great Bible of Antwerpe in many languages.

This yeare the King did graue in the Register of his vertues a memorable example of Iustice: The cause is considerable, and the subiect of consequence. A young Gentlewoman of Normandy visited and courted by her brother, disdained her husband, by whom she had two Children, for that hee was somewhat aged, and made no profession of armes. This inequality of age, together with his condition, made the conjugal affection like vnto a small brooke, whereof when the spring is stopt, the bed remains dry, and there is nothing left but filth for roads and frogs. The Greene grass that was vpon the banks wth thereth, yea, the trees that were planted along, dye. This marriage, hauing lost the radical humour of loue, it made all pleasure and content to wither, produced nothing but noise, diffidence, contempt, and quarrell. This miserable woman cared no more for her husband but to draw means from him to make her selfe more pleasing in the eyes of another, delighting in luxuriose and excess of apparell, vnder the which the Deuill is accustomed to make open war to Chastity, and to rauish the honour of a woman, without the which her life is a life without a body, a body without a soule, a soule without a spirit, a spirit without breath, and a breath without ayre.

It seemed that the first acquaintance of this woman with her brother, was nothing but a perfect loue, such as honour and that which they were one vnto another might well allow. Who so had seene the familiarities of this Sister with her Brother, would not haue beleueed that they had made loue, the law of Nature being of greater force then reason, or truth it selfe. In the meane time this fury proued Adultery and Incest, making the wife to abandon the company of her husband, to cleaue vnto her brother, who forgetting nothing that might be said or done to couer his crime, and to auoide punishment, wandered vp and downe the country with her vnder disguised names, but carying still in his conscience the sting and vulcer of so execrable a pleasure. She grew big with child, and beleueing that in hiding her great belly, her offence should be also hidden, she caused her selfe to be conducted into that great forest of Paris, where she continued with her brother the exercises of Cupid and Pysces. The Fig leaues could not couer their shame. The All-seeing eye of the diuine Iustice discouers them, and will not suffer that so infamous lust should continue. These violent fireames being run out, the mud and filth that was in the bottome appeared presently. The husband oppressed with so iust a griefe (as the Law doth not hold him punishable, whom it forceth to kill, the wife being surprised in adultery) came to Paris, and discovered those which had deprived him both of rest and honor, he caught them to be apprehended and committed prisoners, the one in the great Chasteler, the other in Four l'Euêque. The Sister confesseth her selfe guilty of adultery, to free her brother from Incest, laying the child to one that was altogether innocent. Vpon the difficulty of proofes, the Lieutenant Criminal condemned them both to the rack. He might well haue proceeded to sentence.

But considering that they must deliberate well, before they iudge of the life of a man which is not made without care, he desired rather to proceede coldly therein, then out boldly. The husband, whose heart could not be moued to pity, by the consideration of his two children, appeales from this sentence of the Racke. The Court considering that mildnesse doth nourish, and giues more scope to vice, declares the appellation and sentence from the which he had appealed, to be void, and amending it, they iudge the accused sufficiently conuicted of the crimes of adultery and incest, for satisfaction whereof they condemne them to lose their heads. The King, during the Proceffe, was often fied vnto for their pardon. But considering, that in such crimes it were impiety to shew pity: that mildnesse was severity and clemency cruell; and that the most holy and the most iust of his Predecessors, reuoked a pardon which he had giuen to a malefactor, falling vpon that verse of the Prophet David in his praiser booke: Doe iustice as all times said; That he referred it to the iustice of his Court of Parliament. The father desired to change the infamy of the punishment into a death lesse shamefull, but longer and more cruell, the which the Emperour Opilius Macrinus vied, causing such as were condemned for crimes, to be shut vp betwixt foure walls. He offered all his lands to procure his children that manner of punishment. This could not be, for that by the doome of the iudgment,

The execution of the parties
condemned.
The Constable
of Castille pat-sage.

A the execution was to be done at the Greue, where it moued pity and compassion in many, lamenting the youth of the brother, the beauty of the sister, and the misery & blindness of them both. The yeare ended in peace, as it had begun in pleasures and sports, there was no new occasion offered but the passage of the Constable of Castille to go into England, for the conclusion of the Treaty of Peace betwixt the Kings of England and Spaine. The King desired of his passage by Bourdeaux, sent to the Marshall d'Ornano to receive him, the which he did, going to meet him with a great number of Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Country. The Emperour Charles the sixth, passing through France, admired the great and goodly traines of Gouernours of Prouinces, which came to receive him, commending them very much.

The Constable of Castille (full of his Spanish fumes) made no great account thereof, and receiued these honors after a Spanish manner. The Marshall d'Ornano entreating him with the singularitys of this Realme, told him: That he should see a country, yea a world, in fine Paris. He answered him; That hee had left behinde him backe the goodliest Cities of Christendome. But they are not so great nor so well peopled, said the Marshall d'Ornano. The people, answered the Constable, add nothing to the excellency of Cities, although it helps something for the strength of the State. The Marshall asked him, if he would not see the King. He shewed by his answer, That hee was not greatly curious, yet must he see him, with due respect that was due to that Maiesty. Hee came to Paris with a great traine.

The King of Spaine, spares no cost on such occasions, and thinkes no expences more royall, then those which make his gold to glitter in the eyes of strangers. In like sort, his Ministers and Ambassadors seeing themselves so well followed, and serued, take delight in shewing the greatnesse of their Master, and are not silent when they must publish his power. Mendoza who neuer went out of his lodging but on horse backe, in Litter, or in Carrosse, with all his traine, although it were but to goe to the Church, the which was very neare his lodging, he neuer spake three words, but two was for the greatnesse of his Master, saying often, That God was mighty in Heauen, and the King of Spaine on earth. Another going out of Rome to accompany the Pope, went with six Litters, six Carosses, euery one hauing six horses, two hundred Groomes, and threecore Carts for baggage, and all for a small journey. The Prince of Parmas traine was admirable and royall, shewing by his equipage the greatnesse of his Master whom he serued. The Constable of Castille did not hide it, neither in his words nor in his traine, hee had alwaies some words of ostentation to shew it.

He went to the Louvre and did see the King in his Cabinet, he entred with a good grace, but stately and proud, the which was suddenly conuerted into great humility, for approaching neare vnto his Maiesty (who was sitting in a Chaire) he kneeled vpon one knee, and continued to a little longer then he thought. The King tooke him vp, embraced him, and shewed him a very good countenance. Hee spake much to assure him that the King of Spaine held nothing more deare, then the preseruation of the peace; and vntill that time should greatly force his will, hee had no other power but to continue it in this resolution, and to bring forth fruits of great loue and friendship, the which is firme and constant betwixt equal powers. Hee heard from the King words of the same affection: then hee tooke his leave to goe see the Queene. Going downe to crosse the Court, where he was attended by his people with forty torches of white wax, hee said to some of his Company, That the King had receiued him with the Maiesty of a King, and had embraced him as his Kinsman.

Hauing done his duty vnto the Queene, he demanded leave to goe and see the Dauphin. The King caused him to be conducted the next day to S. Germaine. Being arriued there, they gaue notice to his Gouernesse, that the Constable was there with a great Train of Spaniards. At that word of Spaniards, the little Prince opened his eyes, and makes them speake it againe. They be Spaniards that come to see you; Spaniards, said the Prince, yea, ye, giue me my sword. Who so had not knowne that this word came from his owne motion, would haue thought that they had printed in his fantasie the same opinion which King Charles the 7, Lewis the 11, and Charles the 8 had had in their infancie of the English and Bourguignons. And if the Spaniards had heard him, the strangenesse of such a word would haue caused them to apprehend new work, and to feare and beleue that which the French souldier saith, That they must present Milan for the

the first attempt of this young Eagle. The Constable admired his constant eye, and his Physiognomy, and was amazed at so great a boldness in that age, and so much judgment in that infancy. Monsieur the Dauphin told him tales in his language, and according to his understanding, as Alexander did to the Ambassadors of Persia. All the Spaniards did marvel, and the more; for that the doore was open for the least of the traine. They see about him a goodly company of young Noblemen, Alexander Monsieur, the Prince of Longueville, and the three Sons of the Duke of Epernon. The Constable of Castille past on to goe into Flanders, he came to Bruxelles, and descended at the Archdukes Palace, where he was well received, and from thence he past into England.

The Kings age.

Although the Subiect ought not to reckon the yeeres of his Prince, but to wish him a long and prosperous life, yet we must say, that with the end of the last yeare, the King began the foure and fiftieth yeare of his age, a yeare which Cato held to bee ripe and well advanced, whereunto few Kings of France attained, and yet it hath nothing abated the vigor and strength of this Prince, who is active and disposed, and as lively as he was at the age of thirty yeares. Cares and yeares having onely made his beard white, it is true, that now he begins to feeble some flux of the gout. A disease which breeds with ease, and which comes to Princes rather by excess, then by travell in their youth, and which is sooner gotten by the chase of Venus, then by that of Diana, there being no pleasure in the world which doth not carry some displeasure behind it. The best course is to repent the euill before they commit it, that is to say, to haue onely intended it, and the means to grow old, is neither to doe nor to care: any thing through voluptuosity. A great condition or quality to whom all things are lawfull that please, will finde this rule of government very hard. Great men commit great excess, and in the end they taste the fruit which they haue sowne. It is reason that after a time infirmities should cease, and cleare the troubles of their soules, as thunder and lightning doth purge the ayre, that diseases (as fore-runners of death, and porters of the prison wherein they are inclosed) should reach them that they are men, and subiect to humane miseries, that they are not raised vpon the Clouds, to be free from a world of miseries that are dispersed vpon the earth, and that they should remember that the more their delights abound, the more their strength decays, and that he that doth least, doth least harme, and passeth the daies of his life with more content and lesse griefe.

The King troubled with the gout.

The King would not complain much of that litle touch of the gout, for that it had bene but gentle, and when that after his recovery, the Courtiers did see him to weare furred boots, they said, It was more to hold the griefe in some reputation, then for any need he had. He did a publike act which hath particularities worthy to be knowne. I doe not forget these occasions, for that they supply the discourse of this History, without the which it should be constrained to seeke for matter far without the Realme: for secret things, and which are treated of in the Councell of the Cabinet, wee must attend the knowledge thereof by the euent, which time shall discover, and not trouble our selues to seeke out the springs of Nilus. A father, how great and how powerful soeuer, cannot thinke too soone nor too often, to breed vpon the youth of his Child in vertue, nor to assure his fortune: I say a Child without distinction: for although the law doth distinguish Bastards from them that are lawfully begotten, yet Nature makes no difference. The King hauing determined to make Alexander Monsieur (his base son) of the order of the Knights of Malta, resolved to do it in time, that he might receiue the name & the effect. The great Master repuring it an honour to haue a Prince of their company, issued from so valiant and courageous a Race, sent all necessary expeditions. The King hauing receiued them, would haue the execution to be accompanied with a sumptuous and a stately ceremony. He caused the great Commander of France, & that of Champagne to come to Paris, & commanded them to call the greatest number of Commanders and Knights they could thither. The King had chosen the Augsperger Church for this effect, but the Commander of Ville-Dieu (being Ambassador of their Order) beseeched him, that it might be in that of their Temple, as one of the chiefe houses of the Order. On the Sunday morning the King and the Queene went in one Carosse, hauing Alexander Monsieur betwixt them, who was deliuered by the King vnto the Grand Prior, who attended him at the first gate with all the Commanders and Knights. As the church was hung with the richest Tapistry that could be found, so was it filled with that which was of greatest worth in Paris. The

A Princes, the Princeesses, the Cardinall of Gondy, the Popes Nuncio, many Bishops, the Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice, the Constable, the Chancellor, the seuen Presidents of the Parliament, and the Knights of the order of the Holy Ghost. The ceremony began by the blessing of the Sword, and by the change of his habits, to let the Knight understand, that he did bind himselfe to change his life, and to take vpon him the true ornaments of vertue, without the which all the pompe & felicity of the world is but winde and vanity: for being attired with white Satin, laid thicke with gold Lace, the sleeves whereof were garnished with rich Medailles, a Carkanet of stones crosse vnder his arme, a blacke velvet Cap, with a little white feather, and a band couered with great Pearles, he put on a Robe of blacke Taffata, and was conducted neere vnto the great Altar, being accompanied with the Duke and Duchesse of Vendome, and followed by the Commander for the conduct of this ceremony. Sainste Foy Bishop of Neuers made him a litle admonition of the greatnes and excellency of the order whereinto he entred. It is the first of Christendome, as that of the Germanes is the second. Of Calatrava the third, of S. Iuques in Spaine the fourth, of S. Mary de la Mercede in Arragon the fift, of Christ in Portugall the sixth, of Saint Lazare and S. Maurice in Sauoy the seuenth, of S. Stephen in Tuscane the eight. This exhortation ended, the Masse began, and after the Gospell, Alexander Monsieur presented himselfe vpon his knees before the Grand Prior of France, with a burning torch of white wax in his hand, to demand the Order. Hereat the King (who was set vnder a rich cloth of Estate of Purple Velvet embroidered, in the midst of the Quire) left his place, and comming neare to helpe him to answer, hee said aloud, That he left the ranke of a King, to doe the office of a Father. The Grand Prior gaue him the Order after the accustomed manner, and after Masse was done, as a new Knight hee presented himselfe the second time to make profession. The King advanced againe, and promised for him, that comming neare to the age of fixtene yeares, he should make the vovues and profession perfect. They be the same vovues which religious men doe make, Obedience, Pouerty, and Chastity. He did his obedience in the same place, and then being disrobed, the Grand Prior set vpon his brest a platoon of blacke Satin, with a great white Crosse, and so the Ceremony ended with great joy and sounding of Trumpets. The new Knight feasted the Grand Priors of France and Champagne, with the Commanders and Knights at the Temple, and the King went to dine with Zamet.

The King doth the office of a Father.

This Order hath alwaies affected two sorts of Knights, some for seruice, and others for honour, and both for the greatnes, defence, and support of the Order. There haue bene Children of the greatest and mightiest houses of Christendome, who although they do to seruice in effect, (being dispensed withall) yet they profit their profession much, by the entertainment and communication of friendships and respects of their houses, to the common good of the Order. Others that are issued from the noblest Families of all the Nations of the world, are bound vnto a viall seruice in the Iland, they haue all the Mediterranean Sea for the bounds of their exercise, and all the world for witnesses of their glory. After that they haue done the seruice which they owe vnto the Order, they cannot grow old in pouerty, and in this assurance they goe more willingly vnto all occasions that demand a prooue of their valour, being reasonable to hazard themselves in great enterprises, to merit great recompences.

Death of the Duchesse of Bar.

Let vs passe to the Duke of Lorraines Court, which we shall finde all in teares and mourning, for the death of the Lady Catherine of Bourbon, Duchesse of Barre, and the Kings only Sister, shee had bene tormented with a continuall Feuer, and there were some signes of being with Child. All the Physicians said she was not with Child, onely maintained the contrary, and she belieued his opinion, for that he was of the religion, neither would he take any thing but from his hands, for that we beleue that easily which we desire. She grew in choller against them which imputed her disease to any other cause, saying: That they neither desired her contentment nor her husbands. She thought she could not endure too much to become a mother. This belied that she had a child in her body, made her to bring forth death, rejecting all kinds of remedies to preserve her fruit. If the Physician which administered to her as to a woman with child, had not fled to Metz, and from thence to Sedan, all his physycke could not haue kept him from death. The profession of Physicians hath this priuledge, that the Sunne sees their practice, and the earth hides their fault.

A marriage of great content.

After five years influence made by the King, the Pope granted a dispensation of the marriage.

The Kings sorrow for the death of his sister.

The D. of Mucou caused an Ambassadors hat to be nailed to his head.

Imposition of thirty in the hundred in Spain.

The Duke of Lorraine did her no less honour after her death, then he had witnessed in her life. He sent unto the King an Inventory of her Jewells. He caused the body to be conducted unto the Frontier of France, in a Carosse well appointed, covered with black Velvet, and drawne with foure horses, the foure Bailiffs of Lorraine carried the foure corners of the cloth which covered the Coffin threefoore Gentlemen marched before with the Guards. The Earle of Chaligny and some Noblemen of the Country went after it. There were twelue Suisses which marched on either side. It was received on the frontier by those whom the King had appointed. The Inhabitants of Troyes would haue recieued it with a Canopy, but Tintennille thought it not fit, neither would the King haue taken it well. She was much lamented by the Duke of Bar, who could not haue bene his husband to a better wife, nor the wifeto a better husband. The fifth yeare of their marriage was with as great respect and loue as the first. The affections of this Prince and this Princeesse were in such harmony, that besides the diuersity of religion, you would haue said they were but one soule, not in two bodies, but in one called by two names: for they spake with one mouth, and thought with one heart. And if there bee any content in dying, amidst the contents of this world, this Princeesse protested, That she had neuer content in this world more perfect then in Lorraine. The Duke of Lorraine and the D. of Bar, desired as well to see her satisfied for doubts of Religion. They coniuured her in the extremity of her sickness to thinke of her soules health, but she said vnto them, That she would dye as she had liued. Shee was no more forced in the exercise of her Religion at Nancy then at Nerac. True it is, that she went to receive the Communion without the towne, and had preaching and praiers in her house, but for her selfe onely and her followers, without the which shee had bene much honoured by the Lorraines, and at that time more then before, the Pope hauing granted a dispensation of the marriage. When the newes of her death was brought vnto the King, the chiefe of his Councell came presently to apply some remedy to this wound. He found that they came to that end, and therefore he commanded them to leaue him alone, and that he would resolue with God. He caused the doores and windowes of his Cabinet to be shut, casting himselfe vpon his bed, to weepe more freely, and to ease his griefe in the liberty of his sighs. All the Court did mourne, and the Ambassadors presented themselves in that habit vnto the King, to condole this death in the behalfe of their Masters. The Popes Nuncio was somewhat troubled in this complement, and would not mourne at an accident, for the which those of his profession could not weepe. The King said, That he would not tie him to it against his liking, but he would be glad not to see him vntill his time of mourning were past. Some other would not haue spoken so mildly: and we know that Princes haue shewne strange effects of their choller, against Ambassadors that haue failed in the honour and respect of these complements. The Nuncio being better aduised, refused to apply himselfe to the time, and to doe as the rest, thinking it would not be taken ill at Rome, knowing that he did it onely to please the King, and to haue audience. But he had some difficulty to descypher himselfe when he was to speake vnto the King, for he could not vnder one habit play two contrary personages; neither had hee wordes in his mouth, nor teares in his eyes for this sorrow. He that will ease anothers griefe, must shew, that he hath a part and feeling thereof. He went after another manner, and his spirit did fit him with another kind of complement, the which although it were free, yet was it not vnpleasing. He said vnto the King, That such as knew what he was, & in whose name he spake, would wonder at the office which he did, but he had more occasion then any other, for that all lamented the losse of the body, but his Master, the losse of the soule. The King said vnto him, That he beleened his Sister was saved, for that in the last gaspe an extreme griefe might carry her right into heauen: the Nuncio replied, My Lord, that discourse is more Metaphysicall then Physicall, and so they both entred into other talke.

The King of Spaine and the Archdukes had the yeere before for an imposition of thirty for the hundred, vpon all merchandize that should come out of their Dominions. This was secretly to forbid the French to traffike into their Countries, and openly to break the Treaty of Veruins. This Imposition did very much trouble, and in a manner put all our Townes which traffike commonly into Spaine and Flanders, into a murther. The King could not in the beginning perswade himselfe, that they would tie his Subjects to the obseruation of this charge, commanding his Ambassadors which resided with those

A those Princes, to expostulate the matter, and to aduertise him thereof. Their answers, and the rigor they vied afterwards to his Maiesties subiects to make them pay the Imposition, did witness sufficiently that they would not exempt them. To obserue some equality in the intercourse of publike trafficke betwixt the subiects of the three Princes, the King imposed the like custome vpon all Merchandize, that should come out of the Dominions of the King of Spaine, and of the Arch-dukes into France, and vpon those which should be transported out of France into their Countries. These burthenfome impositions, the rigours wherewith they were exacted, the abuse and deceipts which were committed in receiving thereof, could not induce the two brother-in-lawes to make the trafficke free as it ought to be betwixt good neighbours, which desire to enjoy the fruits of peace which God hath giuen them, as the King protested he would doe, by his declaration, and had alwayes shewed it by the effects.

So to redeeme his subiects from the losses and vexations which they received by this Imposition, the King by the aduice of his Councell, did forbid all his subiects in general, to transport any kind of Merchandize, without exception, vnto any place under the obedience of the King of Spaine, and the Arch-dukes in Flanders; and the entry into his Realme, of all those that might come out of their Countries and Estates. And to the end that the effect of his intentions might not be made frustrate, to the contempt of his ordinances, by such as might lade Merchandize in France, and afterwards cause them to be transported into the said Princes countries, he ordained that all strangers, subiects to other Princes and Common-weales, to whom he allowed free trafficke into his Realme, before they should depart from those places where they had laden the Merchandize which they meant to transport, should giue in good and sufficient caution before the Officers of the Port, to bring backe within a certaine time prefixed, a certificate from the Officers and Magistrates of those places, whether they pretended to carry the said Merchandize, by the which it might rightly appeare, that they had bene discharged there: and if it should bee afterwards verified, that they had bene laden againe, and carried to any forbidden places, the Sureties should bee answerable. And it should be lawfull for the Kings Iudges and Officers to commence sute against them and their posteritie.

Traffick into Spaine and Flanders forbidden.

The Merchants of the coast Towne produced many great reasons to moue him to take away this Imposi: but his Maiesty did oppose others that were more important, the which made him obstinate in this defence. He himselfe receiued the greatest preiudice, for his farmes were much diminished. But he desired in this point as in all other, to doe the office of a good father to his people, and rather suffer this losse for himselfe, then to see an infinite number of families to fall into insupportable ruine, by Bankrupts which these insupportable impositions would make.

Desire and hope of gaine, would make Merchants to sic through fire, if there were no other passage, rather then to lose any occasion of profit: yet notwithstanding many did by the means of Strangers traffike into forbidden places. Neither is there any Decree which doth excuse, and the Treachery of Officers will so violate: wherefore the King did by a second Decree adde corporal punishment, with confiscation of Merchandize against them that should infringe it, their fauourers, counsellors, or abettors, and giuing the moiety thereof vnto the informers: enjoying the Merchant which should haue any Merchandize in the Sea ports, and sedentary Townes, to cause them to be marked and introlled by his Officers, to auoid the abuse and fraud which might be committed by a gainful intention: and whereunto the corporal punishment of some forced others to obey. Some thoughts that these bitter proceedings should soon alter the peevish humours, yet is continued and remained firme and irremediable: neither was there any Decree by which the two Kings made use of another King, Philip being such some complaints which the two Kings made use of another King, Philip being

The French King would did the like.

So to redeme his subjects from the losses and vexations which they received by this imposition, the King by the aduice of his Council, did forbid all his subjects in general, to transport any kind of Merchandize, without exception, vnto any place vnder the obedience of the King of Spaine, and the Arch-dukes in Flanders; and the entry into his Realme, of all those that might come out of their Countries and Estates. And to the end that the effect of his intentions might not be made frustrate, to the contempt of his ordinances, by such as might lade Merchandize in France, and afterwards cause them to be transported into the said Princes countries, he ordained that all Strangers, subjects to other Princes and Common-weales, to whom he allowed free traffike into his Realme, before they should depart from those places where they had laden the Merchandize which they meant to transport, should giue in good and sufficient caution before the Officers of the Ports, to bring backe within a certaine time prefixt, a certificate from the Officers and Magistrates of those places, whither they pretended to cary the said Merchandize, by the which it might truly appeare, that they had bene discharged there: and if it should bee afterwards verified, that they had bene laden againe, and caried to any forbidden places, the Sureties should bee answerable. And it should bee lawfull for the Kings Iudges and Officers to commence sute against them and their posteritie.

Traffike into Spaine forbidden.

The Merchants of the coast Towne produced many great reasons to moue him to take away this Imposit: but his Majesty did oppose others that were more important, the which made him obstinate in this defence. He himselfe received the greatest prejudice, for his farmes were much diminished. But he desired in this point as in all other, to doe the office of a good father to his people, and rather suffer this losse for himselfe, then to see an infinite number of families to fall into insupportable ruine, by Bankrupts which these insupportable impositions would make.

Desire and hope of gaine, would make Merchants to sit through fire, if there were no other passage, rather then to lose any occasion of profit: yet notwithstanding many did by the means of Strangers traffike into forbidden places. Neither is there any Decree which putteth this off, and the Treachery of Officers will so violate: wherefore the King did by a second decree adde corporal punishment, with confiscation of Merchandize against them that should infinge it, their fauourers, counsellors, or abettors, and giuing the moiety thereof vnto the informers: enioying the Merchants which should haue any Merchandize in the Sea-ports, and freshne Townes, to cause them to be marked and shrouled by his Officers, to auoid the abuse and fraud which might be committed against his intention: whereunto the corporal punishment of some forced others to obey. But in some thoughts that these bitter proceedings should soon alter the peace of Veruins, yet is continued, and continued, firme and irremovable: neither was this any secret, but some complaints which the two Kings made one of anothers King, which being offended, that the French King voluntarily to fence the Estates of his neerer Rebels, and did lay a new reduction of Officers, that the King did doe so there with twenty and more, with others which belonged to warfare, and that he had forbidden his subjects to traffike into Spaine and Flanders. But it is impossible for Princes to impose such strict laws vnto their subjects, but they will passe them to conuey themselves into foreign Countries, and in this manner satisfaction; that they did know such a discontentment themselves to goe and serue another without leave, as the King did them which vnder the name of the French King did sell them their liberty, he did but take the which they had lent him, and did pay by retayle the gross: which hee had received in his necessity. As A for the defence of traffike, it tended to no other end, but to force the King of Spaine and the Archduke, to discharge that intolerable Imposition, and to make him know that France can better live without the commodities of Spaine, then Spaine without those of France.

The King for his part complained, but with Iustice and Reason. For (sayd hee) I impart my deligens to very few men, and yet they are presently disconcerted to my enemies. The King of Spaine will he neuer leaue to corrupt the fidelity of my subiects? will he alwaies entertaine some traitor within my Realme? my Ambassador complains vnto me by his letters, that he is so ill informed of affaires, and so late, that the King of Spaines Ministers know of them before him. As his Maiesty was much troubled to know from what Spring did rise this pestilent liquor of Trechery, behold, God doth lay open the iniquity of Indas, by means which humane wisdom could not foresee. Villeroi (that great French Oracle, who deliueres the answers of the affaires of the Realme, who knows the most secret, and doth manage the greatest) was serued by one Nicholas Lofse borne at Orleans, and with the more confidence, for that his father had spent most of his yeares in his seruice. La Rochepot going to reside Ambassadour in Spaine, Lofse desired to bee entertained by him, and to serue him as a Secretary, and to fashion himselfe to affaires. The recommendation of Villeroi gaue him an easie access, by the which in few moneths hee made himselfe so capable both for the language and fashion of the Countrey, as he might well be taken for a naturall Spaniard. The Ambassador having sworn the Treaty of Verrains in the name of the most Christian King, the King of Spaine presented him with a rich chaine of Stones, and with six others of gold of an hundred and fifty crownes apiece, to honor so many of his chiefe Followers. The pride and presumption of this young man made him thinke he should be of this number, seeing that a companion of his had bene found worthy, and his master did not thinke that his youth and small experience, did so foone merit to be placed in the first rankes of his seruice.

As the Humors of Bodies that are altered, doe insensibly peruert the health: So the deuill insinuates into the hearts of men, if they giue him any little entrance. Envy and Jealousie were the windowes by the which he slipped into the soule of Lofse: Vanity, Lying, Pride, Luxury, and exesse of youth gaue him full entry. Hee had spent all his money to purchase the loue of a Curtizan, and saw no great meane how he should bee able to finish this great expence of luxury, the which notwithstanding he would not giue ouer: His Masters disdain had made him mad, but he knew the secrets of his cabinet, and discouering them to the King of Spaines Ministers, he giues two strokes with one stone, he is reuenged of this contempt, and preuented the shame which followed him, not to be able to continue his amorous bounty. With this designe he makes himselfe knowne to Don Francisco, one of the Secretaries of the State, and shewes him the consideration for the which he is resolu'd to giue certaine proofes of the seruice which hee had long vowed vnto the Catholike King, the which hee could easily performe, hauing the charge of the dispatches which the French Ambassador receiued and sent vnto the King his master. Don Francisco heares this proposition, as coming from a young man whose brain was not so well seised, as it did merit much credit: be it may be abhorring the treachery of this bad seruant, who held him like vnto himselfe. The Catholike King (sayd he (but coldly) hath to good correspondence with the French King, as he desireth not to know of his affaires, but so farre as his Ambassador shall informe him. Lofse yeelds not at this repulse. He knows that mens spirits being diuers may produce diuers aduices, and beleeues that some other will lend him his eare with more attention, and his heart with more affection: Tidagus another Secretary of the State, considering how much it did import a Princesse to know his neighbours secrets: That by reason of State they must buy them with Gold that can reuolue them, and must try all meanes to effect it: That the contempt of so rare an encounter will be against his masters seruice, and the duty of his charge: he gaue eare to the reason of his Traitor, and tasted them: he exhorted him to persist in this good affection, which hee shewed to procure the contentment and seruice of the Catholike King: hee promised to make the report vnto the King his master, and giues him his word that this affection of his should be rewarded with a bountifull recompence.

The Councell thinke it fit that Lofse should be heard: Tidagus makes him to speake with

A with the Duke of Lerma, whom lately they called Marquis of Denia. He shewes him the Alphabet of Cipher, by the which the Ambassadour his Master did write vnto the King. And for a prooffe he deciphered vnto the Secretary his Maiesties last dispatch. The Duke inuires him to continue to produce the effects, whereof he had giuen his word: Hee caught twelue hundred Crownes to be deliuered him as an earnest peny of the bargain, by the which this Traitor sold both his Master and the King, and assures him of the like yearly Pension, and of so large a remuneration as hee should haue cause to extoll the bounty of Spaine. From henceforth the French Ambassador receiueh not any dispatch, but the Councell of Spaine is duly informed thereof. But La Rochepot being called home, as we haue said, hee deprived this Traitor of all meanes to continue his Traffike; and by consequence merit the payment of the Conventions which he had made and ratified. He must therefore discouer the secrets of the Councell in France, and finds meane to returne into his first masters seruice: But he was kept backe by a controuersie which Villeroi had with his mother, vpon some remainder of Accompts. Notwithstanding, hee was farre engaged in the affections of Spaine, and had rather beare this losse out of the portion which fell vpon him by his father, then to see himselfe by his mothers disgrace excluded from all entry into his fauour which he affected. The Ambassadour also hauing at his instant sure giuen testimony of his fidelity and diligence, made his returne easie into his Masters Cabinet. Being thus restored, he becomes more subtile, more active, and more diligent, then all the rest: yea he offers to helpe his companions: but with a designe, that hauing also knowledge of the dispatches which passed through their hands, he might giue the better aduice to the Ministers of Spaine, and assure them of his deuotion to their seruice.

He did often visit and conferre with Taxis Ambassador for Spaine; and after his Ambassage ended, with Doctor Balthazar of Suniga his Successour, yea so filly as the dispatches came sooner to the Councell of Spaine, then to Des Barreaux Ambassadour for France, who aduertised the King, that when he propounded his Maiesties commandements to the Councell, he found them as well and sooner instructed then himselfe, neither could he discouer by what practice it came. It must be of necessity (said the King) that one D of my Councell hath great intelligences with him of Spaine, and yet I know not whom to suspect. The eternall Providence doth often draw very good effects from exceeding bad causes; as one nayle driues out another: so he suffers that the wicked shall discouer the trecheries one of another. Lofse had had secret conference with one Raffis, who had bene sometimes Secretary to Lansac, and a fugitive into Spaine, for many disloyalties which had made him become a Pensioner to Spaine. But they had begun to shorten his pension since the treason of Fontenelles Governor of Dornaueneist in Britany, whereof he had bene one of the chiefe instruments: and as by the discouery of his treason, Raffis had no more meane to serue the Councell of Spaine, so they held him for an vnprofitable mouth, and cut off his Pension. From that time hee receiued no other commoditie but a free access and vncontrouleable admittance vnto some of the chiefe of the Councell, who notwithstanding did not looke on him with so chearfull an eye, as when they drew from him instructions conformable to their intentions.

Raffis finds himselfe now reduced to that extremity, as he is ready to fall into great poverty & misery, on the other side, he sees a goodly occasion offered to preuent it, and a great gate opened, not onely to returne into his Countrey, but also to merit an abolition of his faults, with a notable recompence for so great a seruice which he might do vnto his naturall Prince. Hee therefore directes himselfe to one in whom the Ambassadour did much rely, and tels him how much hee is grieved to haue bene a dealer in the troubles and Rebelloions of France, whereof hee did confesse, that God had alwayes shewed himselfe Protector against all assaylants: That he desired to deface the memory thereof, and to repair them by a notable seruice, which did very much import the King, France, and all Christendome. That although hee did little esteeme the hazard of his life, for so iust and holy a worke, yet would hee not adventure it, but with a generall abolition of that which made him guilty towards his Maiesty. This report made vnto the Ambassador, hee heares Raffis, who tels him in general termes, that the King is betrayed, that his designs and most secret affaires are discouered, but he would not name the Traitor, but vnto his Maiestic himselfe. That his pardon being come, hee will free himselfe both heart and body body from those which he hath sufficiently known to be sworn Enemies to the Realme. A The Ambassador doth advertise the King thereof by a confident man. The King gives him authority to treat with Raffi. Hee could not verifie his accusation, but by two Letters written by Losse, to a great friend of his named Blas, a man of the same metall, the which he knew were in a box which Blas had, who lodged with him, for the getting of them they find meanes to send Blas vnto the Escoriall. In his absence, Raffi and Descartes the Ambassadors Secretary, breake the Boxe, and take out the Letters, by the which Losse did greatly extoll the bounty of the Spanish Ambassador, as exceeding the merit of his seruices. With this iustificacion, and the French Ambassadors dispatch, Raffi made them to go vnto a Monastery neere vnto Madrill, there to passe the Feast of Palmes Sunday, as he had beene accustomed to doe at solemne Feasts, sitting opposite to the way of France, to take away all suspition: but he came to Bayonnes with Descartes at a certaine day, Blas returned, the Feast-day being passed, his Boxe being opened, and the Company absent, made him thinke what it was. The King of Spaines Ministers are perfectly advertised, who instantly dispatched two Carriers to the Ambassador, to let him know that there was one gone, who without doubt would discouer the intelligences & practices of Losse. That he should haue a care of his safety, that being not able to be assured but by his mouth, he should be instructed (if he were taken) religiously to obseure the lawes of Silence.

Descartes and Raffi being come to Paris vpon Easter Tuesday, they created a great fidelity, but not so much discretion as a business of that importance did require. Villeroi went the same day to lye at his house, to be the next day at Fontainebleau, where the court was. And hauing met them at Luuiss, they did accompany him vnto Villeroi, but did not advertise him on the way of the cause of their coming, nor speake of the treachery of his man, but in deliuering their dispatch at his arrivall. Without doubt hee would haue neglected all other affaires, to assure himselfe of his traitor, who then finished his deuotion at the Charter-house Convent.

The next day he doth early acquaint the King with the coming of Raffi, and the detestable and vnexpected Treason of an vngratefull wretch, whose father and himselfe had neuer had better fortune but in his house. As he returns to his lodging, hee vnderstands that two Spanish Carriers are come to the Post-house. He commands one of the Deputies of the Poste to carry them into a Chamber, and that no man might speak with them: and to Descartes to watch for the coming of Losse, and not abandon him but presently to advertise him thereof. But both the Deputy and Descartes doe commit a great error: for Losse being come in Post about Noone, this vnadvised Deputy tells him, that there were two Posts come out of Spaine, who inquired of him, and had letters for him: and to adde more to his indiscretion, hee suffers him to goe vp to their Chamber, and to see them. Hauing saluted them, one of them told him in his care, that hee was vndone vnlesse hee fled, and that Raffi had discouered him. Terror, amazement, his conscience (whereof he could not suffer the testimonie) and the honour of the iust punishment of his wickednesse, doe easily perswade this wretch to fly, whom the Furies of hell doe violently pursue. Yet he assures his countenance as well as he could. Hee goes out with an intent to take horse, and to recover some place of safety. Descartes and Raffi find it. Descartes salutes him, who (it may be) thinking himselfe sufficient to giue an account of his person, was not curious to advertise Villeroi, who was then in his Cabinet with the Bishop of Chartres. The presence of Descartes was troublesome to Losse: to be rid of him, he said, he would go to his master who attended him. Descartes offers to accompany him: he then pretended that hee had not dined, and thinking they had done at the lodging, hee would seek it in a Tauerne. Neither haue I (sayd the other) we will dine together. Finding Descartes to follow him in this manner, hee seeks another euasion. I am weary (said he) my Bootes trouble me: Descartes adde, that hee desired to drink with him, and that he would be better after dinner. Thus discoursing together, they entered into Villeroi's lodging. Descartes leaves him in the chamber, being ignorant that the Carriers had spoken with him, and draws neere vnto the Cabinet, thinking that he had brought him into the snare. But when as he found himselfe free, he goes downe into the Stable, where finding his horse saddled, hee flies directly to Paris. Villeroi is in the meane time advertised that his man is come, he commands that hee should enter: but they finde him not, nor his horse in the Stable; neither can they coniecture which way he is gone.

Villeroi

Losse escapes
and is pursued.

Villeroi advertiseth his Maiesty of his escape: and they send out of all sides to follow him. Losse coming to Paris about nine of the clocke at night, he went to take counsell of the Spanish Ambassador, and before the breake of day he departed disguised like a Spaniard, with the Ambassadors Steward to conduct him, taking the way to Meaux to recover Luxembourg in profile. To encourage all men to seeke after this traitor, it was given out, that one of Villeroi's Secretaries had attempted against his Maiesties person. They described his stature, his age, his apparrell, and his horse. The Prouosts of Marshalls went to field. They had forbidden all Poste-masters to giue any horses. But hee of Meaux had notice given too late; he was already on horse-backe. But when he began to gallop, his horse falling, B gave his rider a heauy preface of some occurrent ill. Being re-mounted, hee seemed to amazed, as the Guide thought hee had committed some wicked act, for the which he fled. Hee advertised his master thereof at his returne, who remembering the defence which had beene made, presumed that this was he which was in question. Hee presently went to the Prouost Marshall, who prepared to pursue him. Passing the Riuer of Marne, the Prouost learns that hee could not be farre from the first Poste: and coming to the second Boat neere vnto La Ferte vnder Iouarre, hee findes that hee was then passing the riuer: but the force and feare which those Runaways offered vnto the Fermien, preauailed more then the Prouosts commandements and threats. Being past, they thought their Poste-horses would be presently ouer-taken by the great horses which they imagined to be at their backes, who leaving their Guide, commit their safety to the swiftnesse of their feet, during the darknesse of the night, through the thick bushes which did grow vpon the banks of Marne. The Prouost disperse his Archers, makes fires in the field, and sets the Country-men to search. The Spaniard got away: Losse went creeping from bush to bush, so terrified with the apprehension of Iustice which he could not auoid, as hearing the Prouost and his men beating the bushes with their swords, hee desired rather to free his body from the feeling of the punishment, which his treason had deserved, and to abandon his soule to the iudgement of God. At the breake of day his hat being leene betwix two posts whereas the current of the water had stayed it, made them presume that the carkase was not farre off. He was found there by the Abbesse of Iouarre men (who as Lady of the Iustice of that place) required that the proceesse might be instructed and made by her Officers. The Prouost of Paris and hee of the Kings house did also contend to haue knowledge thereof. In the end it was reuoked and retained in the Parliament by a decree made the 10 of May: the body was drawne from the Chasteler (where they had exposed it to ignominie, according to the custome in such actions) and caried to the prison of the Conciergiere, and the 15 day following, was layd vpon a hurdle & dragged into the Greue, and drawne in sunder with foure horses, and his quarters set vpon foure wheeles at the chiefe approaches of Paris. A worthy reward of an vnworthy Treacher, which hee deserved, if the eternall Providence had not otherwise disposed, that he should haue beene sensible of those torments, whose desperate death was happy for those which could not hope for any health, if any other more pitifull end had giuen him meanes to discouer their practices. This was very displeasing vnto the King, for that this wretch had smothered with his life, that which might haue giuen him light in many things importing his seruice, but exceeding grieuous vnto Villeroi, for that the full knowledge of the Traytors designs, and of the wickednesse of his Confederates was forbidden: moreover, that hauing bred him vp, and bound him by the effects of his fauour and loue, hee was so sensible of the ingratitude and treachery of this monster, as hee could neither ease nor sleepe. Besides, as the greatest dignities are most subiect to enuy and slander, hee did foresee that his enemies would take occasion to taxe his loyalty, to blemish his reputation, and if they could, to ruine his fortune. Yet hee had this great consolation, that although hee held the estate of this Realme as it were in his hand, the King knows that he doth not breathe any thing, but what is of his seruice. His Maiesty visiting him to confirme him in this consolation, would haue the world know, that he hath alwaies caried the mark of a good seruant, and the integrity of his conscience did serue him as an inextinguishable rampart against all his ill-willers.

Soone after, the King discouered a new practice against his seruice, and the Dauphins. The windes are inuifible, but they that blow them to gather these clouds together were well knowne, and from what coast they came. They were but sparkes of fire, as soone quenched

1604 quenched as kindled. The King did write vnto some of his chiefe and principall seruants A
 " in these termes: You must take it for a good signe, that you heare so feldome from me by " letter, for it is a signe that all is well, God be thanked, as well for my person, as for my af" faires. The Spaniards would willingly haue more matter and oftner, for they cannot " desist from their ordinary practices to corrupt my seruants. I haue of late discovered
 " some new designe, in the which my Nephew the Count of Auvergne and the Seigneur of " Entraignes are named, the which they haue willingly aduowed and confessed. But I haue " taken for good an order as no inconuenience shall happen.

Crations of new Cardinals.

The ninth of Iune, the Pope created eighteen Cardinals, not according to the passion of great Princes that had intreated him, nor to the liking of his kins-men, knowing that his Predecessors had conferred those dignities vpon unworthy persons, set Scarlet Hat vpon heads without vnderstanding, and giuen Palquin occasion to complaine, that some approached neere to Saint Peters Chaire that were more stones, and had lesse braines then he had: The King had recommended many great Prelates of France to be remem-bred at the first promotion, to supply their places that were dead. Among them that were newly created, there were two French & two Spaniards. The Spanish Ambassador made great instance to haue more, and notto haue his Master equalled by the French King.
 The first in the list was Seraphin Olinari Patriarke of Alexandria, by race an Italian, but borne at Lions, one of the most iudicious Prelates of his age: only vertue advanced him to this dignity, and the King made great instance for him by Bertrunes his Ambassador. C
James Dany Bishop of Eureux received the like Honour by the Kings recommendations.
 His seruices in reconciling the King with the Pope, his learned Writings, and his knowledge in Diuinity, did worthily purchase him this honour. The rest were all Italians except Bernard Maiziousschi Bishop of Cracouia a Polonian. Cardinall Alobrandin did also aduance Hermio his Secretary to this honour, of whom there is so much spoken in the discourse of the Warres of Sauoy. Anselme Marzat a Capuchin of Monopoli was forcibly drawne into the number by the Popes expresse commandement, hauing once refused this dignity, and protesting with teares of the iniurie that was done vnto Saint Francis and the strict rules of his Order. Of all the eighteen that were made Cardinals, D there was not any but this Capuchin but did affect it, and many others that did expect it were disappointed. There was some teare left the controversie betwix the Count of Eu-entes and the Grisons should draw a ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. The reason of this trouble grew, for that he would force the Grisons to breake the alliance they had made the last year with the Venetians, and to makethat which they had with France fruitlesse. The King aduertised of these practices, commanded De Vic his Ambassador to goe vnto Coire, and to represent vnto that people the wrong they should doe vnto their reputations in forsaking their faith and obseruation of their Treaties. Out of the discourse which De Vic did vnto them, so perswade them to the keeping of their word, these points were collected of the inuoluable firmnesse of their word and oath.
 There must be many acts of vertue to purchase and maintaine a great and good reputation, one only action to the contrary doth ouerthrow it, and smoothers the remembrance thereof. It is gotten by many commendable and vertuous actions, but that which pro-ceedes from constancy and generosity in the obseruation of promises, is so much the more commendable, for that it is grounded vpon Faith and Religion, which bee the two pillars that doe assure and maintaine Estates.

Religion one of the pillars of a State.

The Ancients haue said that Faith was the Foundation of Iustice, the honour of Heauen and Earth, without the which the world could not continue in peace, and they erected her Altar neere vnto that of thundering Iupiter, to shew that God is the Reuenger of the breach of Faith. And Religion is so proper to Man, and to the society of Men, that as Man cannot be Man without it, so there is no Nation how barbarous soeuer, that liues without some shadow of Religion. As they haue the best part of silence and the solemnitie of Alliances and confederations, in the which God is called on as a witnesse and Iudge of their intentions that doe promise and binde themselves; so is hee greatly wronged in the breach of promises. And therefore the commendations that are giuen to many Nations are held vaine and ridiculous, being separated from this constant and immutable affection of keeping their faith. As the Greekes haue bene commended for many actions of Valour and Vertue, the which notwithstanding vanish away shamefully, in

A in the reproach which hath alwayes bene made vnto them, to deny their words easily, and neuer to binde themselves, but with an intent to hold. And contrariwise, the memory of the Faith and constancy of the Romanes is so admirable, who abhorred the breach of promises, and held it an inexcusable crime to violate their Treaties. It is not armes alone, but the constancy of Religion and their faith giuen that haue raised them to so great a power, as they held in their hands, the Reynes of all the Princes of the habitable Earth. In the beginning, the neighbour people did not esteeme them as a City; but rather a campe of Theues, a nest of Tyranny, and a Citadel in the midst of them, to trouble and practise all the furies of their ambition. But when as they vnderstood that Faith openly and a simple path (all feare of punishment laid aside) did gouerne the City, they grew to such Re-uerence and respect, as they held it a greater happinesse, to obey a people so generous in their actions, so constant in their words, and so religious in their oaths, then to command ouer others. The formes of the Common-weale of the Grisons haue great conformities with the politicke and militarie Lawes of the Romanes: and as it yeelds nothing vnto them in Valour and Generositie, so hath it alwayes preferred (like vnto them) the Religion of their word and promise, holding publick faith the Foundation and Ground-work of Estates, as Treachery is the plague and ruine thereof. This sufficeth to shew how odious the perswasions or rather practices and Enchantments of those should bee, that coulde them to reuoke the Alliance, made and sworn with the Common-weale of Venice.

The estate of ancient Rome.

Wee must cherish and respect the counsels and remedies of such as loue the sicke Patient, but we must suspect all things that come from the hand of a Neighbour that is an ene-mie; they minister nothing, how sweet soeuer, which causeth not great motions and alterations in the body. This Hony is worse then that of Cholchos, which did not infect the heart, nor trouble the vnderstanding but for a day. In the distinction and choice of advice, we must preferre those that preface Honour, and augment Posteritie, before those that dissolve the concord and quiet of an Estate. Those (said a great Orator to the Athenians) are to bee credited that counsell to entertaine alliances with friends: for there is nothing more befitting a free City, then the care and loue of Equity and Iustice. Those D that by their policies and roughnesse, would separate the Grisons from the alliance of their friends, haue happely some designs vpon their liberty, the which they cannot execute better then by cutting off the number of their friends, the which can neuer bee too great, how great and mighty soeuer they be. And if they haue not this designe, yet their counsell is alwayes vniust, seeing the effect concerns the shame and ignominie of this Nation, which cannot goe from the truth of their promises, yalesse they will bee generally taxed for treachery and basenesse. A reproach so much the more to be feared, being certain that as soone as a Common-weale hath giuen any subiect to doubt of her faith, the most iugent new formes of Religion to purchase credit with other Estates, and vnkowne people, to trust vnto their promises; for such as know the deceivers, will avoid the deceit. And although among the corruptions of our age, faining and dissembling bee esteemed vertues, and haue in the opinion of the vulgar, notable qualities and operations, yet among those that haue contained themselves within the bounds of ancient Integrity, and know not the policies and deceits of the new-come, the people that are defamed for treachery and disloyalty lose all their friends.

And in the end this alliance hath bene sworn by the most solemne acts of Religion.
 The name of the liuing God (who should not bee taken in vaine, and is polluted by the lightnesse of an oath) hath been called vpon; it is an extreme impiety, to make that Soue-raigne spirit, that Infinite, Immutable, and Incomprehensible Essence, who is all Iustice and all Truth, a witnesse of our basenesse and lying, that the Holinesse of his name should couer our dissembling, his Iustice, our wrongs, his Truth, our deceit, and approve that which naturall reason cannot allow of. And this bond of faith giuen, is of such necessitie, as it must be kept euen with enemies, whereof that great Captaine Jo: de hath left a memorable example, refusing to breake the Treatie which he had made with the Cabionites, Pagan Infidels: although he had discovered their Deceit, and was intreated by the chiefe of the army to lose their alliance. The answer he gaue them, was grounded vpon Reason, saying, That they had giuen them their faith, and that they must haue left the fury of God, for whose name they had sworne should come vpon them. And thus he ended

The great promises of the Count of Fuentes to the Grifons.

Religion of the Grifons.

An alliance purchased difficult &amp; impossible.

There was great difficulty to retaine these people inclining to change, vpon the huge and copious promises made them by the Count of Fuentes. They could not resolute in their Councils. The weight and burthen of will and hope caried them away. Hee would reduce them to extreame necessitie, taking from them the Commerce of Milan, without the which they could not live. The Grifons estate is meere popular, consisting of six and twenty Commonalties, the which are diuided into three Cantons. It is a difficultie to finde any thing equall, constant, or well aduised among so many heads bred vp in the Maximes of a Democratic. The Count of Fuentes had debauched foure, who had like to haue corrupted and polluted the rest, as a little Levantine mantes a great lump of Dough. For they stucke onely vpon money, which the one demanded, and the other offered. Hee gaue so go od entertainment to the Ambassadors that came to him to Milan, as they passed as many Articles as hee pleased, applying themselves to his humour of Peace, which being dishonorable, is of worse condition for Free-men then Warre it selfe. But when at their returne they would haue drawne the people to allow thereof, the Ambassador of France argued so happily, as he let them vnderstand the prejudice and wrong that they did vnto themselves. So as the best-aduised being informed of this surprize, resolute not to stray from the obseruation of the Alliances of France and Venice, nor to depend for their passages, vpon the aduice and command of the Count of Fuentes nor of his successors, as he had bound them by his Articles, presuming that he could defend with the sword, that which hee had gotten with Gold. True it is, that they made offer to enter into a new Capitulation of all that might bee without prejudice to their Alliances, to assure a good Neighbourhood with the State of Milan, so as the Count of Fuentes would demolish the Fort within six moneths vpon their Frontier. The great Cantons of the Suisses were aduers in this business, perswading the Grifons to trust rather to courage then to the safety of their Mollities. Matters continued in great suspence. They sent often to Milan, and what was concluded there was dissolved in the Assembly of the people, by the friends of this Crowne, and by the wisdom of the Kings Ambassador, who laid plainly that his Maiesty would leaue their Alliance, if they made not a Declaration that might content him. Those iudgements that were found and not prejudicate, found it reasonable, and in this reason the honour of their faith, and the reputation of their estate; as contrariwise they thought it could not bee an act of glory to sell their alliance, as it was not commendable for the Spaniards to buy it, if they were of the Romanes humour, who neuer sought that by gold, which they might doe by the sword. But against these apparent reasons, the Count of Fuentes had so many tricks and deuices, as the Ambassador of France had much adoe to retaine this people; who promised in words not to forsake the Alliance of France and Venice, doing the contrary in effect. In former times it was credible that the Suisse, so great an enemy to the House of Austria, from whose subiection they had revolted, and the Grifon so contrarie to the Spanish fashions, would incline that way, and contradict the very feeling of Reason and Nature. The Truth hath freed the doubt, and lets vs see that it is of this people as of Vneger, the which neuer freezerh for that it is extremely cold. The Suisses and Grifons (for that they are enemies to the Spaniards) will not haue the power of Spaine to bee their enemy.

The bad successe of this business did not concerne France and the Venecians alone; the best aduised did fore-see that it might draw a ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. Many Commanders and Capitaines Grifons, not able to endure the rigour and threats of the Count Fuentes, were solicited by them of their Beliefe and Religion (lurking in Italy) to hold good, and to attend vntill the Lord came from Edom to disperte their enemies, and to beleue that as there is no warre more glorious then that which is undertaken to free their Countrey from seruitude, so there is none more iust then that which is made to deliuer Consciences from Tyranny, and that both in the one and the other occasion, it is a great happinesse and delectation to sacrifice their liues. The King sent aduice thereof to Rome for the consequence and danger of Religion. Hee did also pacifie the diuision of the people of Valais, who were in Armes, and ready to come to a generall combat for the same quarrell. In the meane time the Grifons remained betwixt the doubtfullnesse of Warre; and the discommodities of Peace, and as in the breeding of such Diuisions, free and curious spirits cannot retaine their passions, they made

A made Palquins in Italy vpon this subiect, and the Spanish braueries were not mute, the which the Grifons answered with like humour. If the Venecians who were the cause of all the mischief, would haue spoken and set their hand to the worke as they ought, the Count of Fuentes (who did more by example then by any authoritie) would haue intreated the Grifons more mildly. But besides, that Common-weales are not good for an offensive Warre, these Seigneuries who would not hazard any thing, but preferre present and assured things before that which was past and perillous, would haue bene content to haue enjoyed that which they desired without any trouble.

There was a generall assembly held at Illant, at one of the corners of the Grifons, where after great diuersitie of opinions, it was concluded by the greater part, that (seeing the Ambassadors had through their suarice defamed their Legation, and suffered the Count of Fuentes to binde the liberty of their aduice with chaines of Gold, and had exceeded the instructions that were given them) the last Treatie made at Milan, should bee declared void, and of none effect, if the alliance of France and that of Venice were not expressly referred. The Nobles of Spaine had wrought wonders, giuing motion to the most heauy, and speech vnto the dumbe, to fauour the Count of Fuentes inuentions, with a Nation that loues money beyond all measure. But in the end the consideration of their owne health, and the ruines of their liberty were of more force, making them to chooseth the hazard of armes, and of all discommodities, rather then to suffer the fort which the Count of Fuentes had caused to be built, to stand vrnruined. And for that (incensed with this resolution) he had made shew to seize vpon Vatelina, they made a leauy of eightene hundred men in six companies to oppose against him. The Kings intention was, that the Treaty of Milan should not alter the alliances of the Crowne of France and Venice. But if the Grifons should breake with the French, and dishonour their reputation with so foule a defection, the French had no great reason to regard it, seeing it were a losse but of inconstant friends, whose faith was ruined by the same meanes it was preferred. True it is, they should lose a goodly passage into Italy, but when they had any desire to go thither, it should not be by the Grifons. The French Armies were neuer led that way to passe the Alpes. It is true that when the Kings of France held Milan, this passage was necessary for them to draw in Suisses and Germanes for their seruice. But enjoying this no more, they need not to care much to lose that which cost them so deare to maintaine. This was the beginning of the thirteenth yeare of Pope Clement the eight sitting in the pontificall chaire. In his youth a Mathematician told him, that he should be a Cardinall then Pope, and should sit in the seat twelve yeares. A Friar had told Leo the tenth as much (hauing faued himselfe in Mantoua after the battell of Rauenna) assuring him that he should be Pope, before he came to the age of forty yeares. A terme which made this prediction seeme ridiculous and impossible, and yet it was true, for after the death of Iulio the second the young Cardinals being banded against the old, chooseth him Pope. The Astrologian, hath spoken very truly in the two first adventures of this Pope, but hee hath misteckned himselfe in the third, yet some feare it is but one yeare, for this which we shall shortly begin is full of bad confestations vpon that sea, as they hold that haue studied the booke of the Abbot Ischim.

About that time there was a Iesuite that maintained an opinion that was held very bold throughout all the Catholike Church, but most dangerous at Rome. That it was no point of the effence of faith to beleue that Clement the 8 was the true and lawfull successour of S. Peter. He was committed to prison, and if the Ambassador of Spaine had not dealt in it, he had sped worse, and tryed that the body hath often reason to complaine of the paine which the spirit causeth. Another Iesuite propounded a proposition which was held very strange for the nouelty and the consequence thereof. Which was, That confession might be done by Letters and by Posts. These with some other questions were decided before the Pope and the Cardinals in the following yeare.

There fell out halfe a sedition in Rome by the meanes of Cardinall Farneze. One being pursued by the Officers to be caried to prison, fled into the Cardinals Palace as into a Sanctuary, where he found a backe doore to escape. This flight was fauoured by the in-courtesy of some of the Cardinals Gentlemen, who walking in the Court and seeing the Sergeants make anoise at his escape whom they thought to apprehend, they gaue the bad words with some threats, for the small respect they had borne vnto their Masters house.

Curious questions.

Halfe a sedition at Rome.

1604

The Pope was advertised thereof, and the Governor of Rome went thither with his officers. The Cardinall Farnese beleued that all the Consistory was offended at this affront, the which troubled all Rome. They had giuen the Pope to vnderstand that this did concerne the authority of his iustice, without the which the City could not continue happy. They had layd open this boldnesse vnto him by many considerations of his owne private interest. They said that this did but increase the difcontents which many had conceiued against the House of Aldobrandin. The tumult grew so great, as one sword drawne had put all the City in armes. The Ambassador of Spaine came to the Cardinals Palace with all his friends, and there spent the whole night, looking on the Rōmane Gentlemen that played in the Hall, and asking who had wonne or lost, they told him that the Duke Gastan had lost six hundred crownes : Seigneur Duke (sayd he in Spanish) assure your selfe that you lose nothing this night for the notable seruice you doe vnto the King. Hee was often heard to say these words, which were fuller of vanity then of necessity or reason, aquí quiero morir, as if the Pope, who had no forces, would come to besiege him.

The next day the Cardinall Farnese retired himselfe to a house of his called Capratola five and twenty miles from Rome, whither he was accompanied with the principall men in Rome. The Pope sent the Gouverneur vnto him to receiue his gouernment from him, as if he had lost it for that he had entred into his Palace with his Sergeants. He quenched the heat of those fiery spirits with his teares, and complained that they did not loue him as he did loue, and that therein the intention of true friendship was decieued. But he commanded his Nuncio in Spaine to complaine of the King of Spaines Ambassador, who had openly discovered his passion against him. In the end, the Duke of Parma brought backe the Cardinall to Rome, and all was pacified. As hee came from Monte-cauallo where the Pope was, he was well accompanied and followed into the Court of his Palace, with cries of ioy, Viva la Casa Farnese. These were the peoples violent passions, not so much for any loue of him, as in hatred of the Cardinall Aldobrandin. But none of them trusted to this reconciliation. The Cardinall, the Duke Gastan, and many others of the greatest of the City went out of Rome. The Pope caused six hundred Corles to come, and two hundred Harguebuzziers on horsebacke for the guard of S. Peters Bourg, and if he had had the spirit of Sixtus the 5, or of Popes that were Predecessors to Paul the third, this small beginning had been the cause of great accidents.

The Iesuits restored.

The King hauing promised to restore the Iesuits, Father Cotton came to Paris by his Maiesties command, with father Armand the Prouinciall, and father Alexander. They not onely found all things easie, but beyond their conceiued hopes: for the King grew presently into such a liking with Father Cotton, as he did nothing but he was called, and in the end his Maiestie granted their returne vpon certaine conditions, and the Edict made for their establishment, (notwithstanding any opposition made vnto the Court to hinder the confirmation thereof) was confirmed in the beginning of this yeare, and their Colledges restored at Lions, Rouan, Bourges, and Dijon. The Seigneur of Varenne (Controllor general of the Posts, and now Gouvernor of the Towne and Castle of Angers, who loued them of this company) besought the King to build a new Colledge at La Fleche in Aniou, with priuiledges like to the other Vniuersities of this Realme, the which the King made of a Royall foundation, and gaue them his owne house, with penfions, for the instruction of a good number of yong Gentlemen, whom his Maiestie would haue bred vp, and instructed there in all Professions, Tongues, and Exercises.

Iesuits at La Fleche.

The Edict was : That they might lawfully reside in the places where now they are established within the Realme, that is, in the townes of Tholose, Auch, Agen, Rhodes, Bourdeaux, Perigord, Limoge, Tournon, Puy, Aubenas, and Beziers. And moreover, to settle themselves in the Townes of Lyon, Dijon, and especially in his Towne of La Fleche in Aniou, there to keepe their residences vpon the conditions which follow.

That they shall not erect any Colledges nor Residences in any towne or places of this Realme, Countries, Territories, and Seigniories of his Maiesties obedience, without his expresse permission, vpon paine to lose all that is contained in this present grace.

That all they of the said Societie, being in this Realme, together with their Rectors and Prouincials, shall be natural Frenchmen, and that no stranger shall bee admitted into their Colledges and Residences, without his Maiesties permission: and if there be any at this present, they shall bee bound to retire themselves into their countries within three moneth

A moneths after the publication of these presents. The Inhabitants of the towne and countie of Aignon, being not comprehended vnder this word of Strangers.

That they of the said Societie, shall haue neere vnto his Maiesty one of their company, which shall be a Frenchman, with sufficient authoritie to seru him for a Preacher, and to answer for the actions of their companies vpon all necessarie occasions.

That all Iesuites within the Realme and others which shall be received into the said Societie, shall take an oath before the Officers of those places, not to doe nor attempt any thing, against his Maiesties seruice, the publike peace and quiet of the Realme, without any exception or reueration whereof the said Officers should bee bound to fend the said acts vnto the Chancelor. And if any of them present or to come, should refuse to take the said oath, they should be forced to depart the Realme.

That hereafter all they of the said societie as well such as haue made the simple vow, as others, may not get any immouable goods, either by purchase, donation, or otherwise without his Maiesties permission. They may not also receiue any succession, be it direct or Collateral, no more then other Religious men. And in case hereafter any shall be disinited from the said company, they may returne into their rights as before.

They shall not take nor receiue any immouable goods from them which shall enter into their societie, but it shall be reserved for their heires, or for such to whom they haue disposed them before they entred.

They shall also be subiect in all things to the lawes of the Realme, and shall be tried before his Maiesties officers, like vnto other Clergy and Religious men.

The said company shall not attempt nor doe any thing, neither in spirituall, nor in Temporall things, to the preiudice of Bishops, Chapters, Curats, and Vniuersities of the Realme, nor of other Religious men: but shall conforme themselves to the common Lawes.

In like manner they shall not preach, administer the Sacraments, neither confesse any but those of their owne societie, if it bee not by the permission of the Bishops within the iurisdiction of the Parliament where they are established, that is, of Tholose, Bourdeaux and Dijon.

The which permission shall not extend to the Parliament of Paris, except the townes of Lyon, and La Fleche. Where they are suffered to reside, and exercise their ordinary functions as in other places which haue been granted them. And to the end that they of the said societie, which are now restored, may haue meanes to liue in their Colledges and Residences, his Maiestie suffereth them to enioy their rents and foundations present and past, with a full discharge of all seizures which haue been made.

The Iesuits being thus restored, many others demanded leaue of the King to receiue them and to giue them Colledges, as Rouen, Bourges and Amiens. The Vniuersities of Orleance and Poitiers could not like of them, notwithstanding they fought much to bee received there, they returned in the end by the Kings fauour and clemency, into their countie of Saint Leuis, neere vnto Saint Paul at Paris, and had restitution of all their goods and of their Colledge of Clermont in Saint Laques street, to enioy their revenues without intrusion. Then the goodly spirits of their Order begun to step into the Pulpit, and were heard with great applause in diuers Churches.

During these great Royall fauours, Father Cotton tasted of some private disgrace, for returning one night somewhat late (about the end of February) and passing by the street of the new bridge, to goe vnto the Louvre, there were certaine Pages and Laqueys, which calling for him at the doore of the Carosse, wounded him with their Rapiers, hauing one great wound in the shoulder going towards the necke and the throat, whereof notwithstanding hee was soone after cured. There was great search made for this attempt, but the King himselfe discovered presently whence it might proceed. The Pages and Laqueys of Court had beene whipt by commandement for their insolencie, in crying with diuision, old Woll, old Cotton (vpon the complaint of certaine Princes and Noblemen.) Those that say this blow was premeditated by the enemies of the Iesuits, were decieued, and his Maiesties onely opinion (who iudged that it came from the Pages and Laqueys) was true. Some were taken and examined, the King himself heard the examination, first they excused themselves of the fact, then they said that they meant onely to strike the Coach-man, to whom they had cried to goe farther off, and that hee would hurt them, comming so neere the wall, the which hee would not doe, and that A thinking to strike the Coachman, they had hurt Father Cotton. If Father Cotton had not bene an earnest tutor vnto the King to pardon them, it had gone ill with them, but notwithstanding they were banished the Court, and forbidden euer to come there vpon paine of death.

This yeare the King, besides in his goodly buildings, which shall make his memorie commendable to posteritie, would also shew vnto future ages, that hee had a care of the good of his subiects, who for the commodity of their commerce and trafficke, caused a channell to bee made, by the which all Merchandize should bee caried from the Riuer of Loyre into the riuer of Seine. At the same time when as hee began his channell from Seine to Loyre, which will cost a hundred and fourescore thousand crownes in three yeares, they propounded vnto his Maiestie, an enterprize of greater difficultie, to ioyne the two Seas together, and to make the Nauiation from the one to the other through France, and not to passe by the straight of Gibraltar. By the means of a channell more easie to be made betwixt the two riuers, which passe the one from Tolouise into the Ocean, and the other from Narbone into the Mediterranean sea, then that which is made to ioyne the riuers of Seine and Loyre together. The vnderaker offered Caution to ioyne the Nauiation of the said two seas by this channell, within one yeere for 40000 crownes onely, the which should carie a vessell of foure fadome breadth from one sea vnto the other, for a certaine prooffe of his designe. Which was to make ships to passe afterwards, within a small time, C and for little more charge.

There were many new inuentions for workes deuised and brought into France this yeare by strangers, as weaving of gold after the manner of Milan, and the making of cloth and lines of the barke of white Mulberry trees, more easly then of Nettles or any other trees, and more strong and of longer continuance then any other, the which was inuented by Monsieur Serres in Prouence. The making of all sorts of Cipres both curld and smooth, and of all other sorts, which were not made before but in Italy, is now established in the Castle of Mantes. Hangings of guilt leather, of all sorts and colours that may be wished, fairer then Embroidery, better cheape, and of greater continuance, for the easinesse and inuention to make them cleane, and to amend, they are in great shops in Saint Honores, D and Saint James suburbs, to see poore people on worke. There were cutting Mills inuented, and set vpon the riuer of Estampes, where they cut iron into many pieces, and into what forme they will, the which was not done before but by the Smiths. The turning of iron (whereof France abound) into fine steele, the which they were forced to seeke in Piedmont, in Germany, and in other strange Countries, for five or six fould the pound, hauing neuer found any thing in France but iron, the which for the excellency they call course steele of Brie, or of S. Defer, the which is sold for two or three fould the pound, at the most. The fournaises are to be scene in Saint Victors suburbs. Vpon the mouth of the riuer of Bieure, the which deferues to bee admired for the excellency thereof, the making of white Lead, the which is a kinde of drogge or quintessence, drawne out of Lead, very necessarie and common for Painters, Farriers, and many other vses, the which they were forced to seeke and buy dearly out of France, is now made there, better and better cheape.

The like inuention there is of pipes of Lead, as long and as bigge as you will, beaten, and as light as iron for Cuirasses, stronger and more lasting then the ordinary pipes of Lead, and better cheape, and which make the waters that passe through them more hol-some for the body of man, by reason of the ingredients of the folding which corrupts the water that passeth by them. Besides the selder doth still leaue some little tongues or drops pierced, the which stayes the slime of the water, and makes the pipe to bend: with many other secrets and commodities that depead thereon, inuented by Ferner, dwelling F in the suburbs of Saint Germaine.

Some parts of France as well as of Sicilia were this yeere much afflicted for want of corne. The Dukes of Guife and Vantadour befought the King that he would be pleased to suffer Prouence and Languedoc to be supplied by the other Prouinces of his Realme, where there was abundance. The King hauing giuen liberty, there passed great store by the Citie of Lions, who fearing to fall into the like want, befought the King to reuoke his grant of the passage.

The

A The Kings answer seemed to proceed from the heart, not of a Prince onely, but of a father, who desires to prouide equally for all the necessities of his family, and hath a care that nothing be wanting. The principal reasons were, that there is nothing more necessary for the well ordering of an Estate, then to entertaine communication betwixt Prouinces to succour one another, and to haue the trafficke as free and as easie as may bee: Nature hauing so framed them, as they haue need one of another, for if the one restraines on the one side, the other may doe the like on the other side: so as if one Prouince annoyes another, it may also receiue the like annoyance from them: as if they stop the passage of corne at Lions, they of Languedoc and Prouence, may keepe from them, oyles and spice, and many other necessary commodities. That the City of Lions hath no interest in this passage, being lawfull for them, to make what prouisions of corne they please, in Bourgongne, and other places. That he must also haue care of other Prouinces which haue need of reliefe, whom they might easly perswade that this liberty of passage, depended vpon the fauour and good will of them of Lions, and not vpon his commandement.

There wanted nothing in France, but permission to trafficke in the King of Spaine and the Archdukes dominions. The sea townes endured great difcommodities, and in the end, if this prohibition had continued, they would haue said of the greatest, as was said of Megalopolis a great City in circuit of walls, and little in number of Inhabitants. Magna Ciuitas, magna solitudo, A great City, a great wildernesse. The Spaniards found this inhibition much more grieuous and insupportable: there was nothing to bee heard amongst them, but publike complaints, for that all things grew extremely deare, and the Artians desperate. This grievance depending vpon the execution of the treaty of Veruins, the Pope commanded his Nuncio to deale in it. The King would not yeeld to any thing, before that the Spaniards who had troubled the water, did make it cleare againe in reuoking the imposition of thirty on the hundred. There he forced his nature, for being so good, as he desired onely the good of his people, and feels in his soule that content wherewith God himselfe cannot be satisfied, he could not heare speake of this commerce, if the King of Spaine did not discharge that Impos of thirty for the hundred, which made the liberty of trafficke an extreme seruitude, and the profit an assured losse. This was most seuer and rigorous. There is not any but is bitter to the Merchants, couetousnesse hauing changed the first cause as well as the quantity of Impositions and Customes. In former times they were not payed, but for the safety and liberty of the passage from one place to another, and for that Princes haue publike wayes in their protection, which for that reason are called, The Kings high-wayes, they haue acknowledged this right of protection with some consideration.

In like sort when the Nauiation was vnderaken to the Indies, into Arabia and Ethiopia, the Emperour for the purging of the sea Pirats and Routers, imposed the Gabel or Customs of the Red Sea, for the entertaining of ships of warre against the attempts of Pirats, with the money that should be raised thereby. Such Impositions for so necessarie occasions cannot be but iust. Others are not so, and yet they must beare them, being no more lawfull for the subiect to murmur against the Customes, and Imposts, wherewith his Prince doth charge him, then against the hayle, raine, stormes and tempests of Heauen. Ob-edient children kisse the rod wherewith they haue bene whipt. Reuenge is referred vnto God, who forbids the Soueraigne Magistrates to oppress the people with such charges. He let Pharao know so much, when as Moses turned his Rod into a Serpent, to let him vnderstand that his Scepter and his reigne was changed into a tyrannic and extreme cruelty. Some said that Spaine (which deliberates long, and resolves constantly) would neuer reuoke this Imposition, for that they would not lose the reputation of the constancy and firmnesse of their Lawes, and not to be taxed of lightnesse, applying themselves to the time and occasion. But they must endure it, and the Deputies of the two Kings, and of the Archduke, being resolu'd vpon that point, there was no difficulty but that the commerce was restored to the first liberty. The Constable of Castile returning into Spaine, came to the King at Fontainebleau. The King sent to receiue him at the entry of Paris by the Duke of Montbafon, who was well accompanied, and the next day at the entry of the forest of Fontainebleau, he found fiftene Caroffes full of Gentleman of the Court, who left them to offer them to him and to his traine, & so mounted vpon their horses which did attend them. It cannot be spoken how royally the King receiued him.

The King receives him with all honour. He lups with the Constable. The House of Velasques.

The Marquis of Rhosny goes into Poitou.

The Dauphins second voyage to Fontainebleau.

Interview of the Dukes of Sauoy and Mantoua.

Among many testimonies of honour and affection, this was not ordinary. Zamet invited him to supper, being ready to wash, the King accompanied onely with Bellegarde and Roguelare enters, saying that he would lup with them. The Constable offered him his napkin, and would haue kneeled, the which the King would not suffer; saying vnto him, that it was not for him to yeeld honours, but to receiue them, for he was of that Houle, being allied to the House of Velasques, to whom the dignity of the Constable of Castile and Leon is hereditary, and is an honour in a manner equall with a Soueraigne; the Emperour Valentinian finding no other place wherewith to honor and aduance his brother Valence. The commerce which had bene forbidden for some moneths, being restored, there was nothing contained in the Treaty of Veruins but was duly executed, but that which concerned the priuate interest of the Earle of Saint Paul. As for the generall, all went so well, as it might be said the two Kings had neuer had better correspondency, and that their wils (although contrary) had bene like vnto wine and water which cannot be separated. As for the affaires of the Realme, the King found so great respect and obedience in all places, as if there remained any passion in the hearts of his Predecessors, they must be grieved that they were neuer so well obeyed. The Marquis of Rhosny, going to take possession of his Government of Poitou, was at Rochel, where he was receiued with all sorts of honours, causing his Maiesties intentions to be entertained and executed with so great affection, as it did amaze them that knew that since King Francis the first, this towne had not bene so obedient as the rest. There are secret murmurings, discontents and distrusts, but they are clouds without water. These are corrupt vicers which draw vnto them bad humours, but the disposition of the body is no whit altered nor changed: In shew all goes well, and we haue nothing else to care for, for men are commonly satisfied with that which seemes, as well as with that which is. It sufficeth that a Prince be well obeyed, be it either for feare or for loue. France being neuer so miserable as when shee had Kings that cared not to be well obeyed.

And what wants a Prince, that is at peace within his Realme, admired of Strangers and redoubted of his enemies, who hath so great designs in hand, for the increase and beautifying of this Estate, as his Predecessors durst neuer thinke of? One Arceball alone can furnish him a hundred Cannons, with powder and munition for a hundred thousand shot, armes for ten thousand horsemen, and fifty thousand foot and treasure ready to pay a greater number. This Prince who knew what it was to make warre without money, will neuer vndertake it without a iust cause, not being in want. Warre which is attempted without cause is seldome happy and successfull, and although they be iustifiable, yet is there alwayes some scruple. He spent the best part of the yeare at Fontainebleau, and found his aboad there so pleasing, and the season so faire, as he sent for the Dauphin. This was the first voyage to the place of his birth, and the second by Paris. Hee made shew that he did participate of the fathers good disposition, for he neither feared nor felt sunne nor Serein, although it be much felt in that place. Thus the yeare past, when as France could not furnish wherewithall to make a perfect Narration. We may now say as it is heretofore sayd of the Gauls that they were more gluen to tillage and to the Government of their families, then vnto Warre and Armes. The most factious thinke of nothing now but of planting of their Orchards. The Grifons doe still pursue the demolition of the fort. They talke of a truce in Hungary, and of a treaty of peace in the Low-Countries. This will be matter to write on the next yeare following.

But we may not forget the enteruiue of the Duke of Sauoy with the Duke of Mantoua. It ministred matter of discourse, and made the Princes of Italy somewhat ielous: to see two Princes send Ambassadors which had continued so long in bad tearmes, and two Princes that were Neighbours which had this aduantage to haue made warre in person, was not without scruple. And although in shew they talked onely of peace, yet are they not the first that haue had peace in their mouthes, and warre in their hearts. Machiavel saith, that a Prince of his time neuer talked but of peace and faith, and if he had kept either of them, he had lost his Estate and his reputation.

These two Princes haue lands lying on either side of the river of Po. The Duke of Sauoy was discontented that the Duke of Mantouas people had vsurped something vpon his subiects. This was a great dispute of their confines, the which notwithstanding was soone reconciled: the Accord is neuer difficult betwixt persons neere allied. The Duke of Mantoua

A toua came to Montferrat, which gaue the occasion of this enteruiue, whereof the cause is vnkowne, if it be not for the marriage of his sonne to the Dukes second daughter. They met in the open field on Sunday the twelfth of December. The Duke of Sauoy was in carrosse, and the Duke of Mantoua and his sonne on horse-backe. They lighted to entertain and salute one another. The Noblemen & Gentlemen which followed them made a great Ring, in the which these two Princes did walke and talked together 2 or 3 houres. The Duke of Sauoy tasted him at dinner the tuesday following, in a little house vpon the frontier of the Marquise of Salusses. They continued together vntill night, when parting, the duke of Sauoy gaue vnto the Duke of Mantoua foure goodly horses, with very rich furniture. B To conclude this yeares worke, there was new matter presently, but it is alwayes bad when as the Princes clemency is forced to yeeld vnto his iustice, when as France doth bring forth spirits so easie to corrupt, as intelligences with the enemies of this Crown are not held for crimes, and their honor as vaine smoak, the which notwithstanding should be so carefully preserved, that rather then to see it blemished or charged with any reproach they should desire and offer themselves to death. The King, offended with the practices of the Count of Auvergne, commanded him to come vnto him, and to trust vnto his clemency, the which was not vnkowne vnto him, Desfures made some journeyes vnto him, from whom he brought nothing but delays and excuses.

The King sends for the Count of Auvergne.

The Kings iustice was once contented to make him change theayre for a time. It was the best counsell his friends could giue him: it was the surest resolution he could take: for it was better to be absent with the Kings good liking, then to bee retired and in disgrace. The King was wonderfully grieved at this relapse, and did impute it to an error which great courages detest more and pardon lesse then all other faults: for compare vice with vice, euill with euill, ingratitude is the most odious and the worst. This Prince notwithstanding (who cannot leaue pardoning) sent Desfures backe vnto him to cause him to come. He promised to goe, if they would bring him a pardon formally made. The King disliked this kind of capitulation, whereas his owne authority was wronged, and his word held deceitfull. A great King so much feared and obeyed, and of so great authority, should haue his words as much credited as anothers oath. It is not thus. This Prince as with some of his predecessors, who vnder the most smiling and calme countenance smothered most dangerous and troublesome tempests. Hee sent him his abolition in the same forme and manner as he desired, containing all the euill that he had done, and all that he would haue done. It toucheth the honour of a Prince to iustifie himselfe, when as his innocency is any thing mistrusted or suspected of his King. In these incounters hee must leaue the charges which he holds, as Caius Menenius did: he must returne in the middest of his voyage like vnto Marke Anthony, he must quit all Legations to preuent all occasions, and he must oppose his innocency boldly and courageously vnto slander. But he that hath once offended his Prince, he hath no other remedie or refuge, but to his clemency, or to flight.

A pardon granted with a condition.

This pardon had a condition that he should come vnto the King, without the which the effect thereof should be suspended and without assurance. Hee got nothing in growing obdurate not to goe out of Clermont, representing vnto himselfe that hee could find no better counsell then in the remembrance of his last imprisonment, as Crasus did in his miseries. Hee did build much vpon the loue of the inhabitants of Clermont, and of the Countrie. But hee did not consider, that although hee had many hearts at his deuotion, yet would he hardly draw them all together to oppose them against the Kings commandements, when it should please him to seize vpon him in that City, and that it were more safe for him to be free without the Vineyard, then to remaine there, not being absolute master thereof.

Hee refuseth to goe.

Adversity doth instruct.

The King gives order to haue him taken.

The King therefore seeing that he would not come but with conditions that did not agree with a perfect obedience, resolved to haue him by one meanes or other. The first Orderments were made to the two Brothers of Murat, the one Lieutenant General in the Prisdiall Court at Ryon, the other, Treasurer extraordinary of the warres, both vehemently affected to the Kings seruice, and for this reason greatly suspected by the Count of Auvergne, who to let them vnderstand the actions that he would haue knowne, did often conferre with them of his affaires, but in like manner as Princes doe communicate with Ambassadors and Spies, and the more freely for that hee thought they were not men to lead him to Paris. But there were others to execute his commandements, and more then of one condition.

1604

Nothing can be kept secret that many know.

The Kings patience would.

They refused to take him by what means force.

The Duke of Vendosmes company was not in good order at the voyage of Metz.

He is presumed by the diligence of D'Enrre.

condition, all resolute to take him, yea though he were shut vp in a tower of brasse. So A there must be some to take him, and others to conduct him when he was taken. It was necessary that such as had the Kings authority in the Province, and the disposition of his forces and of justice should be in it. The Kings intention was imparted to the Vicont of Pont du Chasteau, to D'Enrre Lieutenant of the Duke of Vendosmes Company, to the Baron of Camille, to la Boulaye Lieutenant of the Company of the Marquis of Verneuil, to Nereffan Colonell of a Regiment of foot, and to so many others, as it is a wonder it was not divulged being in so many heads. In this action all shewed the duties and affections of good men which respected their honours. Many means were attempted, but they were encountered with great difficulties and crosses. True it is, that if Nereffan had not come with reuocation of the Kings first commandments, his taking had beene certaine when as he went a hunting to la Tour of Bruißere, where as a Gentleman should haue hidden him to dinner. The order was changed for that hee had giuen the King to vnderstand that he had meanes to doe him a great peece of seruice in the discovery of great secrets. Some dayes past in the expectation of this miracle, but in the end it proved nothing. The Kings patience being wronged, would beleue no more, but commanded that they should force him to come, and if his bounty had not restrained him, we should haue seene him as extreme in reuenge, as he hath alwayes beene in bounty and clemency. Hee earnestly recommended vnto his subjects the execution of this pise, as a thing of great importance for his seruice, for the preservation of the State, and the assurance of safety of the Lord the Dauphin. The surest meanes (and that wherein there was least trouble and scandal) was the mustering of the Duke of Vendosmes Company, who by the aduice of the Count of Auvergne himselfe, and to please a Lady who desired to be reuenged of some Country-men, dislodged from Saint Porcin to come to Balsac and to Formie, where shee entreated her guests in such sort as they left not provision for three dayes to some one that had beene furnished for three yeares.

D'Enrre who prest Murat (Treasurer extraordinary for the wars) to pay his company a muster, intreated the Count of Auvergne to see it, to the end hee might assure the King that he had gallant men, and good horses, and that all his companions should be wonderfully honoured with the presence of their Coronell. I will part to morrow, said the Count of Auvergne, to hunt at Alezou, and will returne againe on Monday at night, I pray you be here at supper, and lodge your Company at Normaine, to the end that the next day, after wee haue drunke, runne at the ring, and dined, we may see it.

This was done as he had appointed, and it seemes he was an AGor in his owne misfortune, and an instrument of his misery, not being able to discouer the bitterness of those golden pills which they presented vnto him. D'Enrre came to Clermont on Monday at night, and goes vnto him where he supped in one of their houses that managed this business. When as he espied D'Enrre a farre off, he said vnto him, Now sir, am I not a man of my word? D'Enrre thanked him for the paine it had pleased him to take to see his companions, beseeching him to thinke that hee desired it with great affection, to the end the King might know they were not in so bad estate as at the voyage of Metz. The next day the ninth of Nouenber, the morning was spent in running at the ring, of foure courses hee tooke three.

He had intelligence that they meant to take him, and distrusting all, he had refused to come so early to the place of musters, as not finding the company there ready, he should be excused if hee did not attend them, meaning to passe on a league farther, where a Lady that loued him did expect him. D'Enrre hauing foreseene all leauing nothing to hazard that might be gouerned by iudgement, vfed such preuentions, as the subtleties of this spirit preuailed nothing. He commanded la Bady Marshall of the Company, to see his companions in order. He aduertised Nereffan and the Captaines that did assist him, of the place whither they should come, and wrought so, that diligence and courage, which are the wings of great executions, were so supported by the secret of discretion, as none of the troop once dreamed of that was to be done.

They went to dinner, and it was well obserued that the Count of Auvergne had some distrust. He hath since confest, that he was ready to call the two brothers of Murat into his cabinet, and to cause them to be searcht, for that he was well aduertised that they alwayes carried the Kings letters and his commandments. But a great resolution thinking that

He goes to horse with two more with him.

He is not so much afraid.

He is not so much afraid.

They fit him upon the man.

They conduct him to the place.

The extreme griefe of a Lady that loued him.

A that there is more harme in fearing, then in the thing that causeth feare, feares extremely to make shew that he hath any feare. After dinner D'Enrre asked, if it pleased him to goe to horse to see the musters. He answered him: That it should be presently, and that he should use speed. He retired himselfe soone after into his Cabinet, and went downe, being followed by Mussonde onely, and Liuerne mounted vpon a Scottish horse (which Liuerne had giuen him) the which would haue out-runne all the horses of France. Hee would not attend the other Noblemen for that hee distrusted them, having an intent to passe on, if hee found them not ready. But being come to the place, hee found the company in battell. This great diligence made him somewhat ialous, and they might perceiue him, that pulling vp his Cloake, hee drew his Sword foure fingers out, yet without any amazement.

D'Enrre seeing him make even the reines of his horse, came to him trotting, with his hat in his hand, and hearing him sweare with a great oath that he had beene very diligent. You see my Lord (answered he) I haue caused my companions to aduance, for that I would not trouble you with attendance. Monsieur D'Enrre replied the Earle you are one of my friends, I cannot make any long stay here. To whom D'Enrre sayd, All my companions are not yet here, but if it please you, you shall see this troope, and iudge of the whole by a part. Hereupon hee sees some horsemen come, and demands what they were. D'Enrre told him, That it was Nereffan who had beene as Ryon about a sute of his daughters. He beleued it, for hee knew that Nereffan had stayed some dayes at Ryon, and yet his heart beganne to suspect more. But it was too late, hee was enuironed on euery side, and hardly can one resist many. Nereffan lighted to salure him, and hauing entertained him with some discourse vpon the occasion of his stay at Ryon, or of his returne to Court, he went presently to horsebacke, and thrust on one of the Lacqueyes with his foot, for a signe and token of the beginning of the execution.

One of Nereffans three Lacqueyes takes hold of his horse by the bridle. D'Enrre seeing that Nereffan had taken the right side to salure the Count of Auvergne, went vnto the left, and laying hold with his hand vpon the hilt of his sword, hee said vnto him, that hee had commandment from the King to take him; the other two Lacqueyes pulled him to D roughly from his horse, as he had like to haue fallen to the ground, hee was moued to see himselfe so intreated by Lacqueyes, intreating D'Enrre to call two of his companions to light, and that he might not see those ridiculous shewes. Nereffan said vnto him, that they were fouldiers so attired, to serue the King in this action. A peece shot into the ayre by chance, made him to doubt worse measure, so as hee intreated D'Enrre that hee would not vse his pistolet. D'Enrre freed him from these apprehensions, intreating him to resolute vpon the Kings will, and not to force them to entreat him otherwise then they desired. Well, sayd he, I yeeld: what would you haue me to doe? That you mount vpon the Trumpeets horse, said D'Enrre. It was feared that he would not haue suffered himselfe to be taken so easily nor so quietly, as we haue seene many great courages choose rather to bee cut in peeces, then to see themselves referred for some shamefull end, and others that haue willingly died, for that they would not dye by force.

When as hee sees himselfe in the toyle, enuironed on all sides, Liuerne his confident follower in flight, and his friends the ministers of his captiuitie, he said, Ab in the despit of mine, I desired all this. Being mounted vpon the Trumpeets Nag, they conduct him presently to Aigueperse. Before he had gone a hundred paces, hee entreated D'Enrre to lend him one of his troop, to carry some message of his remembrance and of his misery, to a Lady that attended him. De Pleche had the charge. She who had not prepared her heart to witness the assaults of a most extreme and sensible griefe, tooke D'Enrre for the object, against whom shee poured forth the fury of her passions. If I knew (said shee vnto this Gentleman) that I might see him in forcing through your troope, I would willingly doe it, and if I had but tenne Men of my courage and resolution, you should not carry him, where you thinke. But I will neuer die vntill I haue giuen D'Enrre a hundred blowes with a pistoll, and to Murat a hundred blowes with a Sword.

These were the passions of her lone transported with a resolution beyond her power, and which did participate of a man, of a troubled mind, and of ioue. This maketh miracles of maruells, and maruells of miracles, in wits that are equally moued with his inspirations, so it is neuer perfect, if it be not fully and neatly toucht with the accidents of both fortunes, tunes, as the Moore is not pleasing but when it is at the full. Shee loved him well, and was well beloued, for the Count of Auvergne had bene beard say, that the King did see him at liberty, and send him backe to his house, vpon condition that he should not see this Lady, he would rather desire to dye. Shee presently ordered the affaires of her house, the disposition of her furniture, and the retreat of her seruants. This passion going from the memory to the thought, from the thought to the heart, from the heart to the eyes, made her poure forth so many teares, as shee lost the sight of one eye for a time.

The Count of Auvergne writes vnto the King.

Being at Aigueperies he writ vnto the King. At the same place hee told the Baron of Camillac, that he was acquainted with the designe of his taking. It is true, said he, I knew it well, and I belecue you thinke I am a very honest man. He said that he submitted himselfe to all the rigours of the Kings iustice, if he had said, done, thought, or attempted any thing since his abolition.

All the way he seemed no more afflicted, then when he was at liberty. He told youthfull and idle tales of his loue, and the deceiuing of Ladies. Hee shor in a Harguebuzze at birds, wherein he was so perfect, and excellent, as hee did kill Larkes as they were flying. Sometimes he would cast forth words of apprehension to enter into that great heape of stones of the Bastile, where he had already tried his patience for the space of foure or fise moneths.

He desires them of his innocency.

Desires met him at Briarre, and there he entred into a Carosse, and was guarded and led vnto Montargis, and from thence he was imbarcked vpon the riuier, and presently conducted vnto the Bastile, without passing by the Arceual and entring into the Duke of Birons chamber, he knew his bed with some feeling of griete, and taking leave of them that had conducted him, he assured them that he would goe out of that place as he had entred, and if they found him more guilty then he had said, he desired them not to pitty him. Entering in, he said vnto Ruwigy, that he had rather lodge in a Tap-house in Paris, then in the Bastile. Those that beleue that he is not lodged there to get out, so soone as hee did the other time, thinke also it is the worst that can happen vnto him. But it shall be an incomparable misery to be alwayes deprived of the Kings grace and fauour, without the which the best conditions are most lamentable, and a life of this manner, how short so euer, is a tedious and a languishing life, it is no life, it is to languish and to abuse life.

A hope discovery of conspiracies.

The happy discovery and discovery of all that was done, and in a manner thought against the Kings seruice, is no small signe of the prosperitie of his reigne, and of his fortune, and an assurance that those heads which shall strike against this rocke of Diamond, will proue Gliff. The designes of his enemies haue sometimes shewed themselves like vnto fixed Starrs in the Firmament of their ambition, and in the end they haue proued but Comets and Exhalations, which drawne out of the earth, haue bene lost in the ayre of their vanity and imagination.

The conspirators amazed.

All these practices in the end were like vnto those poore wretched Cottages; built vp of dirt, and covered with stubble. And if all the Conspirators be not yet taken, yet they doe nothing, being discovered and knowne to the eyes of the Kings iustice. Conspiracies are like vnto coales, which in the shadow doe flame, but when as the Sunne shines on them they fall into ashes. It is not the severity nor the rigour of his iustice, neither the terror of examples and punishments, that hath discovered these Conspiracies. He hath not caused the Bell of Ramire King of Spaine, to be rung to terrifie all the conspirators with the sound thereof. This King being offended with the conspiracies of his subiects, said, that he would shew them a Bell, the which he had caused to be cast, the sound whereof might be heard throughout all the whole world. Curiosity made them goe, and they found in a great place the heads of the principall men of the Realme, set one vpon another in forme of a Bell. It is the great obedience that is yielded vnto the King, even by them that are least bound to obey, that hath discovered these practices: It is the great wisdom of his carriage, and the order hee hath taken, to bee advertised of all and to know all. It is the authority and respect which neuer was so absolute & perfect in his Predecessors as in him. This apprehension was a famous president. For the time was when he must haue had more men to take the Count of Auvergne and to conduct him to Paris without lett.

Considerations vpon his taking

We may obserue in this apprehension many things that may breed admiration and amazement, and which shew that men doe in vaine furnish themselves with wisdom against heauen, and with intelligences against the King. The Count of Auvergne had aduertisements

1604

A uertisements from all places that they should take him, and that the Kings Pensioners were in the field to that effect. His most inward and nearest friends, and amongst others Flarac knew it, and said nothing vnto him, preferring his duty to his Prince, before all affection.

He must be deceiued, and the King well serued. As Mint-masters say, that it is impossible to refine gold of twenty foure Carats, without a little of some other mettall, so it is impossible to make an execution perfect, if there be not dissembling mixt with friendship, deceit with wisdom, neither must the tongue alwayes speake according to the heart. The Constable was also as well informed thereof as any other, and yet he made no shew thereof. A shew of great wisdom: His duty prescribed him a law to all the bounds of Nature; to shew there is not any one but is more bound to the seruice of the King and his Country, then to his owne health, or to that of his children. A Gentleman being at his Table, speaking of this taking, said, Sir, if the King should command me to take you, I would doe it, although I be your most humble servant; that you march in the first ranks of greatnesse in the Realme, and that all things touching armes, depend vpon your committments. I beleue it (answered the Constable) else you should doe ill, for the King is both your King and mine. I am your friend. There is no loue nor affection to dispent any one from the Kings commandement.

Wisdom of the Constable.

The Count of Auvergne long before and since his taking, hath not said nor done any thing whereof the Kings seruants haue not kept register. He complained of those that were daily about him, that they said nothing vnto him; and they all answered, that they were too honest to tell him any thing. He is a Prince of great vnderstanding, capable of all sorts of designes, of a quicke disposition, warlike, vigilant, and full of inuentions and subtilities. But all this auailed him nothing against the King, of whom we may say, that he hath wicked wretches enough in his kingdom that would deceite him, but they are not cunning enough to doe it.

Soone after that the Count of Auvergne was lodged in the Bastile, D'Entragues Governor of Orleans was committed to the Congerery of the Palace, and the Marquesse of Verneuill his daughter guarded in her house, by the Knight of the watch. Shee tried, that he is capable to loue earnestly, may also hate extremely. Wee can say nothing of the causes of this change, but what may be learned by the issue of the proceffe. They be affaires which concerne the King, his person, and his State, and if it bee tolerable to heare what is sayd, yet is it not lawfull to speake or publish it.

D'Entragues committed to prison, and his daughter, the Marquise of Verneuill retained.

His Maiesty himselfe hath not yet declared the cause of the Count of Auverignes restraint; and in the Letter which hee did write vnto the Gouvernor of Lions vpon that subiect, hee did onely send him these words: You haue vnderstood how that I haue againe caused the Count of Auvergne to be apprehended, being advertised that hee continued still in his bad practices, and that hauing sent often for him, he would not come. At the least I will keepe him from doing ill if I can. They doe basely abandon their honours, which flye to the practice of strangers, who embrace all occasions with vehemency to trouble the tranquility of the Realme. In cases of this quality suspicion makes the crime: yea the children suffer for the iniquity of the fathers, and wiuers of their husbands, as we haue said. Notwithstanding, the King suffers the beames of his naturall bounty and clemency to shine. Hee proceeds not rigorously in a notorious crime. He obserues as he alwayes hath done, the order of his iustice; He giues time and place to the guilty to know themselves, and to flye to his mercy. Hee seekes himselfe all meanes to iustifie them, for knowing that the Earle of Auvergne and Entragues were found guilty of crimes which deserued the separation of their bodies from their soules; and that by a sentence given by the Court of Parliament the first of February, they were condemned to dye, and the Marquesse to be led with a good guard to the Abbey of religious women at Beaumont neare Tours, there to be stridly kept, vntill the Kings Prorog general should enforme more amply against her; his Maiesty addes now to all his victories that of clemency: hee causth the execution of the sentence to stand, and changeth the punishment into perpetual imprisonment for the Earle and Entragues, the which hee did also moderate for the last, suffering him to remaine in his house of Bos-Maurel herbes in Buillfe; hee did also suffer the Marquesse to remaine in her house at Verneuill.

The Kings letter to Guise from Fontainebleau the fifteenth of November 1604.

Decree of the Court of Parliament.

his affaires, but to retire himselfe out of the Realme, he hath vsed the liberty of his retreat wisely, and hath alwayes sought the Kings fauour, for the assurance of his returne. Some foraine Prince of his friends aduised him not to returne to Court, to hold all reconciliation suspect, and to beleuee, that when a Prince is once offended, he is neuer quiet vntill the offence be reuenged. That he must not trust to that which he promisseth, nor to that which he swears, holding both the one and the other lawfull for reuenge. That the word of a Prince that is offended, is like vnto Zeuxis cluster of grapes, which takes birds; but his oth is like vnto Parafus vail, which deceiues men. Those which haue lost the fauour of their master (for that they had intelligence with them whom they could not serue without crime) are alwayes in continuall distrust, the which follows the offence, as the Boat B doth the Ship, vntill they haue quenched and smothered the cause, and made it knowne that they are diuided, and enemies to all their wils, that would distraet them from their duties; for men that are double and dissemblers, are neuer tamed, no more then a Bat, which is halfe a Rat, and halfe a Bird, or the Chastor which is flesh and fish. The Duke of Bouillon patience hauing giuen the King time enough to consider of his intentions, is ready through the Kings clemency, to obtaine all that he could desire to returne to a greater fortune, in the which lesse is allowed then to a meaner estate.

He had bene taxed with many capital crimes, whereof the chiefe accusations were to haue bene a partaker of the Marhall of Birons conspiracie: And although they had seuerall designs, and were of very different humours, yet they were both of one mind to ruine the King, and haue their shares in his spoile, by the meanes of the King of Spaine. It is true, there were no Letters found written from him to the King of Spaine nor his Ministers, nor from them to him, but those that were mediators for the other, dealt also for him; and he was more cunning they sayd, to couer his intent. It is no sufficient iustification to say that he did neither write nor receiue any Letters, the Treaty was made without writing: whereunto he made his answer.

After that diuers crimes had bene dispersd and publicly spoken of to his dishonour, being also priuately aduertised thereof, he wrote a Letter of protestation to the King, to iustifie his innocency in these termes.

" Sir, hauing more carefully examined the consequence of these horrible conspiracies, D
" whereof false imputation doth cause me so many true miseries, among the which I may
" iustly hold for the greatest and most insupportable, my debarring from your presence, and
" the interruption of the faithfull seruice which I owe vnto your Maiesty: God in the end
" hath sent me this consolation by Monsieur de Montluet who hath informed me particularly
" of that which the common brute of the world could not reach me but in generall termes
" and confusely. I giue God thanks who hath by this speciall knowledge made me an easie
" way to satisfie your Maiesty more particularly, hoping that he will dispose the cares and " heart of my King and Master to giue a fauourable beleefe vnto the true iustification of his " most humble seruant.

" I vnderstand then from him, that I am accused to haue had intelligence with the Mar" shall of Biron. That I haue treated with him, or others, to receiue money from the King " of Spaine. That I was resolu'd to quit my Religion. That I had attempted to treat a peace
" betwixt the King of Spaine and the Estates. That I was acquainted with a conspiracy " against your Maiesty, the Queene, and my Lord the Daulphin, and that I made secret lea-
" uies of men without authority. To all these crimes and others which approach neere
" them: I say and protest, that if euer my thought, tongue, or hand, my heart, or the least part " of my body or affection haue bin infected or once touched therewith, I will be held for the " most disloyal man liuing, not only vnworthy to taste of your Maiesties clemency, but also
" to see your face, yea to tread on the ground which owes you obedience, as polluted by me
" in so many sorts, as all the blood in my body could not wash away nor cleanse the spots of " so foule an ingratitude vnto my King, my Master, and sole benefactor next vnder God. All " the fauours which your Maiesty might impart vnto me, would not serue me but as a free" ing from punishment, which the most cauterized conscience in the world would continu" ally giue vnto such a monster of men.

" Again, I swear and take the Searcher of all hearts to witness that I am wholly inno" cent of the aboue mentioned crimes how small soeuer; beseeching your Maiesty, in the " name of God, the protector of the innocent, & the Father of truth, rather to giue credit to
" this

A this iust and true oath made by your most faithfull subiect and seruant, then to the slanders
" of those whose actions shew that they haue neither God to feare, King to serue, nor lawes
" to keepe.

In the meane time Sir, as I am as free from all these crimes as any one within your
" Realme, and haue no more need of the vse of your clemency, then I do feare your iustice:
" yet I am neither so presumptuous, nor so ignorant of the infirmity of man in generall, or Subiect and Seruant, Henry de la Tour.*

The Duke of Tremouille ended his fortune by death. He might haue died when as the " King would haue lamented the losse of him more, for he was not now well pleased with " certain words which had bene reported vnto him; and if he had liued, he would haue
" E bene in paine to excuse himselfe of the commandement hee had made him to come
" vnto him to answer it: From hence springs two fruitfull considerations; the one, that " there is nothing so fearefull and terrible as the threats and disgrace of the King; the " other, that it is alwayes dangerous to speake ill of his Prince. For the first, Cassander
" greatly feared Alexander, euen when hee was dead, for that hee had sene him once " transported with choller against him. And although that after the death of Alexander hee
" was aduanced to the throne of Macedon, yet walking in the city of Delphos, and hauing
" sene an Image of Alexanders, who was now rotten in his graue, hee did so tremble as his
" haire stood right vp, his knees failed him, and the palenesse of his countenance shewed his " amazement, by the terrible assault which his memory gaue him: for the second, when a
" F free speech hath once escaped against the respect of the Prince, hee haue a great and " a strong citie as Lisander said to defend his liberty of speech. They haue neither friends
" nor counsell against the King, and if their misery finds any shadow or protection, it is " but like vnto Ionas gourd of one night. Let them not flatter themselves in the great-" nesse of their houses nor their alliances, this quality doth but increase their offence. Prin" ces are not so much moued with that which the common people do, as with the licentious
" words of great men. Caius disguised himselfe into as many fashions as he imagined there a thunder-bolt in the other, and an Eagle by his side, burst out in a great laughter. Caius A causing him to come neere, asked him why he laughed. I laugh at this foolery, answered the Coblent. The Emperour laught also, suffering it to passe freely without choller, yet punishing other speeches feverely which came from persons better qualified.

Ten deniers
make a penny.

To end this year, the King made a Declaration, containing a dispensation of the for- tie dayes, granted by his Maiestie in fauour of all the officers of this Realme, that desire to enioy the benefite thereof, paying euery year four deniers vpon the liuer or two shil- lings, vpon the value of their offices, as shall be set downe by his Maiesties Councell.

Edict for paying of the Paulet.

Vpon the demonstrations made vnto the King in his Councell, by some of the chiefe and most ancient officers of his seuerall Courts of Parliament, and other companies of this Realme, that it would please him to set downe some order for the demissions and resigna- tions of their offices: and also auoyding the losse of so notable a summe, as the value of their said offices, they may be no more constrained when they grow old, and by conse- quence are more capable to execute them worthily, to put them into the hands of youn- ger men, and of lesse experience. His Maiesty hauing caused this to be propounded in his Councell, and desiring to testifie his loue and fatherly affection to all his subiects and seruants, hath ordained in his said Councell, that hereafter all the offices of this Realme, as well of iustice, finances, as others of what quality soeuer, falling voyd to his benefite, and being subiect to the rule of forty dayes, except those which shall be found compre- hended in the contracts of engagement, and concessions made in consequence of those lands which haue beene heretofore alienated, as well by his said Maiesty, as by the Kings his Predecessors, shall hereafter be dispensed with from the rigour of the said forty daies, which euery of the said officers should suruiue after the resignation made of his said office, accompting from the day and date of the quittance, for the money paid into his casual parties, euery one paying yearly (that desire to enioy the said grace and dispensation) four deniers vpon the liuer, of the value and estimation made of their said offices, according to the order which shall be set down by his Maiesties Councell: That is for the next year, within the monthes of Ianuary & February, and for the following yeares in Ianu: & vntill the 15 of Febr: comprehending the said day, which being past they shall not be receiued: vpon payment of which money if they shall chance to die during the said year, their offices shall not be declared voyd to his Maiesties profit, but shall be kept for their behoofe to whom they haue resigned them, in regard of the offices subiect to suppression: and for those which are not subiect, to their widowes and heyres, who may make their best profit thereof as they shall thinke good, as a thing belonging vnto them, paying onely into his Maiesties casual parties the eight denier by the said officers or their widowes and heyres, for the resignation thereof, to be taken of the valuation which shall be made. All which officers which haue thus purchased the said right, shall enioy the dispensation of the said forty dayes, during that year, shewing onely an acquittance for the payment made by them for the said right of dispensation, duly signed by Master Charles Paulet, Secretary of the Kings Chamber, and Farmer vnto his Maiesty, as well of the reuenues E of the said right, as of his casual parties, together with an acquittance of the eight denier payd by them. Vpon which acquittances, his Maiesties pleasure is, that all necessary letters of prouision shall be granted, vnto the said officers, their widowes and heyres, or others to whom they haue resigned, to enioy the said offices fully and peaceably, with the same honours, authorities, prerogatives, preeminences, freedoms, liberties, fees, rights, taxa- tions, profits, and emoluments, which those officers which were last in possession did enioy, so as they be found sufficient, capable, and pleasing to his Maiesty. And if any of the said officers shall neglect in any one year to pay the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, they shall be deprived for that year of the said grace and dispensation of forty daies, to the which notwithstanding they may be restored the following yeares, paying the said rights yearly by the 15 day of Febr. And the more to gratifie & fauor the officers, which shall pay the said rights, his pleasure is, that when as they shall come to resigne their offices, they shall not be bound to pay about the eight denier of the last value, in stead of the fourth denier, whereunto resignations were accustomed to be taxed. And as for those which haue not paid the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, they shall be bound at their resignations, to pay the fourth denier of the last value of their said offices, as hath bin alwaies obserued.

But

A But for that there may be many frauds committed by some, who abusing his Maiesties bounty and fauour, will not resolute to pay the said right of four deniers, but when as they haue an intent to resigne their offices, that by this meanes they might bee discharged in paying the eight denier in stead of a fourth: his Maiesty desiring to set some order therein, intends that this next year, all they that shall pay the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, shall enioy, if they resigne within that year, the grace of the eight denier, but if in the following yeares they shall discontinue the payment of the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, they shall be deprived of the said grace of the eight denier, vntill they haue paid the right two yeares together after the payment whereof, although they B haue discontinued some yeares, yet may they enioy the said grace of the eight denier, that year wherein they haue begunne to pay the right of four deniers vpon the liuer, within the time prefixed.

And as for those that without paying the said right shall chance to dye, before the ac- complishment of the forty dayes, the said offices shall remaine voyd to his Maiesties be- hooof and profit, as it is now obserued: but to the end the said officers may be eased of their paine and charges, being forced to take the said right of dispensation from the said Paulet, his Maiesty doth allow him to establish one or more deputies, in euery generality of this Realme, who by vertue of their quittances, may within the said time, receive the money due for the right of dispensation, from such officers as desire to haue the benefite C thereof.

And to preuent the abuses which are committed by concealments in many of the Prouinces of this Realme, many offices which fall voyd by death to his Maiesties profit, whereof notwithstanding he is frustrate. His said Maiesty doth command all his Bay- liffes, Scheneffals, Lieutenants General, and all his other royall and ordinary Iudges, as also his Proctors, and their Substitutes, to transport themselves, with the Deputies of the said Paulet, at the first instance they shall make, into the houses of the said officers, thus dead and concealed, whereof they shall be bound to make a certificate, the which they shall deliuer vnto the said deputies, who shall send them vnto the said Paulet, to haue them put to the taxe: and for an exemplary punishment of the said concealment, his Maiesties D pleasure is, that the rigour of the ordinances shall bee exactly obserued, against the widowes and heyres which haue committed such faults, by all due courses, as for his owne proper money and affaires, notwithstanding all oppositions or appellations what- soeuer.

And to the end that all officers may be enformed of the grace and fauour granted them by this present Decree, his Maiesty doth expressly enioyne all the said Bayliffes, Scheneffals, and their Lieutenants general, Prouosts and other his Royall and ordinary Iudges, euery one in his iurisdiction, to cause it to be read and published in open Court, whereof they shall be bound to deliuer certificates vnto the bearer hereof, enioining them expressly to haue a care to the entertainment of the said Decree, the which his Maiesty will haue E inuioably obserued in euery point, according to the forme and tenure thereof, notwith- standing all oppositions or appellations whatsoever, whereof if any shall happen, his Ma- iestie hath reserued the knowledge vnto himselfe: forbidding all his Courts of Parliament, and other his Iudges whatsoever. Made in the Kings Councell of State held for the Fi- nances. At Paris the 7 of December 1604.

The King hauing receiued sundry complaints from his officers and household seruants, of the breach of their liberties and priuiledges granted vnto them as well by himselfe, as by his Predecessors, he thereupon made a declaration of his intent and pleasure, after this manner:

Notwithstanding any letters Patents heretofore granted by vs, as well in forme of an F Edict as otherwise, for confirmation of the ancient priuiledges granted by Kings our pre- decessors of happy memory, to our household officers and seruants; yet we receiue daily complaints, of the infinite troubles and vexations which they suffer in the enioying there- of, by the officers of Iustice, Maiors, and Magistrates of our townes, where our said offi- cers are abiding, who haue instantly required vs to provide some conuenient and neces- sary remedy.

Wherefore desiring rather to augment then to diminish the fauors and priuiledges granted in former times to those which haue had the honor to approach neere to the persons of our said predeceffors, and to take away all difficulties which doe arise to the execution of our will, to the end they may not be of worse condition then those which have gone before them; who were no more careful of their charges then they are. For these causes and other good considerations vs moving, of our special grace, full of power and royall authority, and with the aduice of our Councell, we haue by our said household seruants, to them of the Queene our most deare Spouse, our deare and well-beloued sonne the Dauphin, of our most deare and well-beloued daughter, and those which haue heretofore serued the Kings our predeceffors, the Queenes our most honored Ladies mother-in-law, and sisters-in-law, our most deare brother-in-law the deceased Duke of Anjou, & our most deare and only sister the deceased Duchesse of Barr, which haue bin or shall be hereafter enuoyed in our Court of Aydes, and to their widowes during their widowhood, continued, confirmed, and approued, and by these presents (signed with our hand) continue, confirme, and approue the said priuiledges, freedoms, liberties, immunities and exemptions, granted vnto them by our said predeceffors.

To WE will and our pleasure is, that hereafter, without any other recourse then these presents, that all the said officers and others aboue named, with their widowes during their widowhood, shall fully and peaceably enjoy these said priuiledges, and shall be free and exempt from all manner of contributions, both in generall and particular, borrowings to be made as well for vs as the said townes, and in like manner for the prouision for victuals, and munition for warre, conduct money, and from all taxes, aydes, and impositions, Catches and wards of Townes, Ports, Bidges, Passages and Straits, furnishing and contribution for Staples, and for lodging of Souldiers both of horse and foot: and generally from all other subsidies, contributions and subventions, made or to be made, for what cause soeuer, although they be not here particularly exprest, whereof we doe free, acquit, and exempt them, notwithstanding there be mention made in the commissions sent and to be sent, of exempt and not exempt, priuiledged and not priuiledged, and that they haue omitted to make expresse mention of the exemption, exceptions, and reueration of our said officers and household seruants, with their widowes during their widowhood, meaning not that they should be comprehended, but that they should peaceably and quietly enjoy the said freedoms and liberties. Enjoying our faithfull Councillors, the Treasurers of France, Generals of our Finances and our well-beloued Prouosts of Merchants, Sheriffes and Capitaines of our City of Paris, and all Bayliffes, Scheneshals, Prouosts, Echeuz and Controulers for matters of Subsidies, Mayors, Iurats, Capitous, Consuls, Sheriffes and Capitaines of other Townes of our Realme, Farmers of our Aydes, and other Subsidies whatsoever: that in the enjoying hereof they shall not trouble nor molest them, vpon paine of confiscation, with the charges, damage, and interest.

We doe also expresse forbid all Mayors, Sheriffes, Consuls, and Commonalties of Townes, Churchwardens and Collectors of Parish, not to take any of the said officers, hauing a good and sufficient certificate, which if they doe, they themselves shall pay the said taxes.

We also command our faithfull Councillors, holding our Courts of Aydes, Bayliffes, Scheneshals, Capitaines, Echeuz and Controulers, of our Aydes and Taxes, and others to whom it shall belong, to keepe and observe our graces, gratifications, continuations, confirmations, approbations, freedoms, and exemptions, and to publish and enroule it where soeuer it shall be needfull, causing the said officers, and their widowes during their widowhood, to enjoy them fully, peaceably, and perpetually, and to discharge them of the said impositions, Aydes, and Subsidies, causing all lets and troubles to the contrary to cease, for such is our pleasure. Notwithstanding all Edicts, Ordinances, Decrees, Orders, Commandments, Defences, and Lets to the contrary, to the which for this regard onely, and without prejudice to other things, we derogate by these presents, and to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, wee haue caused our Seale to be set vnto it.

Given at Fontenay-le-Comte in May 1605. The like exemptions and freedoms, were granted vnto the officers and household seruants of the Prince of Conde, and of the Duchesse of Angoulême, which did serue them actually and had their names enrolled.

A Speech made by the Ambassadors of Germany to the King in the chancel of the Duke of Bouillon.

SIR, the Electors, Princes, Common-weales, and Earles most desirous of your prosperity, and of my Lord the Dauphins, whereon they thinke the whole state of your Realme depends, haue deputed vs vnto you to renewe the vowes of this sincere & hereditary affection, which they protest alwayes to maintaine most carefully. The reason which now moves them to make this protestation, is, that some finding themselves bound by alliance, and others tied by the bond of cordiall friendship, to participate in the long and painfull suffering of the Duke of Bouillon, Marshall of France, who they know is much grieved, to see himselfe deprived of the fauour and honour, which your Maiestie hath heretofore so bountifully bestowed on him; and breathing no other thing in his languishing, then the recoverie of this felicity by your fauour. To obtaine the which he doth continually call vpon God, and humble himselfe vnto your greatnesse. Our Masters ioyn their prayers with his, to the one and the other, that it will please him who holds the hearts of Kings in his hand, to mollific vs, towards one of your most faithfull Subjects and seruants, and to restore him to that which his misfortune and no crime committed hath made him lose. Wee beseech your Maiestie to beleue, that they which haue sent vs cannot receive a more worthy Testimonie of the esteeme you make of their loue and affections, then by the favourable reception of their request in this behalfe; and moreover, it will bee an assured prooffe vnto them that the enemies of Religion haue laboured in vaine to bandy your desires and designs against them that make profession thereof.

Behold the third year which good men see him banished from your presence, fauour and Realme! This exile is not felt by him alone, wee know that the griefe extends to your most faithfull Subjects of either Religion, who participate of his affliction: His house makes him allied to the greatest of your Realme, who will take the like part in the happinesse of his reconciliation as they doe now in his disgrace, and we doubt not, but they would haue beene ready to second our Petition if they thought it would haue beene pleasing to your Maiestie, the which hath made our Masters the more bold to undertake it. It is an exact search which they haue made of the behaviour of the said Duke since hee left your Realme, the which hath giuen them such knowledge of his integritye as they assure themselves that there will neuer be sufficient prooffe to touch him in any sort.

We also assure our selues that the Testimonies of so many great Princes and common-weales, whose faithfull affection vnto your person and Crowne hath bin so well knowne, being put in ballance against the doubts and ialousies of those who louing neither the person nor Religion of the said Duke, seeke to incense you, will easily ouerway them and preuaile, considering that any man of wisdom and discretion which shall take the paines to examine the crimes imposed vpon the said Duke, will finde them incredible; as well for their enormities, as for the contradictions: And it is no matter of light consideration in the minds of our Masters the oath made vnto your Maiestie by the said Dukes Letters, deliuered into the hands of the Lord of Sillery by the Seigneur of Montier whereof they haue a Copy, and which they thinke should be of greater weight then all the suggestions made to the contrary, if they be not verified by proofes as cleare as the day. These reasons with the precedent Declarations made by your Maiestie that you would pacifie your displeasure if some formalities were observed by the said Duke: makes vs hope that you will yeld to the intercession of our said Masters, ordaining what shall be necessary for the said Duke to doe, to attaine to his former dignitie, whereby they shall receive so great a contentment by the fruit of this Legation; as they would make no difficulty to interpose their Cautions betwixt your Maiestie and the said Duke if need were, to give you full assurance of the fidelitie which may proceed from the hand, tongue and heart of him whom God hath made your Subject, and is an officer of your Crowne by your fauour; to imploy himselfe wholly to your Maiesties service; for your Royall prosperitie and for the whole Realme; for which bounty and fauour our Masters will hold themselves for euer bound to ioyn their vowes and hands to yours.

their deuotion as truly by effects, as they haue now begunne to represent it by mouth A vnto your Maiestie. To whose speech the King being somewhat discontented, made answer.

That it was the third time the Elector had prest him vpon this subiect; but hee could giue him no other answer then the former: That it rested in the Duke of Bouillon to come and confesse his faults and to demand pardon: the which if he had done, he would willingly haue receiued him with open armes as a father doth his children. That Bouillon had done him bad seruices, and did continue them still. That he was accused, but hee desired that the accusations might not be verified as they are. That their informations were not good, as Monsieur the Elector knew well, neither was it needfull to tell it vnto them. That he was not bound to giue any account to them, their Masters, or to any others. That they should remember where they were, and in what estate he was.

That he had meanes to doe good to his friends, and not to feare his enemies. That Monsieur de Bouillon was subiect, and that hee desired not that they should offer their Cautions for him, or that they should deale with his affaires, no more then he would with any others.

To conclude, if Monsieur de Bouillon desired restitution, he should come and submit himselfe ly craue pardon. That he had giuen his promise by word vnto the Elector Palatine. That he made no doubt of the continuance of their masters affection towards him, who he confessed had assisted him at his need, and that they should not repent them to haue done it, C that he for his part would alwayes remaine their friend.

Pyramide of the Iesuits ruined.

The Iesuits doe cunningly make their profit of this goodly humour wherein they now saw the King vpon the termes of clemency. They had obtained their repale as wee haue said at the voyage of Metz: but the Pyramide set vp for an eternall mark, of a most detestable Parricide, and a perpetuall memory of a iust publike reuenge, was a very troublesome moate in their eyes, wherefore they would not returne into Paris vntil they had obtained a demolition. In the end it was granted them in the moneth of May at the instant pursuit of Father Cotton: Iustice had caused to be built, and Mercy to be ruined: a blow with a knife giuen vpon the face of our great King, had caused it to bee set in the most eminent place of the world. All men thought it should haue stood after a thousand Ages, but it scarce continued one age. Such is the certainty of humane things: Thus the strongest resolutions are subiect to change: Thus counsels alter according to occurrences.

But we must subiect our selues to the pleasure of the Prince, to whom his estate is generally bound, to will what hee wills, and not to accuse any one for this demolition, lest wee should accuse his commandement, who hath onely right to say amongst his subiects, Such is our pleasure. But from second causes let vs ascend to the first and Soueraigne, who governes the hearts of Kings by himselfe, and disposeth them to receiue such counsels as hee thinke good. The eternall providence prouides for accidents according to the necessitie of the State, and the continuall vigilancy of our Henry knowes the motives which presse him to the resolutions which he takes. It is not therefore lawfull for any to iudge of that with impatiencie which they vnderstand nor. The King perswades himselfe that if the Iesuits haue heretofore been blemished in their honours, the remembrance of his bounty and fauour will binde them the more hereafter.

Marquesse of
slew.

The like fauour he also shewed vnto the Marquesse of Vernueil: for she hauing the space of seuen whole moneths effected the intention of the Decree giuen against her, his Maiefty thought that his Proctor generally, had not onely had time enough to bring new informations against her if there were any; but also that her actions and carlage had giuen an ample testimony of her innocency. Shee therefore besought the King to giue her leaue to take her course in his Court of Parliament, and required that a briefe delay might be giuen to the Proctor generally to furnish her accusation, and to make his proofes: And that for want thereof he should be no more receiued, and she declared innocent of the crimes wherewith she had been charged.

Thus his Maiefty holding it not reasonable that his clemencie & accustomed bounty, should suffer the Marquesse to passe the remainder of her dayes in the doubtfullnesse of such an accusation, and that she should bee exposed to the perill of the hatred and slander of any one that should haue will to annoy her: he declared by his Letters, giuen in September at Fountainbleau; that as she had not forgotten her selfe in the particular affection where-

A wherewith he had honoured her: So had she made proofe of the obedience and fidelity which she did owe him, desiring nothing more then to bee iustified of the fact for the which shee had bene called in question: In like manner hee would not forget the affection hee had borne her, and the naturall children hee had by her. Wherefore he ordained that all pursuits and searches against her should wholly cease, and that from that time shee should bee restored and liue in full libertie of her person, and goods, in the same manner as shee had bene before the beginning of the Proceffe. Hee did abolish and suppress for euer the memory of the crimes wherewith shee had bene charged, so as she hath no feare hereafter to be called in question by the Iustice: And hee dispensed B with her for not presenting her selfe in person to cause these Letters of Abolition to be registred in the Court of Parliament, the which were verified there the sixth day of September.

The taking of the Count of Auvergne had ouerthrowne one of the strongest pillars of this tower of confusion, which threatened to aduance it selfe against France: but the whole building was not like to fall at this blow. For many wrought silently vpon the foundations which the Marshall of Biron had laid in diuers Prouinces of Guienne, namely, in Perigord, Quercy and Limosin, and they sprung vp also in Auvergne, whereas the coales did yet smooke which the chiefe fire-brand of this combustion had lately kindled. Languedoc was not free. The Luquisses and others their Adherents had diuers enterprises vpon the C townes of Narbone, Agde, and Beziers; the which were discovered by a singular fauour wherewith the Soueraigne Protector of this Monarchy hath alwaies blest it, and the confederats rewarded according to their merits.

There were already a thousand or twelue hundred Gentlemen which had giuen their faith to declare themselves vpon the first occasion. The faction fortified dayly: This Ganguene did hourly seize vpon some new member, and might in the end corrupt the whole body. The Seigneurs of La Force, Themines, and others who commanded in those quarters vnder the Kings Authority, had charge to crosse the attempts of these murines. La Force hauing intelligence of an assembly which was made in Gascony, whereas some of his owne allies did assist, preferring the publike interest and his Maiesties commandement D before all other respects, he came suddenly vpon them, tooke foure or fise, & dispersed the rest, some here, some there. Themines was as troublefome vnto them in other places. Belina Captaine of Gascony, of the faction of Guienne, a bold and resolute man, promisseth to kill him. But God would make him an instrument to discouer some part of this Cabal, which was not yet well knowne. His courage failed him, being ready to doe the execution: And finding his designe diuerted by some heavenly motion, hee came secretly to the Court, where casting himselfe at his Maiesties feet, hee demanded pardon, the which he obtained, and declared that the practice was great and common to many Prouinces, but as yet they had no other designe, but to send some of their company vnto his Maiefty to make complaint of the peoples charge, and of the bad Iustice which was administered by E his Officers, and other things whereof they would demand reformation. These were ordinary and goodly pretexes for such as sought to fish in a troubled water, and vnder the shew of publike good make themselves fat with the wretched pouertie of the people, alwayes more susceptible of bad then of good impressions.

The Discouery
of practices
within the Realm.

The King caused one thousand and two hundred Franks to bee giuen to Belin, hee commanded him to returne amongst them, and to discouer particularly the Authors and their motives. Hee returns soone after, being gratified with a second liberalitie for the second voyage: He reported, amongst other particularities, that about twenty of the conspirators were at Chapelle Biron with the Lord of the place: That sending them a Pardon they will giue ouer the enterprize, who might informe his Maiefty of more then he, who could not pierce into the depth of it. Themines carries it them in forme, and doth summon them to returne to their obedience, from the which they had salne to their own ruines. They answer, that the pardon must be general for them of Auvergne, and for the rest of Guienne: that moreover, hauing not attempted anything against the Kings seruice, they did not thinke they had need of any pardon.

Notwithstanding some companies of horse and foot, sent by his Maiefty to quench these first flames of rebellion, and to assist a Chamber of enquire appointed by the King at Limoges, consisting of the Parliaments of Paris and Bourdeaux, caused most of this F troop troope that was ready to reuolt, to come before the punishment; and not to grow obstinate against force and duty. Some offered to come and demand their Pardons in person. And his Maiestie knowing that great offences haue not alwayes great punishments, but in the most culpable; he was contented that few should suffer the punishments due to the rashness of many.

The Baron of Caluerac of Quercy: the Seigneurs of Gaispel, Lymosins; Perigoudon and Chassain, Perigourdins and Capitaine Mathelin base brother to Caluerac lost their heads. Chapelle, Biron, Tayac, Guerjac, Basignac, Lugagnac, and Reynac, were executed in Picture, and some others imprisoned, did coole the courage of many hot braines that were ready to reuolt, and restrained such as finding no worse houses then their owne, sought and tooke an occasion for a cause to better their priuate affairs by a publicke reuolt.

The Churches which carie the title of Reformed in France, were for their affaires assembled at Chastelelraud. Maurice Earle of Nassau, takes occasion to write vnto them in fauour of Philip Prince of Oranges his brother, and to complaine that many as well of the Nobility of the country, as of the Inhabitants of Oranges, did seek to hinder the restoring of his authority, which the liberty of the last troubles had expelled; although that he had often promised, and did now passe his word, neuer to alter any thing touching their safety, but to suffer them to enioy the like liberty that the other Churches of France did, and to deliuer the government of the castle into the hands of a Gentleman, whose piety, zeale, valor, and integritie might not be called in question. Blacon a Gentleman of Daulphine, held it by succession since the death of his father: Neither Philip nor Maurice had any occasion to loue him: for he had alwayes neglected their requests and reiected their commandements. The Prince had often complained that he couered his policy with the cloake of Religion, to vsurpe his goods and authoritie, and that hee had lately thought to pre-occupate the Deputies of the said assembly, to giue them an impression of a sinister intent of their lawfull and naturall Lord against the Church of Oranges, contrary to the declarations and promises which he hath often giuen them.

Count Maurice doth now make himselfe caution for the assurance therof: and intreats the Synode to assist his brother with all fauour for his restitution to the Inheritance of his Grandfathers, and to take for assurance the faith which he gaue them by his Letters; and which he promised to giue more expressly (if need were) to any one amongst them that they should choofe to receiue it from his mouth. That by the dismission of Blacons, and the change of the Government which he called tyrannous, into one that should bee lawfull and well ordered, there should be nothing altered nor diminished concerning the safety of the Church of Oranges, nor any preiudice done to the Kings seruice, who had long desired that the Prince of Orange should be put in full possession of his principality. Thus the Prince countenanced by his Maiesties expresse commandement, together with the testimonie which the Earle gaue them, touching the intention of his elder brother, recovered that which he had long sued for, and afterwards he married Eleanor of Bourbon, sister to Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and first Peter of France, a faire and vertuous Lady.

They of Geneva doe now weepe for the death of the first and most ancient Pastor of their Church. They loued Theodore Beza liuing, and they lament him dead: for God had adorned him with graces which may make a man amiable, profitable and recommendable amongst men. He was borne the 24. day of Iune in the yeere of our Lord 1519 at Vazelay in Bourgundy, his father and mother being Noble, hee was bred vp by Nicholas de Beza his Vncle, a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris vnder the discipline of Melchior Volmar a Germane, professor of the Greeke tongue in the Vniuersitie of Orleans, and afterwards at Bourges. Vnder whom he profited so well in feuen yeares, as at fiftene he not onely gaue a good and sufficient reason of the Doctrine contained in the most famous authors of Greeke and Latine, but also did answer pertinently in all humane and liberall Sciences. He had a naturall inclination to Poetry, and being very young, did publish some licentious Epigrams, whereof he sought to deface the memory, as of the first flowers of his Spring.

At the age of twenty yeares, he was made Licentiate of the ciuill Law, and was furnished with good reuenuues in benefices, but he left all, to retire himselfe where that he might

A might liue according to the Religion, which did then multiply in Christendom vnder the name of the Reformed. He serued the Seignoury of Bearne for the space of ten yeares, as professor of the Greeke tongue in their Vniuersitie of Lauzanne; and that of Geneva, as professor of Minister and Professor in Diuinity, from the yeare 1560, vnto the 13 of Ianuary 1600. On which day he expounded for his last Sermon, the third Petition of the Lords Prayer, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heauen, in the eightieth yeare of his age. For hee would not suffer his decrepit age to liue in idleness, as long as he should haue any strength to labour in his vocation. Hee concluded the rest of his course with a firme iudgement, a sound vnderstanding, and a memory not altogether decayed, in prayers, meditations, and serious discourses: giuing alwayes graue and solid reasons of that which was propounded vnto him, either in matters of Diuinitie, or in Politicke affaires: saying hourly with S. Augustine, I haue liued long, and sinned long: Blessed be the name of the Lord. And, Lord finish that which thou hast begunne, that I suffer not shipwracke in the Port. And thus repeating many other Oracles, drawne out of the Authority of the holy Scripture, vntill that the Eclipse of the Sun, which was in October, had somewhat increased his infirmities, yet without paine. His Colleagues thought it fit, that at least two of their company should alwaies beabout him to assist him with their faithfull exhortations, and recommend him to the grace of God. Thus attending the last will and pleasure of God, the 23 of October, hauing caused himselfe to be taken vp about seuen of the clocke in the morning, hee made his accustomed prayers in his family, and walked a little vp and downe his chamber, then as it were feeling the time come wherein he must end the trauels of this life, he demanded if all were well in the town: being answered, yea, hee caused himselfe to be laid in his bed, whereas his senses did suddenly faile him in the midst of a prayer made by Perros a Parisien, one of his Colleagues and neighbours, hee yielded his soule happily vnto God, without pangs, without convulsion, and without sighs, hauing liued fourescore and six yeares, three moneths, and nineteene dayes. A man of a reuerent aspect, of a sound iudgement, and happy memory, learned amongst the most learned, alwayes ready to resolue suddenly vpon all questions propounded, practised in any thing that did concerne the Church and government; capable of all abstruse matters, wonderfull eloquent, high in conceptions, quick in his deliuey, and graue in his carriage and discourse, but of an affable, sweet, and most pleasing conuersation.

Comets for the most part are prodigious, said an ancient Poet. Their Decrees are martiall and Mercuriall, that is to say, violent, cruell, fatal, mortal, vncertaine, diuers, mutable and warlike. All that followes, threatens nothing but stormes and tempests. The beginning of this yeare hath giuen vs one, the which shewed it selfe, the third of October the yeare before, in the seuenteenth degree of Sagittarius, Iupiter holding the nineteenth, Saturnus the eleuenth, and Mars the two and twentieth degree of the same Signe. At which time there was seene in Hungary, a Rain-bow as red as blood, which staid at diuers times vpon Cocker, vpon Strigonia, and vpon Mount Saint Thomas, and then vanished away. This bearded Starre was neere in greatnesse and likeness to that which was obserued in the yeare 1572, whereof France, England, the Netherlands, Spaine, Portugal, Hungary, and in a manner all Europe in generall, haue felt but two mournfull effects. Many unfortunate concellations which meet together, make the Astrologians foresee that it shall produce in that yeare and the following, great and diuers euents, which are so many Trumpets to summon vs to reforme the peruerse actions of our liues, so many warnings of the wrath of God, vpon those Nations which cannot vlt those graces well which he giues them in his peace: yet his diuine Providence hath alwayes a watchfull eye, to guard those Princes whose raignes he blesteth.

That seditious mutiny in Guienne, that fearfull and prodigious powder-Treason in England, the violence whereof he hath so miraculously diuerred, are sufficient Lessons for them whom hee lately threatened. Behold now another, which teacheth vs, as at many other times, that the blowes of a secret enemy are hard to auoid, and that they must equally esteem the conscience and friendship of those that shall breake it, at the first advantage which treason or insideliue shall open vnto them, without consulting with their consciences, whether it be lawfull to put the sickle into another mans corne, to reape the fruits which they haue not sowne; and whether with their honours they might treat with the subiects of another Prince to the preiudice of the publicke peace, and the faith sworn in the

the name of God, Doubleless such practices are more dangerous then the force of an open enemy.

Ambassadors are sacred persons, and must be so held and intreated: but it followes not that their priuiledges are not restrained within certain bounds and limits, the which they may not infringe without forcing of the law of Nations: they are not to be blamed if they be carefull to aduertise their Masters of all occurrents; The very duty of their charge, the loue and seruice of their Master, and charity to their country doth excuse them, when they bind those vnto them which may fit them with intelligences. But cursed be those subiects whom couetousnesse and ambition transport to practices of Rebellion and Treachery.

Don Balhazar of Suniga, Ambassador of Spain, will not haue the King his master thinke him lesse industrious then his Predecessor, to win those vnto him that would open their eares and hearts to the inticement of Strangers. John Taxu hath conferrd all he could with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuencres, in corrupting many of the best qualified within the Realme, and others of meaner sort, as the course of the History hath obserued. Suniga hath imitated them but too much since his coming into the Realme: as the Treaty of Enragues, and the list of the Earle of Auvergne doe witnesse. They haue reaped nothing but shame and confusion, as bad counsell is alwayes worst to him that giues it. He is now suspected to haue raised a Leuaine of the same Dough, whereof he shall eate the Cake with bitterneffe.

Conspiracie of Mairargues.

Mairargues a Gentleman of Prouence, was deputed vnto the King by the States of the country. But he was not long at Court before he made it appeare that they had giuen the purse of the veriest thiefe. Some yeares before, hee had propounded vnto his Maiestie to haue two galleies armed, for the defence of the port of Marseilles, and the coasts thereabouts: one of the slaues in these galleies, a man of spirit and cunning, giues him inuentions to play the Pyrat, with great profit and small shew, and he puts them in practice with happy successe. Thus Mairargues finds him to be an active vnderfaker, and thinks him fit for some greater enterprise. He therefore vnfolde vnto him the web which he was weaving with the ministers of Spaine: to deliuer the towne of Marseilles to King Philip: a matter (said he) which would not be hard to effect, seeing that by means of his galleies, he was master of the Port: besides, to make his designe the more easie, he had by his practices gotten a promise to be chosen Viguier of the town for the next yeare, by which office haue all power at Marseilles; with the keyes of the ports and forts in his hand, hee shall hold the towne at his deuotion. The Galerien makes himselfe capable to vnderstand all the Quintessence of this Caballe, and of the meanes which the Author pretended to follow for the execution. Being well instructed in every point, hee lets the Duke of Guise vnderstand, that if it please him to mediate his pardon and liberty, hee will discouer a matter vnto the King which imports his Estate, and adds withall, that he will desire no liberty if it be not found true. The Duke giueth aduice vnto the King, and the King commands him not to neglect any thing, that he should learne all that might be knowne: for in matters of that consequence, he must seeke all meanes, and set all stones to worke. So the King is aduertised that Mairargues draws from the King of Spaine the pay for the whole entertainment of his Maiesties galleies, and that every yeare hee puts the Kings pay into his coffers, besides the pension which he hath from the Spaniard, of whom he is (as it were) Admirall in the King his masters vessels. That he hath so advanced his trafficke, as hee was within a short time to make the King of Spaine master of Marseilles. At the same time Mairargues came to Court: the King causeth him to bee secretly knowne to La Farenne Gouverneur of Angers, who vnder colour of this familiarity, obserues him, and sets such watches ouer him, as the ordinary going and coming of a Flemming named Brunneau, Secretary to the Ambassador of Spaine into Mairargues lodgings, made them iudge that they hatched an egge which would bring forth a bad Raven. In surprising them they might by the same meanes surpris the papers and instructions of their negotiations. La Farenne and de Fontis Lieutenant to the great Prouost, had the charge from the King. They do it so discretely, as the 5 of December, being aduertised that the Secretary was entered into Mairargues lodging, at the Signe of the Pantofle in the Cloister of S. Germaine of Auxerrois, they goe and enquire to speake with him about nine of the clocke at night: but vpon his seruants answer, that they could not speake with him, being busie with one in his cabinet touching some affaires, they caused one of the Archers to entertaine his man

A with a tale, and in the meane time goe vp to his chamber, whereas they heare at his Study doore a part of their discourse. Coming out of the Study, de Fontis laid hold vpon Mairargues, who euen then pronounced his owne condemnation. I am a dead man (said he), but if the King wil giue me my life, I wil discouer great matters vnto him. The Secretary would haue drawne his sword, but they put him presently into safe keeping. The President Iamie being appointed, with Silley Keeper of the great Seale, to examine them in the presence of Lomenie Secretary of State, they discouered that they should soon put in execution, that which they had long before proiected. The Secretary was caried prisoner to the Chasteler, and Mairargues to the Bastile. The Papers which were found as well in Mairargues chamber and study, as about the Secretarie being hidden vnder his garters betwix two stockings, did sufficiently proue the fact.

Notwithstanding his Maiesty according to his custome tempering the seueritie of his iustice, with the mildnesse of his clemency, knowing, that Mairargues was allied to the Duke of Montpensier, and to the Cardinall of Joyeuse, by reason of his wife, he sent them word, that in respect of them, and for their sakes, he gaue Mairargues his life, but he should remaine in perpetuall prison. Their answer merits to be registred in our History, being generous and like true French-men: to serue for a lesson to posterity, that the Princes seruice, and the loue of our country, is to be preferred before all respect of friendship, alliance, or kindred. They most humbly thanke the King, and beseech his Maiestie not to breake the course of Iustice in fauour of them; That they should bee alwayes glad, that France should be freed from such foules: That treachery is so hateful vnto them, as they themselves would be the executioners, if there were not any other to be found. So the Proccesse being already instructed in the Councell, and by the great Prouost, it was sent to the Court of Parliament to be finished according to the accustomed forme. The Ambassador hearing of the detention of his Secretary, and of the cause thereof, he demands audience: where hee complains, that by his Maiesties commandement, his Secretarie was committed to prison: he cries out with great vehemency, that it was to violate the priuiledges of Ambassadors, and to doe him great wrong by imprisoning him, a greater in detaining him, but most of all in examining him. That hee had not practised Mairargues; but contrariwise Mairargues had very importunately sought him. That neither the Ambassador, nor the Secretary of a foraine Prince, are bound to refuse the Kings subiects to haue access vnto their house, nor to forbear to heare such as would make propositions and offers vnto them, for their Masters seruice. That they are bound to aduertise him of such offers, and are not tyed to reueale to the King of France the bad seruices of his subiects. That there is not any good seruant nor minister of the King of Spaines, which doth not wish and procure by all his endeauours, the increase of his greatnesse, yea, of the absolute Monarchy of the whole world if it might be. That the King of Spaine their Master, hath not made so great brute of an enterprise made by the French in Granado, vpon some places of importance. He doth not forme at their ordinary practices in Nauarre, Biscay, E in Flanders, and other places of the Archdukes country, nor the succours of men, money, artillerie and munition, which the King doth visibly giue, vnto his masters rebellious subiects. That the King of Spaine was a little moued, to heare that the King reioyced too openly, at the good successe of Cont Maurice and the Estates, & was grieved at their losses. That the world will witnesse with the Catholike King, that hee doth patiently beare the bad offices which are done him dayly by the Kings subiects, to the preiudice of the peace sworn betwixt France and Spaine. That La Bodrie being with the Archdukes for the Kings seruice, had fought to practise the Earles of Vanden-bergh, and a Secretary of the Archdukes, yea, by the inductions of his Maiesties chiefe Councillors and Secretaries. And yet neither the King of Spaine, nor the Archdukes, did euer make any complaint, or demand Iustice. To conclude, that hee neuer made any motion to Mairargues, but to haue him to goe into Flanders. That his Maiestie should be better pleased to haue them fauour that party, rather then that of the Enemies of the Catholike Religion. And that if his Secretarie were not deliuered, he protested of violence done to the liberty and safety of his charge, which is the greatest offence that may be done to the King his Master in his person.

But he that will haue credit giuen to his words, must beware that his writings doe not contradict them. The instructions lately surprized sing another note of a contrary temper:

The complaint of the Ambassador.

And who knowes not that the King of Spaine, since the peace of Veruins hath openly supported the Duke of Sauoy his brother-in-law, against the King, to maintaine him in the possession of those places which he had vsurped of this Crowne? how much doth the Fort built by the Earle of Fuentes import his Maiestie, not only for that it doth annoy his Allies, but also for that it doth hinder the passage and intercourse of the French into Italy? What be the ordinary practises both open and secret of the Ministers of Spaine, to distrust the Suisses and Grisons from the Kings friendship? The onely treachery of Lesfe, who discovered all the secrets of the Councell, hath he not done more wrong to his Maiesties seruice, then all that which the Spaniard can pretend against vs? The defection of the Marshall of Biron corrupted by the presents and hopes of strangers, is it not a sufficient proofe of the small esteeme, which King Philip makes of an oath, which he had sworne to obserue the peace? A stranger to be found treating at an vndue houre, with a treacherous subiect, against the publike faith, against the duty of an Ambassadour and Minister to a King, who makes profession of friendship with ours, to cause him to lose one of the most important Townes of his Realme: and shall there bee no law to assure himselfe of his person, nor to cause him to be examined, to discover the truth, and vncloud the face of Dissimulation in a matter of such consequence? The priuiledges of an Ambassadour are not so general, but they are restrained, not to seeke by sinister meanes to suborne the subiects of a Prince, neare vnto whom he doth reside: and vnder colour of Peace and friendship, to practise against his Estate. Notwithstanding, the King assures him by the vertue of his royall word and promise, there shall be no wrong done vnto his Secretarie: hee is too great a friend, and a fauourite to Iustice and Equitie, to violate the Rights of an Ambassadours charge.

Finally, as the Ministers of Spaine haue giuen the King great occasion, to hope for little friendship from them, since the peace of Veruins, hauing either begonne or nourished to many fatall Designes to the preiudice of this Estate, and the publike tranquility, as the truth of the History doth teach vs: so future ages will not finde it strange, if hee hath desired that they should not subdue them whom they rearme their Rebels. In this consideration, his Maiesty hath bene more ready and willing to restore them the money, wherewith they had supplied his wants during the warres. Hee hath not in truth made shew to desire their ruine and destruction: yet hath hee not assisted them with Artillery nor Munition, as the Ambassadour pretends. Many of his subiects bred vp in martiall discipline, goe to seeke their fortunes in Hungary, with the Archdukes, and with the Estates, neither is it in his Maiesties power to make them change their inclinations, to serue the one rather then the other. The warre of the Low-countries hath not Religion for the object. It is a meere warre of State, covered with a goodly and plausible pretext to giue the greater lustre to the cause of the assailant. This maske cannot serue him any longer, to disguise the truth of his conceptions. And if there were any question made to fight for the Catholike Religion, France would neuer attend to haue a summons from Spaine: shee would alwayes display her Ensignes first in field, as shee hath euer done in former ages. As for the Conspiracies pretended by Sumiga, against the Estates of King Philip and the Archdukes: it is well knowne, that some broken by the Racke, and exccesse of torments, others terrified with the horrour of threats, and some wonne by the promises of recompence, hath babbled something. But what likelihood is there, that a people which knowes not how to pardon, would haue sent backe so many prisoners, if they could haue conuicted them of any crime? The King denies not but hee hath sometimes suffered his seruants to make such propositions of themselves, to haue wherewithall at need to crosse the ambushes and bad offices of the King of Spaines ministers. Yet it can neuer be verified, that his Maiesty hath commanded them to proceed, nor that he hath caused his Ambassadours to make Treaties to the preiudice of the Princes, where his Maiesty doth entertaine them, as the Ambassadours of Spaine haue often done, and now lately with Mairargues the prisoner. The question is not now of going to serue in Flanders; and if there were no other crime, is it not capital in a subiect which goes to serue a foraine Prince without the liberty of his Soueraigne? The Archdukes Agent had likewise engaged Terrail and many others, without any respect that he was a household seruant to the King, & particularly bound to the company of my Lord the Dauphin. The Gouernor of Perpignan hath done the like with the Luquiffes and

A and their companions, to deliuer many places in Languedoc, to the Spaniard. As for Bodiere treating with the Earles of Vandenberg, his Maiestie is ignorant thereof: vnlesse he did happily let them vnderstand how much he did esteeme their valour and generosity: neither are they held to be borne subiects to the Archdukes, but Germanes. La Bodiere did feeble the Secretaries pulse, that it was with his priuity; but with no other designe, but to learne newes by his meanes, the which is not reproachfull in Ambassadors, who seeke to serue their Masters wel in like cases. His Maiesty doth excuse the Castilians for the corruption of Lesfe, to whom he knowes they addrest themselves to the like end. But when these Treaties passe vnto practices, such as they haue pursued with Mairargues, the Luquiffes, and others named in the History, at diuers times, who had no other end, but to ouerthrow the Realme vpon his Maiesties head, and to ruine it quite. An open warre would be more honorable for Princes, and more profitable for their Estates, then to nourish vnder the ashes of a fained friendship, fuming firebrands to kindle a horrible combustion vpon the first occasion in their Estates, who thinke themselves assured vnder the shadow of publike tranquillitie.

The Ambassadours words had moued the King beyond his owne nature. But behold he is now stung to the quicke by the Castilians reply. The King of England (said he) in that which concerns the estate of the Netherlands, doth better obserue the Peace and friendship which he hath promised vs, although he be of a contrary Religion. Some man thinks to reuenge a shame, which doth increase it. All comparisons are odious: and this doth not serue his time that did alledge it. His Maiesty did ruer this nayle with such quicknesse and viuacitie, as he would gladly haue recalled his words: For (said the King) the King of England hath begun betimes to know what trust may be expected from the Ministers of Spaine. I thinke also that hereafter I shall haue the like occasion to commend them. Notwithstanding, as I am content to entertaine peace & good correspondency with your Master if he giue me occasion: So I shall alwayes bee ready to encounter him that shall inuite me. I will cause my selfe to bee informed of the grounds and truth of those things wherewith your Secretary is charged, and will afterwards cause you to be aduertised thereof, to know if you will aduow them or not, and according to your answer, aduise what I haue to doe. Thus the Ambassadour retired, discontent on the one side, that hee could not returne home with his Secretarie; but on the other, being forced to admire his Maiesties courage and wisdom, who doth not any thing in matters of consequence, but with wise counsell, and mature deliberation. Great men doe easily preferre the advantage of an apparant profit before the breach of Faith.

Our Henry doth gouerne himselfe after another manner. Hee knowes that Faith must be inuiolably kept euen with enemies, seeing it is the ground and foundation of humane society. This Bruneau conuicted of crime, hee could not be honestly aduowed by his Master, and to disauow him were to deliuer him into the hands of the Kings Iustice. But he is so moderate and temperate a Prince, as hee can quire part of his Right to them, that hee could bring into a tragicke Theater, to play a part there fit for so audacious an enterprife. Mairargues alone suffered the punishment of his offence, being condemned the nineteenth of December. The same day hee lost his head at the Greue, and his body was quartered, the which were hung vp at the entry of the chiefe Ports of the City. His head was caried to Marcilles, and set vpon a Lance ouer the chiefe Port of the Towne. His goods were confiscate to the King, reseruing 12000 Livres to the poore, 12000 to the reparation of the Palace, and 12000 for the Ports and Hauens of Marcilles. Yet his Maiesty disposed a great part of this confiscation in fauour of the widow. Great summes, which shew that the treachery of this Gentleman, is so much the more detestable, for that hee had good reuennues, and was well allied: and that the holy Scripture doth name covetousnesse the root of all euill, ioyned with Ambition and Treachery, pernicious Councillors of State, verifying the Oracle: That man hath no miseries but what hee procureth by his owne vice.

Hee might haue ended his dayes as gloriously vpon the Theater of Vertue, as hee did shamefully vpon an ignominious scaffold. Active spirits which cannot containe themselves in the calme of Peace, finde wherewith to make their courage famous, if any generositie animates them to actions which the spurre of Honour exsites in the noblest resolutions. The example of Guy Earle of Lauall inuited him to this tryall. Age and Force had scarce brought this Nobleman to this commendable ambition, to learne the Art of A those whom Nature had bred of that quality to runne this Fortune. But behold, hee goes to seeke some schoole of Mars, to be as well instructed in the schoole of Honour, as he had beene in the differences of Religion, against the precepts of his birth and first institution. He obtained leave of the King, and parted from Paris the 29 of August, being followed by fifteene or sixteene Gentlemen, with a traine fit for his quality, vnder the conduct of Marquilles, a Gentleman of Sologne, being famous for that he had slaine in single combat with a Lance Lisle Marivault, despairing to follow the deceased King his good Master: the King had lately made choise of him, to temper the violent heat of this young apprentice, and to keepe him from running into danger vnadvisedly. He was honoured by the Duke B of Lorraine at Nancy: from thence hee tooke his way to Strausbourg, Struckart, Vlme, Newbrough, Ingolstadt, Ratisbone, and Vienne. He saluted the Arch-duke Matthias in a country-house, (whither, as the brute was, the Plague had drawne him) who seemed to adde something extraordinarily in the honours he did him, it may bee by reason of the House of Arragon, whereunto that of Laul is allied. The 13 of October he came vnto the Imperiall Armie, which camped about Comorth, too weake to raise the siege of Strigonia, which the Turke did presse: all the Noblemen of the armie, and especially George Baff Lieutenant general of the Emperor, receiued him with all the honour and demonstrations of loue they could.

Strigonia being yielded by the treachery of the Germanes; the Turkes disbanding C troops, gaue him occasion, to make proofe of the affection which hee bare vnto this holy warre, in many encounters, skirmishes, alarms, taking of places, and other stratagems, whereas men of honour shew their resolutions. The 25 of Nouember gaue him a fauourable opportunity, wherein hee did shew himselfe the true sonne of his father, who with the greatnesse of his courage surmounted the smallnesse of his body; and Grand-child to a Grand-father, who in the flower of his age, had purchased the title of Knight without feare. Fourteene or fifteene thousand horse charged a Regiment of Reistres, which made the retreat; when as the French and Wallons with the whole army following staid their fury, and made them to recover the top of a mountaine: yet often turning head, and witnessing that Feare had not put wings to their feet. In this retreat the Earle of Laul D was noted to haue done as much as any noble spirit encouraged by the sight of an enemy might do, alwayes the last with his followers in the reere-ward, and the first to make head, if the enemy did offer to charge.

But he had scarce made the first flames of his heart to shine, when as behold the 3 of December quencht him in an instant, when as they began to promise more glistering beames. The Turke came to charge the fore-ward in the morning: at this alarm hee armes, but so hastily as he gaue his people no leisure to make fast the Garter which should tye his tassets at the knee. He leapes into the saddle, and runnes with his traine into the hottest of the fight. The joy he had to be in so good an encounter, making him to lose all apprehension of danger. His Armes being gullt, made the enemy to note him for a man of quality. E They discharge a shewer of Arrows, and shot vpon him: one pierceeth the neather plate of his tassets hanging loose, and so passeth through his thigh into his body. Le Frasnay Lieutenant Colonel to Cont Rbinsgraff, who led the French and Wallons, and Captain Bourle-Roye, who commanded a company in this Regiment, are commended for that they desired to succour him being thus charged, if the Marshall of the campe had not forbidden them to breake their ranks, vpon paine of death.

The enemy sometime chafing, sometime chased, desired nothing more then to retire, seeing all the Christian armie to aduance: when as the Earle of Laul breathing more courage then life, returned to the charge, and pursued them a good League, vnto a riuers side, whereas there were one thousand and five hundred slaine and drowned, and nine Corners, with many good horses taken. The riuier, and the greatnesse of his wound stayed him suddenly: hee beganne to stagger. They laid him vpon the ground, and finding himselfe to grow faint, hee called for a little Wine, the which hee had no sooner taken, but lifting his eyes, and hands to heauen, hee ended the trauels of this miserable life, to exchange it with the rest of the most blessed. Happy to haue dyed in the bed of honour, in a iust and holy quarrell, which many of his ancestors haue sealed with the same seale; and most happy to haue left that commendable memory to possesse.

Earle of Laul.

1605

A poster ike, neuer to haue giuen any man subiect to complaine of him. His body was honorably conducted to Vienne: his followers did not forget any thing, to let those Nations know, in what ranke they held their Master. His bowels were solemnly interred in the most honourable place of the Quire in the Franciscans Church, iust by the Queene of Frances tombe. The body was conuayed with honour and respect into France, and doth now rest at Laul attending the coming of the Soueraigne Iudge.

If there bee an arme to root out the wicked, there is another to maintain the good. Three yeares of imprisonment in the Bastille (as we haue shewed) haue giuen his Maiesty leisure to know, that there was nothing in the actions of Mombarsot, contrary to the fidelity which he hath heretofore sealed by many worthy acts, in occasions which had bin offered for the establishment of his royall authoritie. His only sonne had many times cast himselfe at the Kings feet, beseeching him, that seeing his fathers enemies could not conuict him of any crime, it will please his Maiesty to giue him that liberty, which slander, the cruellst torment which a generous minde could feare, had taken from him: Or to suffer him that by his company he might comfort him in his misery, by the seruice which nature binds the sonne to doe vnto the father.

The King moued with the pitie of the soane, and the innocency of the father, verified by so long a tryall: He presently discharged Mombarsot in the month of December, from all subiect of his detention, disannulling all pursuits, all Decrees and Iudgements giuen vpon this subiect, so as he might neuer bee molested, nor it prejudice his reputation; no more then that which had beene done by him heretofore within his gouernment, during the troubles past, for his Maiesties affaires, the which are heretofore allowed by other Letters Patents. And moreover, he did restore him to his full liberty; & to the possession of all his goods without further trouble. But not to his gouernment, whereunto (to auoid ieaalousie, and to entertaine concord among his Officers) he had aduanced the Seigneur of Bethunes lately his Ambassador at Rome.

Thus the King hauing dispersed the clouds which threatened France with a Chaos of diuers confusions in general, and taken away the subiect of great partialities for the gouernment of the town of Rennes, there is nothing now that doth afflict his spirit but the affairs D of Sedan; being resolute to bring him to that estate as his Maiesty should not need to haue any feare hereafter on that side, no more then on the other, whereas he hath lately quenched the first flames which haue caused a dangerous fire within the Realme.

The King prepares with all the speed he may, for the siege of Sedan; whilst the people of Paris view the rich beautifyings and new decorations of their capitall City. It hath the last obligation to Master Francis Miron Councillor of State to the King, Lieutenant ciuill in the Prouoisty of Paris, and heretofore Prouost of Merchants. Dignities where-with the noblest Families of the City thinke themselves honoured, as with the first publicke Magistracie of the first citie of the world: Paris doth now glory to see her towne-house beautified with a pleasing fore-front, and other goodly buildings. To see her publicke commodities increased, with a stately Port at the Tournelle, & that of the temple repaired, which the miseries of former ages had kept shut about forty yeares. To see before the gate of the sacred temple of Royall Iustice, a goodly Fountaine to spring vp, which doth wash that foule and detestable fury lately marked by a Pyramide, for a Monument which they presumed should haue beene eternall. To see the corners of the streets watered with many other Fountaines, which will for euer refresh the memory of their restorer. Many streets opened, and paved to void the filth and the corrupt waters. Many bridges of Stone made. Many Ports built anew, and paved for the common ease: and many waterings restored. Finally, Paris commends him to haue done more for her ornament in two yeares, then his Predecessors had scarce done in two ages: and doth honour so many acts F done by Miron, of piety towards the poore, and strangers, to the sicke and diseased, and to the Church; of wisdome and fidelitie to the common good, to the administration of the publicke Treasure, in his good husbandry, and employing it for the beautifying of the City, in discharge of her debts, in the charges and rents of her demeaunes, for his loue to his country, and his care and diligence to produce so many goodly effects, which recommended his Magistracie, for his painfull indeauours, for the which hee hath made this abridgement of the world to flourish. For his great affection, by the which knowing that his owne health was ioyned with that of the common-weale, hee hath not respected etny, nor hatred, which doth commonly follow vertue (as the shadow doth the body) A in regard of that pleasing contentment which a good conscience brings to man, whose actions feare neither censure, nor Ostracisme, to that sweet consolation to leaue his charge with lesse gaine, but more honour; and to haue by his commendable actions, given the King himselfe subiect to propound vnto the successor, the example of his predecessor when as he went to deliuer into his Maiesties hands the keyes and seales of the towne. A graue and sufficient testimony of honour, whereon slander can take no hold.

Suppliations of the Clergy
to the King.

answer.

His Maiesty at the same time gaue audience to the Petitions and Declarations of the Clergy being assembled at the Augustines in Paris. They insisted vpon the afflictions of the Church which was troubled. They required with great vehemency to haue the council of Trent receiued. They shew the abules of symonies, and confidencies: And doe commend the choise of capable men in elections. The King acknowledged that all which they had said was true. The Church is afflicted: so he desires to do any thing that depends of him for the restoring thereof. If the publication of the Council be sufficient to restore it, he hath desired it, and doth desire to see the effect: but humane considerations doe many times crosse them of heaven, notwithstanding he will alwayes employ both blood and life, for that which shall be to the good of the Church and seruice of God. As for Symonies, & confidencies, his Maiesty did exhort them to begin the cure by themselves, and to prouoke others by their examples to doe well. They are witnesse how he proceeds in elections. Those which he hath established differ much in sufficiency and merits, from others of former times; and the report which the Clergy it selfe hath made vnto his Maiesty, will double his courage to doe better hereafter.

To conclude, the King assured them as a good Prince, of his affection and sinceritie to any thing that did concerne the peace of the Church, and the protection of them which serue at the Altar. But withall he spake some words vnto them like a good father: that he was offended at the length of their assembly, at the great number of deputies and the factions that were among them. Remember (said his Maiesty) that you are now ready to enter into Lent, what your charges bee; and that your presences are necessary in your Churches. By your tediousnesse you driue the poore Curats to hunger and despair. I will ioyne with them, and with the honestest of your company, to take order for the long time which you haue spent in your assembly, finally make account of my time affection, to the seruice of God and to your protection. The Marshall of Bouillon had in the meane time by his submissions disposed the King to impart vnto him an equal or greater fauour, then before his disgrace: but his Maiesty did not yet finde them so free, as he might conceiue a full assurance, for the intercessions of the Queene of England, in the beginning of his retreat, of the Count Palatine, of the Marquis of Brandenburg, of Anspach, of Bade, and of many cantons of the leagues, by expresse Ambassadors, together with the Marshalls long stay without the Realme, as wee haue seene, made them presume that hee had fortified himselfe with diuers forain friendships, so as the King would haue him come in person to iustifie himselfe, and to free him of this imagination. His Maiesty doth summon him like a good Master, and his best friend, and being alwayes more inclined to clemencie then seueritie, he desired rather to induce him by amiable callings, then by Soueraigne Authoritie, or lawfull commandements.

Duke of Bouillon cannot be used to come up Court.

Heretofore hee had sent Monsieur vnto him; and of late dayes La Noue to that end, yet their perswasions were not of sufficient force to disperse all the subiects of distrust which he had conceiued: neither could hee resolve to come but with speciall warrant; his friends doe what they can to entertaine this good will which the King doth now witnesse vnto him: but withall they know what his Maiesties resolution is if hee obeyes not, and exhorting him speedily to content his bounty, by a full and not limited satisfaction, they incite him to follow his duty, and to fly his danger.

The King
grants him
all with an extra demand.

He demands a pawne: he sai Lay.

The King was well pleased with the mediation of the Princess Dowager of Orange, by whom his Maiesty grants him freely all that he demands, so as (saith he) he doth witnesse by his actions that he desires my fauour. But it is reason (addes the King) that granting vnto the Duke of Bouillon all the assurance he requires, he should giue mee such a pawne of his fidelity, as I may not hereafter doubt of his duty. This pawne which the King demands, is the guard of the Castle of Sedan, giuing his word not to place any gouernour, nor garison, but of the religion receiued in the estate of Sedan: and not to praiudice the 1606

A quiet of that Church, nor the rights and reuenues of the Lord, but only to be assured that this place hereafter shall not be in case to hurt him.

The Duke of Bouillon is amazed at this newes; he thinks that to deprive him of this possession, is to exclude him from all tolerable conditions. He makes many offers. He beseecheth his Maiesty to take both his person and the Soueraignty of Sedan into his protection. He offers to receiue his Maiesty with all the honour that is due vnto him, with what company he pleased, without limitation, without restriction, and to beat downe the Castle gates for his enry, the conditions of the protection being by the Kings good pleasure concluded, signed, and verified as they ought. He consents that the Gouernour of the Castle should take an oath of fidelity to the King conformable to the Articles of protection. And in case the Duke should infringe it, the Gouernour should be freed of the oath which he owes him, to keepe the faith which he hath sworne to the King. That the like oath should be taken by the garison and inhabitants of Sedan. That hee will absent himselfe: if it did not please the King he should remaine there, and would lodge his wife and children, in some one of his houses within the Realme, to serue for an assurance to his Maiesty, with all his goods, and remaine so much the more bound to the full obseruation of faith which he owes vnto his said Maiesty.

But for all this, the King will not receiue him into grace, nor trust him vnlesse hee may haue this caution in his hands. The Duke on the other side will by no meanes dispossesse himselfe of the guard of his Castle, and will rather endure all fortunes, all extremities, for it is no lesse troublesome vnto him to be spoiled of this place, then to be separated from his owne moiety, from his flesh and bones: his Maiesty then resolves to constraine him to quit that by force which he will not doe by free will. The inhabitants of Sedan are much troubled, now they hold the Wolfe by the eare, they know not how to keepe him, nor how to let him goe. The Duke of Bouillon is their Lord: his affliction is theirs. Can they or may they abandon him whom God hath giuen them for their Lord? But on the other side, shall they grow obstinate against a mighty King, who is alwayes victorious, a King, against whose force they confesse themselves to be but dust? they therefore humbly beseech his Maiesty to spare a people, which heares nothing in their Assemblies but vows for his prosperitie, who see nothing but the Flower Dewe vpon the Castle gates, who breathe nothing but seruice, and desire nothing more then to spend their bloods for the encrease of his Estate, and who abhorre to be reduced to that extremity, as to defend themselves for their owne preservation. His Maiesty giues them his word, yea with an oath, that if he should take the place by assault, he would leaue the inhabitants of Sedan in the same estate they were, and would maintaine them in the same priuiledges, wherewith he did gratifie them of his Realme. That he had iust occasion to be incensed against a subiect who runnes voluntarily to his owne ruine, for a thing without the which he might well subsist. That he will take this place from him, to take from him the meanes to doe ill, and will not touch the priuiledges of the towne, not meaning to appropriate another mans inheritance vnto himselfe, for he knoweth that the Lord giueth portions to Nations, and separates the children of men one from another; he will not that any man shall remove his neighbours bounds.

The King resolves to besiege him.

The place imports his Maiesty as well for the situation, as for the strength. It is seated vpon the Frontier of France, much stronger then any of that quarter; and by consequence fit to trouble the estate of the Realme, and to breed ambitious counsels in them which seeke for all occasions of inuouation. Out of doubt these were strong reasons: but both the inhabitants of Sedan, and the Marshall of Bouillons friends, together with those that desired to haue these matters managed after some milder course, produced other reasons, considerable both for waight and number, to diuert this designe. Sedan (saith they) is fortified vpon a rocke, inuironed with goodly great Bastions, and deepe ditches cut out of the rocke, the which cannot be taken but by filling of them vp: you must come vnto it by degrees to take the outward part, the which cannot be kept by reason of the good counter-scarpes, flanked of themselves, and flanked moreover by the Castle, and by the Bastions, so as it cannot be taken but by length of time, with great expence of money, munition, and losse of men. The importance of this conduct will force the King to bee there in person: for he knoweth that he is neuer so well serued as in his owne presence: and can more assure himselfe of the fidelity of many, then of their sufficiencies. And the turne

ture for fifty Cannon which his Maieſty prepares, with an army answerable, led so neere A the Low-Countries, almost into Bourgondy, shall they make so little brute as the King of Spaine will not ſtarle therat? will he not be careful to man his frontier with another army? for Princes conclude their ſafeties more by that which they ſee, then by that which they heare. And he which gapes after all occasions of greatneſſe, who thinks hee hath more ſuffice to ſuccour a Soueraigne affailed within his Eſtate, then they haue to aſſiſt his rebellious ſubiects againſt him: will hee let paſſe this opportunitie if hee can, to make the Duke of Bouillon ſtand obſtinately vpon his defence? will he faile to ſuggeſt all neceſſary meanes, to croſſe him whoſe proſperity he doth not behold, but with a malignant and enuious eye? Is it not credible, that both he and the Archdukes had rather haue the preſent poſſeſſor for their neighbour, then ſo mighty and redoubted a Prince? And is Sedan at this day leſſe able to kinde dangerous combuſtions, then it did betwixt Francis the firſt, and Charles the fifth? So much needy Nobility which bow their necks vnder the burthen of the laſt warres: ſo many malecontents which thinke they haue merited more then the King thinks he owes them, would they not goe to field to foſter their old deſignes, and to breed new? A royall army planted in one of the corners of the Realme, can the extend her wings farre enough to cover the remote Prouinces? His Maieſties Lieutenants, are they all of one temper? a change of affaires, may it not change their affections? doe they all loue, are they equally beloued, to hope for equall ſeruiſe, equall fidelity? will not the ſeaſon make them vary their reaſon? The aſhes of former combuſtion, doe they not couer ſome little fire, which ſome may take delight to kinde, when as the army ſhall haue leiſe meanes to bring water to quench it? But what a diſpleaſure were it to be forced to raiſe a ſiege from another mans Towne, to goe and plant it before one of his owne, affailed by the ſtranger. There is danger to loſe the principall for the acceſſory.

As for ſtrangers, England is ſo wonderfully ſcandalized at the monſtrous attempts, lately diſcouered againſt their Princes, as they will neuer like of a war begonne againſt them of their beliefe, what luſtre ſoever it cary. Italy promiſeth it ſelfe great aſſiſtance of the French againſt the deſignes of the Earle of Fuentes: but it hath not ſo great prouiſion of courage, but it will be much daunted, ſeeing their forces turned another way. The ſuiſſes will blame this deſigne, ſome for that it is againſt a Nobleman, and an eſtate of their confeſſion: Others, for that they will ſay they are abandoned to the Sauoyard and Millanois. The Griſons are in the ſame predicament, and ſaile in the ſame Sea. The Eſtates of the vniſted Prouinces will ſeele a great prejudice in their affaires, by the cutting off the commodities of France, being appointed for other places: The Empire will grow iealous of this approach, and the Germanes by the peace of Hungary which they hope for, ſhall want neither care to thinke of it, nor meanes to preuent it. The French army ſhall haue Liege behind them. The people are already iealous. The conqueſt of Sedan doth alſo purchaſe a title to the Duchy of Bouillon. They deſire neither the one nor the other: and will croſſe the firſt all they can to be aſſured of the ſecond.

All theſe inconueniences may be auoyded. Sedan hath ſerued the Kings of France no leſſe profitable vnder the title of protection, then can be hoped for vnder that of poſſeſſion. And the Duke of Bouillon recouering the Kings fauour, brings vnto his ſeruiſe both his place and that which is more precious, his great ſufficieny, well knowne to his Maieſty, and to all men, well knowne to the Councell of Eſtate, and to the affaires of warre; ſo as a perfect Amneſty may aſſure his returne. But the King cannot reſt aſſured of the Maſſall of Bouillon, nor of Sedan, but by the yeelding of the Caſtle; and the placing of a Governour, and a choiſe garriſon.

His troopes march, with an intent to haue ſixe and twenty thouſand men, and more if need were, with artillery and munition neceſſary to doe a great exploit. There were many commiſſions granted to leaue horſe and foot: young men came from all parts, he was not held the ſonne of an honeſt woman, that did not deſire to make his apprenticeship of armes vnder ſo famous a Captaine, and to ſhew his valour in this warre of Sedan, yet this war was not like to be very violent. The King knows better the ſtate of Sedan, then thoſe which haue diſtaſted him, and the Duke of Bouillon who knows that the ſhorter ſollies are the beſt, will not loſe his Maieſties fauour by his contumacy, the which he will willingly redeeme, at a higher price then the towne of Sedan: rebellion ſits not, but with ſuch as

A are borne for the ruine of their Country. The King before his departure from Piris, declared openly and freely, that he marched towards Sedan, with an intent to receiue the Duke of Bouillon with open armes. Doubtleſſe the beſt way to vanquiſh an enemy, is to doe him good when we may.

Theſe gracious words gaue them occaſion (who were grieued to ſee his Maieſty march againſt a place where the trauell and danger ſeemed more certain, then the purchaſe might be profitable, conſidering the diſcommodities of the Country, and the difficulty of the place) to ſollicite with great vehemency this buſineſſe which they ſaw in ſo good termes. Nelancourt a Gentleman of Champagne, noted for his piety, moderation, and integrity, B ſhewed ſo great zeale and affection in this negotiation, as then the King thought him capable to ſerue him, according to his heart in this action: The which being well aduanced, his Maieſty deputed the Lords of Inteuille (Gouernour of Champagne) and Ville-roy, both wholly addicted to procure the good and tranquility of his Eſtate, and his Maieſties ſeruiſe.

The Duke of Bouillon went to meet with them at Torcy, the laſt village of the realm, and there all conditions being examined, debated, and imparted vnto the King without any act of hoſtility, effuſion of blood or ſweat, his Maieſty knowing that mildneſſe is the beſt remedie to cure the wounds of an Eſtate, and tempering his iuſtice by his clemency, and praſtiſing that goodly Oracle, That hatred muſt be mortall, and frendſhip immortal, C he gaue two great blowes with one ſtone: for hee aſſured himſelfe of a place that would haue troubled him, being at the deuotion of men enuious of the proſperity of this Realm, or iealous of his greatneſſe: and reſtored vnto his fauour ſo much deſired, one of the chiefe Noblemen amongſt his ſubiects, the ſecond officer of his Crowne, a great man of State, active in counſell, and well praſtiſed in warre, and whom the triall of a long aduerſity will make more fit to doe his maſter good ſeruiſe.

In worldly affaires, if ſome croſſe of affliction ſhould not temper the ſpirit of man, in the end proſperity will make him drunk. He came vnto the King being at Douchery the eleuenth of April, and preſented himſelfe vnto him in the morning before his riſing: He deliuered vnto him by mouth, the humble ſubmiſſions which his Maieſty required, and demanded an abolition in forme according to the treaty. His Maieſty receiued him as graciouſly as if the Sunne of his fauours had neuer been eclipsed before his fortune. The Queen ſhewed him as good a countenance as ſhe was affected to this reconciliation.

Their Maieſties being accompanied with the Princes of the blood, the officers of the Crowne, and others, entred into Sedan. The Syndics and Sheriffes receiued him vpon their knees, proteſting generally, that they had neuer attended or deſired any more aſſured protection then that of his Maieſty: to which end they wiſhed all proſperity to Henry the fourth, King of France and Nauarre, moſt chriſtian, moſt mercifull, and moſt victorious: to the Queen, the happineſſe of his long and fortunate company: to my Lord the Dauphin, increaſe of vertues, and the fathers felicities. And they receiued from this ſacred mouth the answer which a people might hope for, being transported with the ioy and cordiall loue of a Prince, louing his ſubiects as a good father doth his children: I haue nothing diminiſhed (ſayd he) nor altered the loue and affection which I haue alwayes borne you: I will neuer diminiſh it, whereof I will alwayes giue you good proofes.

Then were the Cannons heard (which ſeemed to be planted for the defence of the towne) to applaud by their thundring this vnuſual action: The ayre did ring againe with cries of ioy, and with acclamations of God ſaue the King, God ſaue the Queen, God ſaue my Lord the Dauphin, ſent vp to heauen with vowes of eternall proſperity: and the inhabitants and Burgeſſes did not breathe any thing but a generall fidelity. Their Maieſties were much moued with the affections of this people; the which did merit this teſtimony from the King, See how this people loues me, (ſpeaking to the Princes, which did aſſiſt him) know they loue me. The Bonfires which were made at night in the ſtreets and publique places of the towne, did witneſſe that they were pure and free from diſſimulation and fraud. The thanks which they gaue ſolemnly vnto God, did ſhew that they tooke this warning for a threatening of his diuine puniſhment, or exhortation to a more hoſtileſt of life: and continuance of the fidelity which both the Soueraigne Prince and the people of the towne and lands depending, owe vnto his Maieſty. The preaching and ordinary prayers made in the accustomed places with all liberty (whereas many of the Court ſinned) are the betaine effects of the inuolable promise giuen by his Maiestie, that the Church of Sedan A should suffer no alterations nor change in the liberty of conscience.

The small traine wherewith the Duke of Bouillon presented himselfe before his Maiesty, and the company which the King had when he gaue him this fauourable reception, did witness the assurance they had one of another: a good master receiues a good seruant with an open heart: a good seru-ant prepares himselfe to yeeld vnto his good master the good seruice which he hath promised and doth owe him: finally, the gratifications and shewes of loue which the King had made vnto this people lately trembling, and now assured, made them know by experience, and confesse by effect, that they had no lesse subiect to praise God for the fatherly care which his diuine prouidence had now as heretofore of their good & preferuation. They commend the Kings wisdom and graue iudge-ment, being able wisely to discern the capacity of his subiects, fit to serue him in great affaires. He left Netamours for Gouverneur of the party, whose merits were no lesse pleasing to the Soueraigne then to the subiects of this petty Estate, and on the third day he tooke his way toward Paris.

The Duke of Bouillon did accompany his Maiesty vnto Mouzon with a small traine:
and the next day he returned to giue order for his affaires: within few daies after he came to hold his ancient place in Court, as he returned into the Kings heart, who to witness the effects of his loue, did abolish and suppress the memory of all things done, knowne, or spoken by him against his Maiesties seruice vnto that day, so as neuer any further search might be made. And by his especiall grace, full of power and royall authority, he dispensed with him for his appearing in person, in his Courts of Parliament, to haue his Letters of abolition registred. By the which also he was confirmed in the same estates, honours and dignities, which he had held and did yet hold within the Realme.

There is nothing more lawfull nor more commendable in a well gouerned Estate, then to prouide for the necessities of such as for a mark of their vertue remaine lame, and haue no meanes to liue, after they haue serued the Prince in his warres well and faithfully. Our Kings haue alwayes desired to acknowledge their merits: but by the injury of time, or the negligence and fraud of officers, their ordinances haue bene without effect, to the shame of marriall discipline, which grieues to see many poore Gentlemen and other fouldiers made vnprofitable to cary armes, and for all other functions, by wounds, losse of limbes, and decrepit age: or that haue consumed their meanes in paying their ranlomes, in charges to be cured of their wounds receiued in their seruices, or of other infirmities and diseases which the toyles of warres doe breed, were reduced in their declining age to a miserable and vnworthy kind of begging.

The King desiring to make them feele the effects of his bounty, to giue them meanes to passe the remainder of their dayes in rest, and to encourage his other subiects of all qualities, to serue him the more willingly in all future occasions, vpon hope of the like remuneration. He giues them by an irrecuocable Edict,

*The royall house of Christian charity, and the money growing vpon the remainder of accounts of hospitals, almshouses, leprous-houses, and other such companies, and of the usurpations and alienations of the reuenues thereof; reuisions of the said accounts, and abuses and disorders committed in the gouernment and administration of the said places. Together with the money which shall rise of the places and pensions of religious lay men, in euery Abbey and Priory of this Realme, being in his Maiesties nomination: As is contained at large in the Edict verified in the great Councell, the seventh of Iuly. So as all Gentlemen, Captaines, and Sould-diers maimed, in doing his Maiesties seruice, in his companies of men at armes, lighthorsemen, archers, or Harguebutiers on horsebacke, taking certificates from the Captains and Colonels vnder whom they haue serued, containing the time of their seruices, their valour, with the combats, perils and dangers wherein they haue bene, and in what action of warre they haue bene maimed for his seruice, the which they shall bring vnto the D.
of Montmorency, Peere and Constable of France, to be verified exactly by him, to make a life signed with his hand, and to note in the margin what annuall pension euery one may merit in his opinion, according to their quality, valour, and wounds. And those which haue serued in the Regiments, Garisons, and Companies on foot, shall bring the like attestations to the Duke of Epemon, Colonell generall of the French foot, or (in the absence of the said Constable and Colonell) to the two eldest Marshalls of France which

A shall be then in Court, to make the like life, and in the same forme, verified by the great Almoner of France, one of the Secretaries of State, and the Lords of Souaray, Chasteau-vieux, and Rochepor, Knights of the order, and Councillors of State: which life being brought vnto the King, and deliuered into the hands of one of the Secretaries of Estate whom he shall appoint, there shall euery yeare a roll be made of maimed men, and others, whom his Maiesty will entertain, and of the Pensions which shall be assigned to euery one, payable by him that shall haue that charge, vpon the paines contained in the order of his Maiesties Exchequer, who to iudge of differences according to the accustomed formes of Iustice, hath created a Soueraigne Chamber, consisting of the said Noblemen, and other worthy personages, as you may read in the Original.

From this godly and charitable act, we passe vnto another, which doth witness that the King, as a common father to all his subiects, will not onely maintaine them in peace in this age, but will also continue the quiet of their soules, seeing that our ayre cannot be purged from trouble, without the cleareness of consciences in diuine seruice. His Maiesty hath lent one care vnto the Clergy, & now on the nineteenth of August, he opens the other to the humble petitions of them which profess the Religion granted by the Edict of Nan-tets: and desiring to make them enjoy the contents of his Edict, and the priuate Articles granted in consequence thereof, he ordaines that the modifications and restrictions which haue bene made by his Courts of Parliament, Chambers of account, and other officers, contrary to the tenure thereof, shall be taken away, and to that end all letters and necessary commandements should be made. Moreouer, he did enioyne his said Courts, to enroll the said Edicts and Articles (if it were not done) in their Bayliwickes and Scheneshals. And commanding all Bayliffes and Schene-shals to send them into their iurisdic-tions, to the end that no man should pretend cause of ignorance. Inioyning all Iudges, Proctors general, and their substitutes, to cause them to be exactly obserued, and for default thereof, to answer it in their proper and priuate names. And granting to them of the said Religion, many demands and speciall orders which rise from the Edict: his Maiesty en-ioynes them on the other side, to cary themselves according to the Edict, auoyding all occasion of scandall: and on the other side to Catholikes, to cary the like moderation, and wisdom for feare of stumbling. Thus he makes knowne how desirous he is that all his subiects should enjoy with concord the peace which hee hath heretofore purchased for them with so much toyle and sweat.

As the King seeks by his bounty to entertaine his people with concord, and so to raise them to the top of prosperity and happinesse: So wee now see that God doth giue him evident signes of the fauour and loue which he powreth forth vpon Princes which reigne according to his heart. He doth now seale to vs in particular the wonders of his loue to this Realme, by a gage which makes our hearts to leape with consolation and ioy, to remember the feare wherein we lately liued, seeing our selues in danger to fall into the miseries which threaten Estates wanting an assured successe. And retiring vs from the valleys and gulphes of this misery, hee hath giuen vs an ample subiect to acknowledge his free bounty. For one of the greatest blessings which heauen can poure vpon man, is to haue many children, which cary the image of the father, and make him as it were to reuiue in their birth. So as from a luely root grow new plants, which produce the like fruits vnto their stocke. The Soueraigne protector of this Monarchy, hath now supported the peace and quiet of France, with three precious pillars of his bounty, and we behold them as firm supports of his grace.

Their birth hath made them children to mortall Princes, whom the holy Scripture honors with the title of gods: and hath opened vnto them the gates of Realmes, and transitory Principallities: but it was expedient, that by a spiritual regeneration they should become the children of the great immortal God: and that Baptisme giuing them entry into the Church of Christ, it should open them the way also to the immortal and celestiall heauen, printing in their faces the Characters of the children of God, as vpon their fore-heads, the image of God himselfe. The Sacrament of Baptisme had bene giuen them within few dayes after they were borne, but the ceremonies were deferred vntill an opportunity. The King had long desired it, if many encounters had not crost the complementation. The death of Pope Clement the eight had stayed it. Leo the eleventh (before Cardinal of Florence) did in a manner see the last of his dayes with the first of his Papacy: Paul the fifth his successor, being advertised that the celebration of the ceremonies and solemnities A was appointed the fourteenth of September, he wrote vnto Francis Cardinall of Ioyeuse, That he would haue them done by his Ministry in the blessing of the Lord: and shas seeing he could not assist in person, he had made choice of him to performe this complement, according to the dignity of the Apostolike See, and of the children of the eldest sonne of the Church; seeing that by the honour of his rank, by the nobility of his blood, by his wisdom, fidelity and experience in affairs, he was pleasing vnto the King, and acceptable vnto the Realme.

The Princes and Noblemen in Court did contend who should exceed each other in brauery and expence. A small patterne will make vs to iudge of the whole peece, omitting to relate it all in particular. In the hilt of a stately sword which the Duke of Espernon cauied to be made, there were set eigheteen hundred Diamonds, whereof the richest was at twenty crownes price, and the least at foure or fve; which hilt (as the Gold-smith said that made it) came to thirty thousand crownes. Our Ladies Church in Paris was appointed for this royall spectacle, but by reason of the infection it was translated to Fontainebleau, which the good King Saint Lewis called his desert and solitary place.

Thus the fourteenth of September, being a cleare and bright day, was notwithstanding lighted with many torches and tapers: and the ceremony was performed about fve of the clocke at night in the Court of the dungion (for neither the Chappell, nor the greatest hall in the Castle, was capable to containe so many thousands which came to this rare sight) vpon a great and high Theater, hung about with rich and sumptuous Tapestry; in the midst thereof was a square with fve fadome in compasse, inclosed with barres covered with tapestry, and carpets vnder foot. In the front thereof was an Altar richly adorned with the ornaments of the Order of the Holy Ghost, and covered with a canopie of the ornaments of the said Order. Behind the table there was a degree of three steps covered with Tapestry, and in the midst thereof a kind of great stoole, adorned with cloath of siluer, vpon the which were placed the Fontes covered with an exquisite towell, and ouer them a canopie. On either side of the Altar was a scaffold prepared for the musicke. Beneath it, and on the right hand, was a forme covered with tapestry for many Prelates. Among others there were three Archbishops, nine Bishops, and three Abbots. On the left hand were the Noblemen of the Council: And before the Altar the Cardinall of Gondie, enuironed with many Almoners and Chaplaines, and a great number of beholders, seated as they are in theaters. About the Theater were all the Scuffles of his guard, euery one holding a burning torch in his hand. My Lord the Daulphin, and the Ladies his Sisters were in their chambers, vpon great beds made like a Tribunnall, after a royall manner, vnder a cloath of Estate, with coverings of powdered Ermines, and they were carried to the square table, their gentlemen seruants going before, euery one with a waxe candle in his hand, being followed by the gentlemen of the chamber, with drummes, fifes, trumpets, howboyes, Heralds, and the Knights of the Holy Ghost, with the three honors following. First, for the yongest Lady, the cup, the bason, the pillow, the candle, the cresset, and the saltstiller, were carried by the Baron de la Chastre, by the Lords of Montigny, Rochepot, Chemerauld, Lien-cour, and the Marquis of Ferraques; the Marshall of Boisdauphin carried the Lady, being followed by Charles Duke of Lorraine the god-father, and by D. Iohn de Medicis, brother to Ferdinand great Duke of Tuscane, representing Christierne daughter to the Duke of Lorraine, and wife to the great Duke; after whom marched the Duchesse of Guise, the Countesses of Guishe and Saulx, the Marquesse of Montlaur, with other Ladies. The Marshalls of Lauerdin and la Chastre, the Duke of Suilly (before Marquis of Roissy) the Dukes of Montbason, Espernon, & Elguillon, did the like office for the eldest Lady. The Lord of Ragny carried her in the place of Diana Duchesse of Angoulesme, who represented the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, Archduchesse of Austria, being followed by the daughters of Rohan, Montmerency and Mayenna, who were virgins, & the Duchesses of Rohan, Suilly, and others. The third honour for the Daulphin, was serued by the Earle of Vaudemont, the Knight of Vendosme, the Dukes elder brother, (both base children to the King.) The Duke of Montpensier, the Earle of Soissons, the Prince of Cony The Daulphin was carried by the L. of Sourray his gouernor, in the place of the Prince of Conde being sicke. The D. of Guise carried his traine; and the Cardinall of Ioyeuse followed him, representing Paul the fifth being Pope: They were attended by Eleanor wife to Vincent Duke of Mantoua, and the Princesses of the blood, richly attired,

A The Daulphin being brought to the square Table, the Cardinall of Gondy being appointed to performe this ceremonie, he came neere vnto him, and hauing heard him answer pertinently to questions he asked him, according to the ordinarie forme, and to rehearse the Lords Praier and Creed in Latine, hee was blest, and anointed, and called Lewis by the Cardinall of Ioyeuse the Popes Legat; at the naming of whom they might see ioy appeare in the Kings countenance, shewing by the exterior, the inward contentment hee received, remembering that Saint Lewis, the ninth of that name, King of France, is the Author of that family of Clermont, from whence is issued that of Bourbon, sitting at this day in the Throne of his holy Predecessor: and the ioy of the assembly did witness, that his name is very pleasing after another; and the eldest was afterwards carried to the Table one after another; and the eldest was named by the Dutchesse of Angoulesme, representing the Archduchesse her God-mother without a God-father, Elizabeth: (which the Spaniards call Isabella) the youngest was named Christierne by Don Iohn de Medicis, for the great Duchesse.

At the banker, the King was serued by the Princes of his blood. The Prince of Condy held the place of Butler. The Prince of Contie of Cup-bearer. The Earle of Soissons had the place of Lord Steward: And the Duke of Montpensier of Carner. The Duke of Guise, and the Earle of Vaudemont serued the Queene: and the Duke of Suilly, the Legat. The God-fathers and God-mothers were set, and then the Princes, Ladies, and Noblemen. At the dancing, the Duke of Lorraine did precede by the Kings order, in consideration onely that he was a good and gracious Father.

The next day was spent in running at ring, and the Duke of Suilly caused an assault to be given by night to an Artificiall Castle, with an infinite number of Squibs, Canon-shot, and other fire-works. But there was neuer any thing more admirable to the eye, nor more incredible vnto the eare, then the beautie, brauerie, and lustre of the Princes and Ladies of the Court. Mans eye could not endure the shining of the Gold, the brightnesse of the Siluer, nor the glistering of the Pearles and precious stones, which covered their robes, and the Princes and Noblemen were attired in the most rare and precious stufes that could be found out. The Queenes robe hauing two and thirtie thousand Pearles, and thirtie thousand Diamonds, made it to be without peare, and without price.

This yeare about Easter, there were such violent winds and stormes thorowout all France, as the tops of houfes being cast downe, many were slaine and sore hurt in Paris, so as they could not goe safely thorow the streets: In the Countrey old growne Trees were torne vp by the roots, but although there were a great spoile of men, houfes, and trees at land, yet was it not so fearefull as at Sea, whereas many suffered shipwracke and perished in these tempests.

In May the Riuer of Seine being much risen by the abundance of raine which had fallen, the King and Queene coming from Saint Germaines, the Carroch being in the passage Boat and coming to Land, the Horfes going forth, thrust backe the Boat with the force of their feet, and ouer-turned the Carroch into the Riuer, so as the Queene was in great danger of drowning: the Courtiers leapt into the Riuer to rescue her, but Cassengeray, (a Gentleman of a Noble Family) advanced the rest, freed her from danger, and brought her to Land, to the Kings great content: she rewarded her deliuerer with a rich chaine of Diamonds.

In Iuly, the Prince of Contie tooke to his second Wife Catherine of Lorraine, daughter to the Duke of Guise, that was slaine at Blois, and of Catherine of Cleues, who was one of the Daughters and Co-heires of the Duke of Neuers, uniting the houfes of Bourbon and Lorraine in mutuall loue by this Alliance, whereby it seemed all future ieaousies being taken away, both houfes would hereafter continue good friends, for there is no greater bond to tie Noble Families together, then marriages, and the fruitfull issue which descends of them.

The infectious plague hauing begun to disperse it selfe, by reason of their stouie burials, and the little care they had to prevent the danger; in Autumne it grew very violent, and to be generally dispersed ouer the whole Citie: Such as had meanes were forced to retire themselves to their Farmes, and Countrey-houfes, to auoid the danger.

The straightnesse of their Pest-houfe did increase the mischiefe, being easily gotten when as they did lye and conuerse together, for such as were infected did infect others being not lodged apart: the which was not soe terrible in time by the Magistrates: besides the Pest-houfe being in the furthest end of Saint Iaquess Suburbs, such as were infected on the other side of the Citie, nor able to endure so long a carriage, died by the way, and some yet breathing, were A buried for dead by them that carried them. To prevent the like inconvenience hereafter they began to think of another Pest-house of an admirable structure, in another part of the Citie, as you shall hereafter heare: Winter coming on, the plague ceased in Paris, and was dispersed into the Country, whereas many were thought that had fled from it in the Citie.

I will be bold to relate a memorable accident, though out of France, yet neere vnto the frontier. A Gentleman of Sawoy called Charmet, going in September after his accustomed manner, into the next woods to hunt some wilde beasts, hauing no other armes but a peece and a dagger, and for his companion a fierce dogge, of a Mastiue kinde, which would hunt vpon the scent, and finde out their dens: hauing wandred long in this wood, & lost his way, B being very peniue, he comes at last againe into his way, the day being neere spent; he had not gone farre but he was encountered by foure theuees, who with their swords drawne came to assaile him, who finding himselfe vnable to make resistance against so many, he encourageth his dogge, and with his peece kills one of the theuees; the other three presse him in such sort, as he studied how he might flee from them, his dog takes another of the theuees by the throat and staies him, being thus intangled by the dogge, the Gentleman gets away his sword, and then refusing courage, he chalet away the rest, whom the dogge pursued with all eagerness, but his Master beat him backe, who being thus freed from theuees, he went to the next village called Saint Albaine, where he tells his misfortunes, and shewes both his and his dogs wounds, perswading both the Iustice and the Inhabitants to pursue these theuees, who presently went into the wood, and followed them by their footing, hauing beene often molested by their theeuings; They could not be long hidden; In the end they found three young men in an hoftry standing out of the way, being a receptacle for such people: one of them being hurt in the arme, argued their guilt, foall being carried to Chambery, they were broken and laid halfe dead vpon wheels, suffering a condigne punishment for their murders and thefts.

Birth of the Duke of Orleans.

The King had another Sonne, a great increase for France, the Flower-de-Luce is neuer in danger when there be Males, they be the ruine of home-bred seditions, and a perpetuall support of the Salique Law: this last borne Sonne had the title of Duke of Orleans giuen him. It is one of the goodliest Dukedomes in the whole kingdom, and is next vnto the Dauphin; D the Citie of Orleans stands vpon the Riuer of Loyre; It is very ancient, as appears by national Councils, and decrees of Popes, and in the first race of our Kings it had the title of a Kingdome, when as Clouis diuided his Realme to his three Sonnes. There were bonfires and shooting of Ordnance for the birth of this Sonne, and all France did reioyce, to see the old decayed tree, reuiue againe and grow young, by these new plants, vnder whose shadow they should finde refuge, in heat, raine, and tempestuous weather.

Reuenues of Nauarre vnto
the Crown.

Henry the fourth, when he was but King of Nauarre, enioyed goodly hereditarie possessions, as well in Gasconie, Guienne, Vendoline, and generally thorowout the Realme, as in the Low-countries, and other foraine parts: being come to the Crowne of France, and to a greater fortune, he made an Edi& in Aprill, one thousand five hundred ninete and two: by E the which he would haue all those his reuenues of Nauarre, with the rest, managed distinctly & a part, hauing a charitable care of his onely Sister, whom he loued deere, and of his Creditors, to whom he had ingaged his Lands before his coming to the Crowne: wherefore vntill this money were paid, he held it no Iustice to vnite those Lands vnto the Crowne: The Kings Proctor opposed himselfe against the Kings will, saying; That by the lawes of France, all that was the Kings, did accree vnto the Crowne, as small streames which fall into great Riuers, and those into the Sea, lose their names. But when as the King had lost his Sister, (who died without children) and had paid those priuate debts, this yeare in Iune, by his Edi& he vnited his Realme of Nauarre, with those other dignities and possessions which he held from his Ancestors, vnto the Crowne, as they might not afterwards be diuided. So as F his Officers of Nauarre lost both their places and fees.

Pomponius Belliue Chancellor of France, & the Nestor of our Age, left the corruption of this world, to get an incorruptible life in heauen; He dedicated the first fruits of glory vnto the Senate of Lyon his native Country, but being called so Paris that great light, he was well knowne vnto Kings, and finding himselfe mortifie for the secret counsels of Court and difficult affaires of the kingdome, then to plead causes, notwithstanding that it was his profession, and had supplied the place of President, yet following his owne humour, he gaue his mind wholly

He was buried with as much honour as could be desired for a man of his fashion, being followed at his funeral by many Bishops, Knights of the Order, and the whole Court of Parliament, Fenouille appointed Bishop of Montpellier, made his funeral Sermon: he had a Monument of Marble erected, on the which was grauen this Epitaph in golden letters.

In France, to the end that future ages might know, there is a kinde of men whose Parents Edict against them that rob the publicke. C were neuer knowne by name, when as they come with their gripping Tallons to manage the Publicke or Princes Treasure, they sodainly become all gold, as if they had bathed themselves in the riuer Pactolus; in their diet, apparell, traine and pallaces, they exceed the greatest Dukes, how rightly many doubt, how freely all men know; yet they are terrified by an Edict made euery third yeere, but as it were with a still lightning, for hauing paid a small more reuenue out of a great prey, being freed from all their villanies, they giue themselves boldly to theeuing.

This yeere Iudges were chosen to presse this sponge, or rather appointed to reuenge these publicke thefts, abundance of wealth was now fall vnto the owners, neither wanted they any other witnesses, then to enquire of their birth, patrimony, and what they had gotten together, D capital questions were not troublesome, the matter was apparent.

The Marquesse of Allegre had during the ciuill warres traitorously murdered Halot at Vernon vpon Seine being vnarmed, coming vnto him vnder a colour of saluting him, being armed and with a traine of souldiers: He presently left the Kings partie (the which hee had maintained constantly) and fled to the League: And to the end he might free both himselfe and the rest that were guilty of this foule murder, he procured that a young man who had serued him as a Page should publicly carry Saint Romans Chafe, not without the emulation of other malefactors. As many as had bene confors in this murder were by the Court of Parliament condemned and executed in Picture, and as many as could be taken, died for the fact: for the suruiuing wife with an incredible charge did offer vnto him the E blond of the guilty, or of those which with a dry hand and ignorant of the Treason were present at the fact; after the restlesse rage of a courageous wife, at length this young man La fell into her hands, being in bonds he pleads his cause before the Parliament at Rouen, he seeks to proue his innocency by his renderage, by his duty to his Lord; by his hands that were not imbrued with blood, hauing not at that time euer drawne sword, it is not any guilt for him to looke on, that could not auoid it; the Law doth not condemne any but such as when they might haue forbidden it, would not: The dishonour lies vpon them that be- hold and wink at violence offered, and nor vpon them which are vnable to repell force, but must of necessity be silent and still, Pisot cried out to his companions which beheld his ruine, By Iehv (thinke off) you make the guilt common.

F La Moss Advocate did adde, that his case was farre otherwise, then that which Iohannes Papid describes vnto Lewis the Emperour: He offendis as well as the actor, who when he can correct, neglects to mend: notwithstanding La Moss being doubtfull of his life, and loth to rely too much vpon the concelled hope of his innocency, he hath his refuge vnto the Altars and Churches, as if they were safe guards for Wickednesse. Whilst his cause is in question, he appeales vnto S. Remane the reuenger of a pardoned crime, he calls the Archbishops Ioyeuse, and the Chanons of Rouen to assist him in this controuersie, and to defend the priuiledges

of their Saint. If it be a guilt to sinne with the eies, for him whose hands were free from murder, notwithstanding although he were the most detestable murderer liuing, by the onely carrying of this chafe, the offence being pardoned, there was no more question to be made vnto him; the ancient priuiledges of Neustria were broken, force and reproach was offered vnto their household-god, the custome had bene obserued for many ages, not newly inuented, when as by the Hebrew law, euery yeere before Easter their custome was, to let a malefactor free: neither were some Cities in Palestina vnto to Romulus Sanctuary, being built as a refuge for offenders, Gregory of Tours doth generally in his Annals witness, in what reuerence the Altars and Churches of the gods were, and how many offenders haue by that meanes escaped present and capitall punishments. Crimes are not wiped away with blood onely: there is nothing of greater efficacy to pacifie Gods wrath, then repentance, and how acceptable it is, our Sauour teacheth, when as he set the Adulteress free, who was ready to be stoned by the feuerity of Moses law: whilst he liued vpon earth, hee did not condemne any Malefactor, but did blesse euen the most wicked with his company and table: as Paul, who was afterwards the light of the Gentiles; Publicans, as Mathew; Adulteresses, as Magdeline. He did so often wipe away the reproches of insulting circumcised men, as he did publickly confesse, that he came into the world to cure the diseased, and that the whole had not any need of a Physitian. It is no fable that is reported of S. Romsin, who slew that monstrous Dragon which annoyed Normandy, as of Hercules and his Lemean snake with seven heads. Saint Romsin drew this raging monster out of his den, and as it were made tame and bound, brought it to publike fire in the middelt of the City, with the helpe of a Malefactor. It hath bene a custome obserued for many ages, that euery yeere an Offender should be set at liberty, and haue his life giuen him.

Antiquity is a great testimony, and of more force then any Records: it came vnto posterity by tradition: in the affirmation of miracles the faith of Antiquity is more ancient then all monuments. Saint Augustine to the end he might confirme the faith of miracles, did thus write vpon them that doubted, I haue seene Christ, who was seene and did appeare, neither haue I seene them that saw him, but I haue beleued the confirmed opinion of Nations, and the reports which is very authentike, this was commanded from Heauen, this was deliuered vs by our Ancestors, and hath bene obserued vnto our time, to seeke to alter and peruert this, is nothing else but to seeke a sacrilegious way to Religion.

It hath bene obserued in all ages, that Malefactors were freed from punishment vnto the sight of their gods. Ninus did first erect Statues whither offenders might flie: he did set vp an Image like vnto his father Belus, whither if any one came, he was pronounced free from the crime and punishment. The Athenians had an Altar of Mercy, The Ephelians gaue refuge to Malefactors in Diana's Temple: Osyris to the Egyptians, Apollo to the Assyrians, Iupiter to the Itacenses, Minerua to the Lacedemonians, who were their Tutelary gods. Finally, they fallily attribute to Deities, that which Christians doe now giue vnto the true God. At Rome the day before the Assumption of our Lady, there are two offenders brought forth to execution, and giuen to the Virgin, who lest examples of mercy to be imitated, and preidents of Christian clemency to be embraced and followed. On Palme-sunday Eue there is one deliuered out of the Chasteler at Paris.

At Vendosme in the Abbey of Saint Triade, a Malefactor, after that hee hath gone naked with a great Torch on his shoulder thorow the towne, being followed by the whole Clergy, and admonished by the Crier to leade a better life, he is not onely freed from his bonds, but being refreshed with good victuals, is set at liberty. The new Bishop of Orleans, at his first entrance into the City, lets all criminal persons at liberty. This was giuen to God, not that through hope of impunity offenders should grow more bold; but that their liues not being taken away, they should acknowledge to haue receiued them againe from God. Who will think that our wise fathers (as some malicious people say) being abused, would so long haue endured this Imposture? as if this age (which is but a step-dame, to the Ancient, and hath fallen into Heresie) had discovered this fraud. But we (a more wicked generation then our fore-fathers) are not wise in heart and beliefe, but with our eies onely: We giue not credit to that wee see, but what wee feele with our hands, when as faith comes by hearing, neither doe we approach to neere vnto God by any vertue, as by Mercy, which consists chiefly in sparing the guilty: for as Seneca saith, The whole world should perish if mercy did not temper anger. There was much more pleaded by the Advocates for La Motte, and in defence

A defence of the ancient priuiledge of the Cathedrall Church at Rouen, the which for breuitie sake I omit.

On the other side Halots incensed wife, an implacable reuenger of a wicked murder, powred forth many bitter words: That the Altars of the gods were much defiled with this rabble of wicked men: that they were better pleased with chastity and cleanness then with sacrifices, and therefore it was vsuall among the Ancients, before they beguine the sacrifice, one cried out with a loud voice: Goe farre from hence ye men that are prophane. And the Hea then thought that the gods dwelt in their Temples: neither was it vnworthily spoken of one, The true power of dedication is that which brings in God, and sets him in his appointed place: It is not lawfull for eueryman to doe this, but for such as haue chaste hands and holy hearts. And who would endure the Temples of the gods to be polluted by wicked murderers and theues, who defile all they touch and breathe on? They wrongfully produce many examples out of the Heathen, Hebrewes, and Christians, when as all Sanctuaries were instituted to protect them only that were guilty of murder committed by chance, or an vn-premeditated crime: for so God the Reuenger commanded: If any one hating his neighbour, hath laid wait for his life, and hath slaine him flying, and then shall flie vnto one of the aboue named Cities, the Elders shall take him, and deliuer him vnto his neereft kinsmen, whose blood he hath spilt, and he shall die. Neither was the feuerity of the Churches in old time to be removed, when as Merone moued with the hatred of Fredegond his step-mother, had fled vnto Saint Martins Church, (which was then very religiously worshipped by all men) King Chilperic his father (yeelding too much to a bloody woman whom he loued) wrote a threatening letter to Gregory of Tours: Cist that Apostata (said he) out of the Church, or else I will fire the whole Country. The Emperours would not haue their Statues to protect any other, but such as were oppress by the enemy, and power of their enemies. Lucius the 3. commands that publike theues and way-layers should be excluded from the immunities of the Church. Vidus Pape, the light of the French lawes in his age, makes mention, that being Councillor in Dauphine, there were two murderers drawne from the Altar to execution. The Ancients did rightly call that the Altar of mercy, to the which they were delected by the stormes of angry Fortune, and vnable to satisfie: or that had vnwittingly stricken, or false into any other casual crime, had fled. Neither were pardons granted but to them that were guilty of vnpremeditated murders. When as Constantine the great at the birth of his children granted these kinde of graces, he excluded murderers, way-layers, witches, and adulterers: They that maintaine this wonder of S. Romsin, to absolve offenders, haue it not confirmed by any Annals and Records, but only by Antiquity. What ancient Writer (being then in a manner all Monkes) would haue past ouer in silence so great a miracle of a diuall power? hauing set downe most triuolous things, yet no man writes of this serpent, which was brought bound to a publike fire, whereby we may rightly beleuee there was not any such wonder. Neither is it credible, that vnder religious Kinges, one Malefactor carrying the chaine, a multitude of wicked men should be freed from bonds and punishment, which is the sinew of ciuill government, especially vnder Leuis the ninth, who was most sparing of pardons, and if he did with a trembling hand grant any, yet he still made his Almoner, who was his Confessor, acquainted therewith. But let vs allow that which is written of the most hidden secrets of the Hebrewes, that it is neither recorded in parchment, nor grauen in the barks of trees or stones, lest Time should weare it out, but left vnto vs by our Fathers by long Tradition: yet in maintaining the priuiledge, the abuse is to be corrected, euen by S. Romsin's will, who when as in that worthy act, he had but one Malefactor for his companion, would haue but one afterwards to be pardoned. But in our age what a summe of wicked men, being protected by this brazen wall, doe freely laugh at publike lawes? For by this the company of offenders is freed, any one that is past shame, that respects not his reputation, and blushteth not at the faces of men, submitting his shoulders to this holy burthen, which he had so often subiected to the Snake, by his only act he besse all the rest from ignominie, and absolues the absen, the which were in solent with all other Nations. Wherefore the widdowes Advocate demanded La Motte's head, with a longer speech, as a sacrifice to the ashes of her deare husband: the cause had many hearings, and much was written by the Clergy of Rouen for the defence of their priuiledge.

In the towne of Metz there was an Ensign of the Garrison called also La Motte, an insolent man, and dissolute in his life and conversation, who being extremely in loue with a young Virgin within the towne, resolved to win her by all affirmments: if not, to get her by force.

In this wicked designe he employed a drunken Gossip, whose profession was to be a bawd: the A abusing this Virgin with an honest shew, brings her into the souldiers house, like a sheep to the wolfe and slaughter; being shut vp into a prison, he rauisheth her: her miserable parents are continually tormented for the want of her: they run vp and downe weeping and crying that their daughter is stolne away, they moue the Iudges to seeke her out and to reuenge: they hauing sent for the Captaines of the Garrison, who were suspected of this rape, aduised them speedily to deliuer the virgin vntoucht vnto her complaining parents. La Mot the rauisher flood by, who being struck with the Prætors voice, and the horror of his offence, trembles and apprehends the punishment of his fact: he goes home, and resolues to adde one wickednesse to another, and performs it; if he should restore the Virgin deflowred, there were no meanes B to escape punishment: wherefore the first villany must be hidden by another. This cruel man, who had learned in warlike slaughters not to feare bloud, doth not keepe his cruell hands from the murder of this Virgin: he bereaues her both of life and honour: and left there should be some markes of this murder to discouer him, he cuts the body in peeces, and putting it into a sacke, casts it into the next Riuer. This foule fact lay hidden vntill that this libidinous Ensigne-bearer had taken away another maid from a garrison Souldier with the like lust, who not bearing this indignity, complained to the Gouverneur. La Mot with the bawd (who was accustomed to corrupt young maids) and the bawds seruant, were committed to prison: they refuse to be tried by the Iudge of that place. But soone after, the first fact, which he thought time had worn out of memory, began to breake forth: for the bawd and C seruant being examined apart, the truth began to shew it selfe, but there wanted a competent Iudge to proceed in the cause.

Rage and violence of a discontented man.

At length the matter was referred to the great Councell, there to be tried: and they were all carried bound to Paris, where being put to the Racke, the Bawd and her seruant not being able to endure the extremity of the torments, did willingly confesse all the fact, whereupon they were condemned to the Gallows, and La Motte to lose his head, who hearing of this fatal sentence, beganne to storme, and refused to be bound and lead to the place of execution: he striues with the Hang-man and Sergeants; in the end being cast vpon the Ground raging like a mad man, they binde him and carrie him out vpon their shoulders, and put him into a Cart: being come vnto the Scaffold, he shewed no more mildnesse, but much D selfe modellie and resolution then was befitting an Officer that professed Armes. Hee renues his rage and violence, and preisteth his friends that were about him to goe to the King to sue for his pardon: He that was now dying did still liue in hope. The Duke of Elperton, remembring his valour, had sued for his pardon: and Queene Marguerite going late to the King at night, had beene very importunate for him, but the King, overcome with no prayers, commanded hee should die. La Motte being told that the King would not bee moued for his pardon, and being aduised to take his death resolutely, and to forbear these intemperat humors which did not become a gallant Souldier, the which in publike were taken for signes of basenesse: That hee which had so often sought death in the thickest troupes, should now not feare a Hang-man: Being at last made more calme, E he kneeled downe, suffered his eies to be couered, submitted his necke to the blocke, and lost his head.

In the beginning of this yeere the cold was so violent as it killed Corne, Vines and Trees, especially those that had any pith. There had not beene so hard a Winter scene in many ages. The swiftest riuers were so frozen, as Carts laden with great Burthens, went as freely ouer them, as vpon the firme land, the Rockes of Vines euen to the very root withered away, with the force of the cold, neither did they spring againe, vnlesse they were cut off: all Nuts although they were old, and had very hard shells, withered away; and which is wonderfull, Medlar trees and other which are most firme dried away. The breath going hot from the mouth, grew presently white with cold, water taken hot from the fire grew presently hard, F and the Wine which was in the Caves would not runne out of the Vessels: so as in many places they were faine to cut it with Hatchets: as Belley reports happened in his time, when as the Kings Army wintered in the Duchie of Luxembourg: The riuier of Seine was so frozen, as the King and Courtiers attending vpon him, passed it daily ouer without feare or suspicion of danger. The people who liued vpon their daily prouision, were much opprest for want of wood.

Death of the D. of Montpensier.

Henry of Bourbon, Prince of the bloud, Duke of Montpensier, and Prince of Dombes, having

1608

A having languished two yeeres of sicknesse, and wasted to the very bones, being not able to receiue any sustentance, was nourished (as they say) with womans milke. A little before his end, the Duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne, was made sure to his only daughter; his house hauing this support, by the perswasion of father Angelo his father in law, he left all worldly cares, and applied himselfe to heavenly meditations. The sharpnesse of the Winter did halten his lingring end: for the force of it was so piercing, as it not onely dried vp his bowels being weake, but many (the cold growing milder) went away suddenly, as the Physicians said. Being then of the age, which makes a man of a goodly representation, rich in wealth, fauoured by his King, followed like a Prince, and abounding in the gifts of fortune, and the vertues of the minde, remaining still constant in the Catholike Faith: He died in the armes of his father in law and wife, without any motion, like vnto a Lampe whose oyle is spent. His funerall pompe was prepared: an Image of Wax was made like vnto himselfe liuing, and laid in a stately bed with golden Furniture, and the Armes of the House of Bourbon about it, whereas his Table was serued eight daies together in the same state and magnificence as if he had beene liuing. His funerall rites were performed in our Ladies Church.

Marriage of the Duke of Orleans to the Duke of Montpensier's daughter.

Order of Princes obsequies.

Petrus Fennilius the Kings Preacher, and appointed Bishop of Montpellier, did after the accustomed manner commend the Prince, with a learned Oration, where as all the Courtiers mourned. But his death hapning about Shrouetide, all their vsuall sports were laid aside, C many grieving at the cost they had bestowed for this pompe. The Dauphins maskes with the young Noblemen about him (for that it had beene importuned in this time of mourning) was deferred, till that Montpensiers obsequies were ended according to his dignitie: which done, his bodie was carried to his house at Champigny in Poitou, and there laid in the graue with his Ancestors, with the like princely pompe.

The Iesuites could not be contained in one Kingdome: as they had beene receiued into France, so they did desire to haue free access into Nauarre, and Bearne, for the propagation of Religion: That there was no cause of difference why they should not be admitted into the one Realme as well as into the other, seeing they were subiect to one Lord. They of Bearne opposed themselves with all violence, who hated the Iesuites, no lesse than D Philip did Demosthenes, and the other chiefe citizens of Athens, who were the defenders of the Atticke Libertie.

Iesuites admitted to goe into Nauarre.

The King being at Blois in the yeere 1599. granted by the Edict to them of the Religion of Nauarre, and Bearne; That no Iesuite should come within their Confinnes, lest they should breed some inuouation that might trouble the publike quiet: yet the Bishops in the country requiring the contrary, the King changing his resolution, decreed, That they should be admitted into all places as well as the other Orders, abrogating the contrary Edict; and protesting that his meaning was to send the Iesuites thither, to assist the Bishops to re-plant the Catholike Faith. All the Iudges and Officers in the Country were wonderfully discontented; for they hated the Iesuites about all creatures liuing, keeping them far from their limits, E and in former times they put them to death like Spies, if they found any: but the Maiestie of Henry the fourth is growne so great, as his power is feared as well at the foot of the Pyrenee Mountains, which distinguish France from Spaine, as in Paris, and as is willingly obeyed. A rare felicitie of a Prince, which happens not to many, whose preferences are respected, but when they are retired, they are like vnto the Sunne, which being set, clouds arise, so doe Factions by their absence.

We will relate a memorable fact, and the fatal end of a most wicked man, and cunning Impostor, of whom all Europe hath spoken. He was another Proterus, and transformed himselfe into sundry shapes. Sometimes he called himselfe Casir Floris, another time Francis Faus; sometimes a Geneuois, another time a Neapolitane: sometimes he counterfeited himselfe a Physician, and sometimes a Merchant, but at his triall he termed himselfe Francis Faus, which we will keepe. He was borne in a little towne called Capriola, in the territories of Genoua; he spent his youth in many voyages, professing Physicke: being foure and thirty yeeres old, he came to Nouara, and there making gaine of his physycall profession, he becomes a suter to a Merchants daughter called Catherina Olina; the father fearing that this stranger had another wife, desired to haue some certificate of his country and parents. He who was exceeding cunning in counterfeiting of any hand, drawes an instrument himselfe, annexing a seale vnto it, whereby the Iudge of Saint Sauerin, a little towne neere vnto Naples, doth certifie

Francis Faus a cunning Impostor.

He all men, that Faua was borne there, a frugal man, of the Tribe and Familie of Fiori, the A which was an ancient, and no obscure house. The Merchant of Nouara knowing no deceit, gives him his daughter in marriage; being at length weary of the place and name, he gets him into a Towne of the Iurisdiction of Placentia, called Castelara, with his wife and three children remaining, and small store of stuffe: and being impatient of his fortune, finding himselfe vnable to maintaine a familie with so little meanes, he gaue his minde to incredible villanies, and hauing gathered together fiftie Crownes in Gold, he comes to Naples, whereas when he had fought out among the Bankers, that Alexander Bosfa was the chiefe, he gets him a long gowne, and counterfeites himselfe an Abbot. He insinuates with this Banker, and persuades him that he hath a Nephew at Venice, which deals in his businesse, desiring him to make him ouer fiftie Crownes to be paid at Venice by exchange by his Correspondent, B Bosfa who suspected no deceit, writes his letters, and hauing receiued the money, deliues them to this Impostor, who doth imitate it daily, vntill in the end he could counterfeit Bosfa's hand. After fifteene daies he restored the letters againe vnto Bosfa, and receiued his owne, pretending that his Nephew, hauing ended his businesse, was gone from Venice. Conuerting thus with the Banker, he gathered vp fume stragling letters, which lay disperfed, being of no moment. And he being from home, he goes vnto his booke-keeper, and desires him to lend him paper and a seale, hauing good opportunitie to write vnto his friends, the messenger being in haste; hauing good leisure in the absence of Bosfa, being a speedy writer, he writes fix letters suddenly, and seales them with Bosfa's seale; he deuised this fraud that he might obferue the forme of his paper, and the manner of his seale. Finding no such paper at Naples, he buies C the like at Ancona, and counterfeites the seale, the which he keeps for to effect his villanie.

During his abode at Naples, he was encouraged by a pardon granted for the like offence; There was one that had counterfeited a Bankers letters condemned to be hanged, going to execution, and meeting with the Viceroy of Naples, and the Cardinall of Agnania, he was deliuered, so as he expected the like grace, if he were taken in the like offence. Soone after he came to Padoua with a haufen crowne, counterfeiting himselfe to be a Priest. In this habit he goes in the euening to visite the Bishop of Concordia, and faines himselfe to be the Bishop of Venafrey in the Kingdome of Naples, who was forced to flie his country, vpon suspicion of adulterie with the Duke of Caietans Neece, whereof he was fallily accused by his ill-willers: that being banished from his country and house, he had beene at Rome to purge D himselfe vnto the Pope of so foule a fact, but the hatred of his great enemies had made him to yeeld to their enuie, who hauing often sought his life by poison and force, he had secretly escaped out of Rome in a poore Priests habit, and had fled vnto him as vnto a Sanctuary and safe refuge. He intreats him to fauour a miserable man and a vagabond, and that he would finde him some trustie man, vnder whose name he might safely receiue at Venice ten thousand ducats of gold which he had left in trust at Naples with Ian Baptista Carraciola Marquis of Saint Elmi: That in his aduersitie the said Marquis and the Archbishop of Bari his brother, had beene his great fauourers: and that he might require this kindnesse with some good turne, he had betrothed his Neece vnto the Marquis with a dowrie of a hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, and the money which he had left in deposito was to buy chaines, iewels, and other ornaments for women, whereby he might purchase his returne into his country. The Bishop of Concordia greewing at his misfortune, promifeth him all helpe, and to giue him a faithfull man to negotiate his businesse, namely, Anthony Bertholomius a Banker, by whom he might safely receiue the money at Venice which he had left at Naples. This counterfeite Priest answered that he thought it very conuenient, and hauing giuen him thanks he retired himselfe secretly.

This practise was confirmed by one of the Bishop of Concordias seruants, who said he had seene him at Rome in a Bishops weed, so as if there had beene any suspicion of fraud, the Bishop by the testimonie of his old seruant had easily freed it. Faua faines that he had written to Naples to Carraciola, and letting passe so many daies as a post might goe from Padoua to Naples, and returne from thence to Venice, he giues a packet to Olina Olina his wifes brother, being acquainted with his couzenage; the which like a flying post he brought to Angelo Bosfa at Venice, being vnto Alexander at Naples: hauing opened the packet, he read the letter that was written vnto himselfe, and other three written from the Marquis Carraciola, whereof one was to the Bishop of Concordia, another to him of Venafrey, and the third to Anthony Bertholomius.

These

A These three letters are sent from Venice to Padoua, to the Bishop of Concordia: hauing read that which was written to himselfe, he sends for the counterfeite Bishop, and deliuers him his, the third vnto Bertholomius being then at Venice, with charge that he should receiue the money for his fellow and friend the Bishop. All these letters were counterfeite, and written by Faua, that written by Alexander Bosfa, was of that paper which he had bought at Ancona, and sealed with his seale, the other of the Marquis of Carraciola was as cunningly counterfeite. Alexander Bosfa's letter to Angelo contained these words: You shall vnderstand that the Marquis of Saint Elmi, within three daies after that the Archbishop his brother shall come to Naples, is to deliuer vnto me ten thousand ducats; to the end that you deliuer so much to Anthony Bertholomio a Merchant at Venice, to buy pearles, precious stones, and other Jewels of B that kinde. The letter to the counterfeite Bishop of Venafrey was written in this sence: I haue vnderload by your letters that you are safe in the Bishop of Concordias house, who hath promifed you the helpe and assistance of Anthony Bertholomius a Merchant at Venice, by his meanes you shall receiue ten thousand ducats, which you left with me, within three daies after that my brother the Archbishop shall be returned to Naples, I will send a letter vnder Bertholomius, certifying, that you may receiue that money for the buying of Jewels. That which was written to Bertholomius contained these words: I vnderstand by the Bishop of Concordia, that I am to pay ten thousand ducats to buy Jewels, within three daies he will be here that should deliuer the money, hauing restitued it, I will presently deliuer it to Alexander Bosfa, from whom I will take a bill for the payment of so much to you at Venice.

C Within three daies after, Faua suggests that he had receiued fise other letters by a Post, one was written to Francis Bordenali factor to Alexander Bosfa, another from the said Alexander to Angelo, the three others to himselfe fallily called Bishop of Venafrey, to the Bishop of Concordia, and to Bertholomius, all counterfeite. The bill of exchange went in these words: Hauing receiued this letter, within three daies after or sooner, without expecting any other aduice, pay vnto Anthony Bertholomius a Merchant and Banker of Venice, ten thousand ducats, the which we haue receiued from the Marquis of Saint Elmi, to buy pearles and Jewels, and if Bertholomius will exceed this summe, doubt not to giue it him, for the Marquis hath left a thousand ducats more in deposito with vs. The letter which was written to Bertholomius, spake thus: I send you bills of exchange for ten thousand ducats, whereof I made mention in my former writing three daies D since, you shall deliuer it to the Banker, and hauing receiued the money, you shall buy precious stones, pearles, gold chaines, and such like, according to the direction of my Lord Bishop of Concordia. He aduifeth Faua to goe himselfe to Venice, and to make choise of that rich ware, wherein there was much deceit: he yeelds to his aduice, and hauing letters of commendation to Bertholomius, taking for his companion Iannu Peter Olina another of his wifes brethren, he goes to Venice, salutes Bertholomius, and deliuers him the Bishop of Concordias letters. He not knowing what a Scorpion he did nouriish in his bosome, entertained Faua for his guest, and did reuerence him as a Prelate: hauing receiued the bill of exchange from him; he presents it to Angelo Bosfa, who accepts it, and promifeth payment accordingly, whereupon Bertholomius goes about to make choise of his pearles, he giues a scantling vnto the Goldsmith, E hauing seene the ware, he paises the price that was agreed vpon: During this businesse, this counterfeite Bishop staid some daies in Bertholomius house, where he carried a very religious shew, hauing alwaies a Breniary in his hand, still mumbling his prayers like an Ape, so as he was held to be very deuout; and when as he went abroad, he put on such a countenance, as he was taken of all men for a reuerend Bishop, and was much esteemed by the Generall of the Venetians Gallies, hauing carefully inquired of Bertholomius of the fame and life of this Prelate. And to the end he might more safely abuse Bertholomius, he told him of his misfortunes, of his proseription, of the malice of his enemies, and repeats vnto him what he had said vnto the Bishop of Concordia, adding that he had an intent to goe to Turin, to speake with the Marquis of Este; who was going into Spaine about the marriage of the Duke of Mantouas sonne, with the Duke of Sauoyes daughter; to intreat him to procure him letters to the Viceroy of Naples; that he might be restored to his country and Bishopricke. Whilest he remained with Bertholomius, he discouraged of matters of State, especially about the controuersie betwixt the Venetians and the Bishop of Rome, seeming often to take their parts, yet with such moderation as he differed from the Venetians onely for religious cause. He often and very sildy talked of accidents which hapned vnto him, that he had beene sent Nuntio from Pope Clement the 8. vnto the Emperour Rodolphe, that besides his entertainment, he

he had spent of his owne in this Ambassage 10000. crownes, for the which charge he had A received no grace, when as by the iudgement of the Archbishop of Barry and other Statesmen he had defured a Cardinals hat: Bertholinus looking wilyly on him at the Table, said vnto him; Vileſſe I be much deceiued I haue ſeene you eſſe where, the which Fana did affirme, and vntoſſe my memorie and mine eyes wander, I thinke it was in the Marquis of Palauines Palace, vpon the riuer of Salo, where we did recreate our ſelues with fiſhing.

True it is that Fana was neuer there, yet whether that he had learned of ſome other that Bertholinus had bene in the Marquiſſes houſe, and there taken delight in fiſhing, or that he had ſome diuining ſpirit, he did ſo intermix truth with his lies, as Bertholinus was forced to confeſſe that which had neuer hapned. The buſineſſe being thus effected by this counterfeit Prelate, he writes vnto the Biſhop of Concordia, that the Jewels being bought according to B his deſire, he meant to depart the next day early, that they might be at Padoua before noone, deſiring Bertholinus that going into Piedmont he would let him haue Martin his oldeſt ſeruant for a companion. Bertholinus hauing taken a diſcharge from the Biſhop of Concordia, deliuerſ all the Jewels to Fana, who gaue him a note for the receipt thereof. Fana hauing packt vp all, he offered Bertholinus a large reward for his paines, beſides his brokeredg, the which in regard of the Biſhop of Concordia he would by no meanes receiue. But heare the villanie of a moſt wicked gueſt, who fearing if for want of money he ſhould make ſale of any Jewels, he ſhould diſcouer his fraud by his want: Whileſt he lay in the Venetians houſe, he had obſerued that there was money in a cheſt in the Chamber where he was lodged, & he picks open the locke, and ſteales ſiue hundred crownes from his Hoſt, and locks the cheſt C againe, ſo as his theft could not be diſcouered. He goes to Padoua with Bertholinus, who was ignorant of this villanie, and hauing giuen many thanks to the Biſhop of Concordia, and commended his care who had giuen him ſo carefull an Hoſt and Factor, being impatient of all delay, making haſte as he ſaid to Turin, he retired himſelfe. Bertholinus returning home, and opening his cheſt, he found it empty, but to ſuſpect the Prelate of this, his dignitie and profeſſion did forbid him.

Fana robs his Hoſt.

Impoſture diſcouered.

The next day Bertholinus receiued nine thouſand ducates from Angelo Boſſa: but beheld there comes a Poſt with all ſpeed from Naples, to aduertſe Angelo that his Nephew Alexander had giuen no bills of exchange to the Marquis of Saint Elmi. The fraud being diſcouered, inquire is made for Charles Pirrius profeſſing himſelfe Biſhop of Venafrey, and a warrant granted to apprehend him. Bertholinus & Boſſa certiſied the Biſhop of Concordia, how they haue bene all abuſed, ſo as they hunt ouer all Italie for him, but in vaine: And they giue notice vnto forraine Nations of the villanie of this man, of his theft and flight, but they make particular mention of the Jewels, and of the weight of the pearle, with the colour and forme of the ſeales. The deſcription of this theft is ſent to Lumagne a Banker at Paris, who giues notice thereof to all the Goldſmiths.

Fana went not to Turin, as he made ſhew, but gets him home, and acquaints his wife and children with his intent to goe into France, that he had ſtore of gold and pretious ſuffe, whereupon he inſtantly changed his abode, and went backe againe to Venice with his wife, three children, and Oſtiano and Peter Olima his wiues brethren, and Oſtiano miſliking this voyage into France returned home. Paſſing from thence with all his familie through the Griſons and Suſſes, he came in Nouember to Paris, and there hired him a chamber. Fana thinking himſelfe in a ſafe country, ſtudied where he ſhould ſetle himſelfe; not at Paris, by reaſon of the concourſe of Italians and other Nations, alwaies fearing the miſfortunes which fell vpon him, but at Poyctiers, or Angiers: He writes to Francis Corſina, who gouerned an Apothecaries ſhop at Bruiſels, requiring him to come ſpeedily to Paris, that he had ſtore of gold wherewith they would buy drugs, and ſet vp a ſhop for Phyſicke, and that he ſhould haue an equal ſhare in the gaine. Whileſt he expects an answer from Corſina, he offers ſome Jewels to ſell to a Goldſmith called Burgoing, intreating him to helpe him ſo a broker, by F whoſe meanes he might make ſale thereof: The Goldſmith promiſeth him his owne labour, and receiues ſoure caſes, for the which he giues him a note of his hand. He ſhewes one of them to Maurice and Turket, two Jewellers, who viewing by their notes the forme and red colour, finde it to be ſtollen: They make an agreement betwix them to diuide the reward which was promiſed vpon the recouerie of the goods, and then they acquaint the Lieutenant Criminall therewith, who leiſing his habit, did counterfeit himſelfe a Merchant, and attended Fana returne, who came ſoone after, inquiring of the Goldſmith, if he had found

A out any one to buy his Jewels, yes marry haue I, ſaid he, very ſufficient and wealthy men, the which Fana thinking to be true, he that had often circumvented others, fearing no deceit in this counterfeit Chapman, he drew forth his caſes of Jewels, the which by the marke that came from Venice were knowne to be the ſame. Fana ſeeing the Merchants to obſerue the ſeales very precieſly, began to feare, and to the end he might withdraw himſelfe, he pretended that he had ſome preſent buſineſſe with another Merchant at home, and that he would returne preſently whileſt they were viewing of the Jewels. But the Iudge diſcouering who he was, apprehends Fana, he examines him of his other caſes, who doth not denie but he had ten more, the which could not be hidden, whereupon the Iudge went with Burgoing the Goldſmith to Fana lodging, where they finde the number of the caſes, and the weight of the Gold and Jewels, and take an Inuentorie thereof. This cunning wretch ſeeing himſelfe brought into theſe ſtraights, intreats that he may not be ouerthrowne with the loſſe of ſo rich Merchandize, when as his life, good name, and the health of his wife and children were vnder the protection of the Law and Juſtice.

The day of his apprehenſion he was examined of whence he was; how old he was, and of what profeſſion? He answered that he was called Francis Fana, borne at Capriola, a towne in the Territories of Genoa, that he profeſſt Phyſicke, and was ſiue and ſortie yeeres old. That although his chiefe profeſſion was Phyſicke, yet he had bene accuſtomed to deale for Rings, Jewels, and Pearle: that he had bought this Merchandize at Placentia, from one that C was knowne, and two other vnknowne, to the end he might ſell them againe in France and the Low-countries. Being examined againe the thirteenth day of Ianuary, he ſaſ vpon his knees and craues mercy of the Iudges, ſaying, That whatſoeuer he had formerly confeſſed was falſe, that he was guiltie of the theft which was in queſtion, and ſo relates the whole manner of it, as you haue heard.

Examination of Fana.

But he determining to do that vnto himſelfe, which he expected from the Iudges, he reſolued to preuent the infamy by a voluntarie death: Being wrapt vp in his clothes & couerlets, to the end the warme bloud might flow more freely in the cold of winter, he cut the veins of either arme with a Penknife: but the violence of the cold congealed the bloud, and forced him to liue, that would gladly haue died, his ſtrength failing him, he calls for his keeper, his D armes were bound vp, and his life ſaued.

In the meane time Poſts ſlie to Venice with newes of his taking: They preſſe him daily with new queſtions, and bid him tell why he demanded Martin of the Biſhop of Concordia to accompany him in his way? He answered, he did it that he might more cunningly hide his fact. Being asked why he returned to Venice after ſo memorable a fact? He answered, that he had made choiſe thereof as his ſafeſt way, and that ſuch as purſued him would thinke he had bene gone farre from thence. The Iudge inquiring whether his wife were guiltie of all theſe villanies; He answered, that the ſecrets of ſuch waightie buſineſſes were not to be committed to a womans wit; that he was of an innocent life and conuerſation, as all Italian wiues be, to whom marriage is a willing ſeruitude: that he had bene alwaies moſt and E obedient, and neuer queſtioning of his affaires, notwithstanding the wife (as if ſhe ſhould be a witneſſe) was confronted with her husband: the hung about his necke, and could not ſpeake for ſobbing, but he hauing more courage, ſpake thus vnto her: O wife, either my life ſhall be ſaued, or eſſe I ſhall haue a certaine death: If I liue, thou ſhalt enioy a loving husband; if I die, thou ſhalt loſe all cauſe of ſorrow. When as hee viewed the caſes with the Jewels and Pearle, he accuſed his want of iudgement, hauing ſtil left them with the ſame wax and ſeales as he had receiued them at Venice.

Fana confeſſeth the fact.

Fana ſeekes to kill himſelfe.

But being often vrged that it was not his owne worke and induſtrie, to counterfeit ſo many letters and hands, for that when hee had written to a Biſhop, he did vſe pontificall phraſes; to a Marquis he wrote like a Souldier and Courtier, and to Merchants he vied their F owne ſtile: He answered, that he himſelfe was the inuenter of all thoſe deſeits; that hee was not ignorant of their manner of ſpeaking, and could ſo well counterfeit any mans hand, as it ſhould not be diſcerned from the right; he had no leſſe ſkill in ſeales, as he contended with any grauer in his art. Whileſt his cauſe was in queſtion, Corſina comes from Bruiſelles, he viſits the priſoner, and promiſeth him all help and aſſiſtance. Fana craues once this fauour, that he would aduertſe him daily what paſt in the Venetian Ambaſſadors houſe concerning him. come from Venice, assuring that Bertholomius would be there the same day, and therefore he should speedily resolve of his escape. Fana having conferred with Corfina, he bewraies his minde vnto him, how he meant to escape; that he would slip into the keepers chamber in his absence, and so get downe into the Court; if he might be assisted with a Ladder of ropes, he would get vp to the top of the wall, and so into the street. Corfina, or some other fits his turne, and makes fast such a Ladder vnto the wall about six of the clocke at night, and cast a rope into the Court, with the which Fana should draw the Ladder vnto him.

This practise had like to haue taken effect on the seuen and twentieth day of February in a very darke night. Fana having sent a seruant of the house forth, to fetch him Wine, in the meane time he gets into the keepers chamber, strips himselfe, and with a rope slips downe into the Court: being there he was long searching for the rope which was tied to the Ladder, for that the night was darke and rainie: hauing found it, he goes vp, but being too thort, he could not get to the top. Whilst he strives to come to the top of the wall, he that went to fetch him wine returnes, and finding him not there, he tels the keeper: he with his seruants finding *Fana*s clothes, take him hauing one foot ouer the wall, and shut him vp close: they presently goe forth with lights to search where this Ladder was cast, and meet with a man flying with his sword drawne. The keeper examines Fana of his premeditated flight, and of the Ladder, and he freely confest all, yet he knew not whether Corfina or any other had prouided him this meanes to escape.

comes to Paris.

Bertholomius comming to Paris with letters of commendation from the State of Venice, C he is brought vnto the King by the Ambassador, who giues him a fauourable hearing, and promifeth to doe him iustice, commanding the Chancellor that he should not suffer this wickednesse to goe vnpunished. Bertholomius to proue him guiltie, produceth all things that might discouer the fact. Hereupon at the suit of Angelo Bussa his proccesse is made. Fana despairing of all helpe, being weary of his life, hee seekes all meanes to die; The fourth of March he sends for a Barber to cut his haire; he intreats him to helpe him to halfe an ounce of Arsenick, Currans, Roses, and Sugar, with the which (being mingled with the whites of Egges) he would make a medicine for the swelling of his eies. The Barber did as he willed him, but when as he saw the poison mixt with all, the keeper looking on, he told him what it was, the which being taken from him, and asked to what end he made it; he answered, for D the paine in his eies, and although that Antimonia was taken for a poison, yet being beaten and tempered it lost his force; that he was so farre from offering himselfe violence, as euer since the cutting of his vciues he had sought to preferue his health. He did abhorre to bee condemned to the Gallies, rather wishing death then seruitude, finding himselfe vnable for that labour by reason of his wounds.

Fana poisons
himselfe.

All proofes being made, his proccesse was ended the two and twentieth day of March. Fana hauing some notice that his sentence drew neere, he resolved to prevent his Ignominie by a voluntarie death: The violence of the cold had stoppt his bloud, poison had bene taken from him; and he had cast it vp often hauing drunk it: he must not now attempt death in vaine; he intreats his wife to make him a certaine cake, the which hauing sent by his eldest sonne, he brake it in peeces, and rowling it in Arsenicke he swallowed it: soone after the poison wrought on him with great torments; he tels his wife that his last hour approached, but he speaks nothing of the poison, and requires a Priest to haue pardon of his sinnes: the violence of the poison increasing, he desired to be laid out vpon the straw, and soone after died on the foure and twentieth day of March.

His bodie was opened and the poison found in his bowels, whereupon they gaue sentence against his carkeasse. Fana was found guiltie for that he had changed his name, counterfeited other mens hands, stolne Gold and Jewels, and poisoned himselfe: his bodie was condemned to be drawne groueling vnto the common Gibet, and there to be hanged by the heeles: His goods were forfeited to the King, hauing first paid the price of the Merchandize: There was a warrant granted to apprehend Ottauio and Peter, who had bene companions in all his villanies. It may be I haue bene credulous in relating of these Impostures, but I thought good to set downe this notable villany particularly, that hereafter other men may take heed of such Counsellers.

A impatient of peace, and to liue quiet in his owne home, he murders a Gentleman his neighbour, his poore mournfull widow calls her selfe at the Kings feet, and sues for reuenge for the murder of her husband. The Prouost of the Kings house had charge to apprehend the murderer, whereof being aduertised, he presently flies into a strong Cattle called Moyencourt, and there hides himselfe.

He was summoned by a Trumpet, to yeeld himselfe vnto the Kings mercy, the which he refused to doe, wistle hee might haue his pardon granted vnder the broad seale, or that Monsieur de Craqui, or the Earle of Saulx his Brother would passe their word for his safety. The Prouost seeing he could not bee perswaded by good words, sends for all the garrison B Souldiers thereabouts, with an intent to force him; approaching neere, he shot five or six of them; being thus obstinate, they sent for Artillery to Noyon, but before they played it, they summon him againe to yeeld vnto the Kings mercy, who had long hands which no private man could escape; but they talked to a deafe man.

Being againe thought fit to moue him by the Parish Priest, who discourfing vnto him of the cares and contempt of this present life; of the future blessednesse, or of the eternall paine, he lost all his labour: They then resolved to attempt that by force, which they could not effect by faire meanes. Whilst they prepare to force him, they sent the murderesse mother (who had bene a companion to him in his impudency and villanie) vnto them: being let into the Cattle, she intreated her daughters and her suer with teares to yeeld, assuring them of the Kings mercy, but the vnfortunate old woman not able to moue either of them, returned; telling the Prouost, that they were both resolved to die willingly, and to prevent an ignominious death. He first let downe a Boy and a Girle in a basket, to the end they might be preferred, then shewing themselves, and increasing the lookers on to pray for them, they went into a pinacle, where seeing they had no longer time to protract their yeelding, the gates being forced, they shot one another thorow, and died. The Cattle being forced, their carcases were found bloudie and halfe burnt (for they had gathered much straw about them, to the end they might be consumed with fire) and were barked to the end they might be reserved for publike infamy.

The five and twentieth of Aprill the Kings third sonne was borne at Fontainebleau, on the D same day that Lewis the ninth his Predecessor was borne, he was titled Duke of Anjou: we looke for a fourth who shall bee called Duke of Achacon: I doe not reade that there hath bene more Sonnes of France. Henry the second had fo many, but their liues were thort, and their ends were not happy: but our Queene is fruitfuller and more blessed then the first Medici, and promifeth more, which is the true meanes to settle the quiet of the Kingdome, to bless their friends and confederates, and to cutte their enemies, enuironing it as it were with strong towers and defences.

Birth of the duke of Anjou.

In Iuly Dau Pedro of Toledo was sent Ambassador from the King of Spaine to the French King: he was entertained at Fontainebleau, with all the delights and sports that the Court could afford: being gladdened therewith, he went to Paris, where either the beautie of the place, or the importance of his Ambassage detained him long.

Ambassage
from Spaine.

This year the Country-mans Promise was found true. That after a sharpe Winter, folloves a hot Summer; as passengers were wosen with cold, so did labourers in Summer fry with heat, and many were smothered, as if they had bene in the Defarts of Arabia; so as the extreme cold of Winter and the violent heat of Summer spoiled their Vintage, hauing scarce had any raie in three moneths. This year the Duke of Vendosme, the Kings bafe sonne, was made Duke by the Duke of Mercurers onely daughter. The marriage had bene concluded at Angers in Aprill 1598, and a great pension appointed vpon him that should detract.

I doe not hold it vnsit for the History, nor to be left to posteritie, to relate the memorable Doctores of Courts, where is you may obserue their great equitie and feueritie, whereby young people may be terrified from whom and what to learne, and contemp of Parents by the example of the parties condemned. Yanvrou a Gentleman borne, sonne to an Auditor of the accounts in Normandy, being seduced by the persuasions of Iouan Andrew a bafe woman; he marries her secretly, the Rectors complained to the Court of Parliament against Yanvrou for the rape of his young man; pretending that such marriages were forbidden by the lawe of God, and an Edict made at Orleans, without the consent of the father, and Andrew himselfe, and all Priests were forbidden to consecrate such holne marriages: the Parents say that a youth yett under the roo, had bene abused by the Inchantments of a bafe woman.

woman and of a doubtfull fame, that their sonne was not to dispose of himselfe, and that A he was forced. That these clandestine marriages had bene often punished, and that it was a rape.

In the end at the great Instance of the Parents, and in severitie of publike discipline, the Parliament decreed, that the stolne marriage betwixt James Drouet and Jean Andrew was void and of no effect, being made without the consent of the Parents, and against the lawes of the Kingdome. Joane was condemned to goe with a Torch in her hand, her face covered, and a halter about her necke, and to aske pardon of God, of the Parliament, and of the Parents of Drouet, then to be whipped three daies together at the corner of every street, and so to be banished the Realme, or if she did not obey this Decree, to be hanged. All her goods B were confiscate to the King, having first paid the charges of the sute. James was also deprived of all the inheritance which he could pretend from father and mother, and condemned to a yeares imprisonment, untill that his Parents should be fathers for him. Drouet and Joane were forbidden ever to see one another, or to speake together, by word, writing, or messenger, and not to renew this marriage. Those which had confumated this clandestine marriage contrary to the Decrees of the Councell of Trent, and the Edict of Blois, were also condemned to come into the Court, and vpon their knees with a torch in their hands, to craue pardon of God, the Parliament, and the Parents, being also condemned in a great fine.

Punishment
of Priests.

It was also decreed, that the Edicts of Henry the Second, and Henry the Third, made at Blois vpon that same subiect, should be every year published on a certaine day, in all the inferior Courts of Normandy, and commandement given to observe them strictly, nor to suffer the banes to be asked by any hired Priests or Vicars, but to pronounce them themselves in open pulpit, three Sundais in the presence of the Parents. The Officials were also charged, not to admit of these banes, vntill they were required by the Parents and Kinsfolkes. James, Joane, the Priests that were condemned, and the Clergie of Normandy ioyning all together, make great instance to the Kings privy Councell to have this Decree disannulled, and declared void, but it was irreligious to offer violence to so religious a Decree, yet with this moderation, as the King was moved to pardon the pecuniary fine, and the banishment of this wretched woman.

Complaint of the Clergie vnto
the King.

The Clergie of France had by their Deputies held a long assembly at Paris the yeare before: their conclusions (which were then kept very secret) burst now forth into a great complaint made vnto the King by the Archbishop of Bourges, in the presence of the Cardinals of Ioyeuze, Gondie, Sourdis and Perron, and thus he spake in the name of the whole Clergie.

" Most inuincible amongst mortall men, if it be lawfull for sorrow to speake, if nothing afflicts miserable men more then imposed silence; The Church plunged in so many calamities and miseries, so that it is ouerflowne and drowned in a Sea of griefe, hauing no passage but thorow thornes and bushes, whose Cup is Worme-wood and bitter Drege, shall receive no small comfort this day, if it shall please your most sacred Maiestie for to lend a fauourable and auenture eare to their iust complaints. The Edict hath exceeded, and faire exceeded it E selfe beyond the torments and crueltie of Iulian the Apostate, who forbade Christians to sigh and weepe, and did enuy this bitter comfort to wretched, more wicked then the Heathen which sung;

Elete mens casus, est quodam fore voluptas, Passus lacrymarum gemitusque dolor.

Bewalle my case & weeping brings some content;
Sorrow by teares findeth both ease and vent.

" But now the Church hauing overcome tyrannous impietie, and being laden and crowned with the spoiles of her enemies, adorned with the fauours of Emperors and Kings, and supported by their power, is not afraid to shew her bloody wounds vnto the King. To the King, I say, whose Predecessors have graced and beautified the Churches wedding with a Ring, and other Jewels; an eternal monument of the Kings, and of France her picture. And for that thou hast more then once heard her sighes and groanes being vnworthily increased, and received her (being assailed) into thy armes, she comes more confidently relying vpon your helpfull fauour, being againe deformed with the impuritie and corruption of the world, and with teares of griefe, doth prostrate her selfe at your most Royall feet; she speaks vnto you

A you not fearfully, but with a free voice, being worthily bound vnto her; hauing powred forth so many teares and praises vnto Almighty God, for your preteritacion and advancement vnto the Crowne, hoping you will not be vnkindfull of so great a pietie.

But oh! Henry thinke there is nothing more worth of a King, then a care to plant, preserve and propagate Religion: It is the eye of an Empire, the life of Government, an arme of thy Arme; and as I may say in a word, a Kingdome hath not a more firme support. The Kings of Persia held it most true, or else their Heathenish superstition did not suffer the children to be advanced to the Kingdome, before they had learned the Myteries of their fathers Religion. Religion & Government are the two supporters of humane society: happy is the coniunction, B if one requirith anothers helpe, they concurre friendly. The Tribes of Israel how did they flourish, when as Moses praised vnto God and Isus fought and vanquished? They are much deceived which impute the ruine of Kingdomes to climactericall and fatall yeares: Farre be it from the thoughts of Christians, who should rather beleue that the fates of Kingdomes depends of Religion, the which being maintained, stand firme, but neglected they goe to ruine: It is a parcell of Gods fauour, and a coniunction of mortall and immortal spirits, and a seale, and bond of the eternall covenant, the which the fates conspiring cannot dissolve: And therefore the wife Romans would haue the names of their Tutelarie Gods, kept from their enemies, lest they should goe into forraigne Cities; they had an Imagination that Sages could not be forced, vntill the God which did protect it were called away. Wherefore the Heathen did thinke the coniunction of Religion and Government to be an inexpugnable fort.

Beleue oh most Christian King! that thou art linked vnto God by Religion, and that there is no greater signe of a declining estate, then when Religion is banished, being appeared by many ancient examples, that God flies the company of mortall men, when as Religion and his worship is neglected. Thinke oh King! that thy state is not settled by any politike Government, or by wise Councillors; there is a secret power from aboue which rules it, euen God who giues and takes away Scepters, he watcheth for thy fastie, preserues thee from thy enemies, and makes thee a spectacle to all Europe by thy victorious triumphs. The same God hath broken the yoke vnder which France lay bound, wiped away the D teares, pacified the ciuill warres, erected the ruined Altars of peace, cured the wounds, restored the Lawes, and (lest I should be tedious) reuiued France that was almost dead, and hath made it a terror to other Nations. Thy glorie is so great as thou hast brought this ship being ready to be cast away by the violence of the storme, into a safe Port, thou hast broken the confederate Armies, and passing so many dangers, dost shine with the spoiles of thine enemies, thou hast releued languishing France, which despairing of all helpe ranne willingly to ruine, if thy inuincible courage had not exceeded the greatnesse of her extremitie.

These, oh Henry! be the Monuments whereby thou hast bound future ages vnto thee, But this is not all: to make thy glory immortal, there rests one thing the which the Church must finish and make euerslasing; Namely, that thou wilt command the Decrees of the E Councell of Trent to be observed, whereby corruption, filthinesse, symonie, bargaines made in trust, and such like wickednesse may be punished. The Synod was celebrated by a generall assembly of the world, confirmed by the Pope, and is observed of all Christians; The which if you shall refuse to publish, that vniuersall garment shall not be cut with any other sheeres, nor the Vale of the Temple rent with any other whirlwind.

Antiquitie which is an incorrupt witnesse, hath worthily honoured France, for that it hath alwaies assisted the Church and saved it from tempest and shipwracke: A field which the heavenly Husbandman hath manured with his owne hand, and purged it from Tares, and Darnell, that the Lilly may flourish, vnder whose shadow it might rest secure from all heat and stormes; a Garden set with most pleasant and sweet flowers, neither is there any Nation more obedient to their Pastors and Ministers. France should lose these goodly Titles, if it should reiect the Councell of Trent.

The Astronomers hold, that the Planets are gouerned by the motion of the heauen: onely the Moone they affirme hath a peculiar and contrary motion. It is most certaine, that sacred Oracles doe in like manner depend vpon Generall Councells, and that the wheele of Gods chariot (which Ezechiel saw) is greater, the which forceth the rest with his violent motion. The Councell of Trent is like a Sphere, which doth gouern the Planets of the French church, to sequester the which from Synodall decrees by the pretence of priuileges & priuate Immu-ities, what is it else, but to give a private and opposite motion like unto the Moone? They A that looke into the secrets of Nature, say that theye, which is the window of mans body, is inuironed with seven Arteries, by whose violence it moues, yet the eie is not unwillingly moued. It is not vnlike the liberty of the French Church, the which depends of a greater motion, neither should priuileges make it proud, and moue against theye whose beame it is, but by the motion of Synodall constitutions. It is the Load-star of the vniuersall Church, according to the which the French must direct her course. Your Maiestie is not prouided hereby, neither doe we with any other expostulation, fight at the taking away of obediencies: If we complaine with more bitterness, the thing it selfe giues vs leave to speake; for this shield taken away, sacred and profane things are confounded; the gouernment of the Church is B troubled; the censor is taken out of the Priests hands; the wall which diuides the holy Veftry, is broken; and the mysticall oyle of the Tabernacle is spilt.

It relts in your singular iudgement to make choise of Pastors, not according to the ambition of the Court, giuing men to spirituall liuings, and not spirituall liuings to men: By this choise the Church doth thin, thou hast made choise of corner stones to support it; thou hast prouided wise Mariners for this mysticall ship; and now the Order of the Seabees being cleansed, defends the Altars and holy things: Although in this age there are many things required to purge the Church, yet the glory is to be attributed to the hauing aduanced worthy Prelates, so as vertue hath no cause at all to complaine that shee is neglected, the which it may please you for to loue and embrace still, and to prosecute it with honours and rewards, that C may glory and shine in all good arts and discipline. There remains how much wee are grieved, and how iustly we exclaime against Symonie, the payson of spirituall liuings, the reproach and pollution of the Church, Gibezas traffike, possession of spirituall reuenues giuen vnto Lay-men; Alienation of Church-lands, contempt of the Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction, and erroneous appeales, receiued with all impunitie, so as that which was held a great offence, custome hath made it nothing. It is like vnto the Leuitian, or *Iob*es euill spirit, which doth no more lurke in darknesse, but shewes it selfe boldy: these sinnes (like vnto Adams innocent bloud) cry for reuenge. Lewis the Godly hauing polluted himselfe herewith, and straying from the steps of Charles the Great his Father, treading Lawes vnder foot, he was not onely a reproach vnto France, but also a contempt and scorne to his children, whose ralinesse God did reuenge.

That all-piercing eye of heauen, which lookes into the secret sinnes of mortall men, with what an angry countenance doth he behold the holy pledges of the Church, the price of sinners, the godly deuotions, the bread of the hungry, and the cloathes of the naked bestowd vpon Lay-men, and employed to filthy vses, as in the time of the Gentiles by a wicked King in despite of the Christians, Adams Idoll was set in Christs place, the holy Ornaments of the Sanctuary so prophaned, in the banquets of the Kings of Assiria, as the Almighty hand of Heauen did by the learned wall denounce reuenge.

Pardon me, oh King, if I say that Adams Idoll is now set in Christs place, that the holy Ornaments are polluted, the Sanctuary defiled, and the corner stones shaken and pulled E away, if you shall any longer suffer the proposition bread and the holy come to be steele from the Altars by married men, Knights and Souldiers, whose hands are fitter for armes and murders, than for incense and mysticall things.

In the Canticles the mysticall Spouse complaines, that falling amongst souldiers in the night shee was spoiled of her ornaments: The goods of the Church, proceeding from the bounty of religious Kings, may well be taken for the ornaments of the Church: and if you shall suffer her reuenues to be waisted by Courtiers, what is it else, but to abandon the Spouse to be spoiled by souldiers: and although it were with the consent of the Clergy, too indulgent to this mischief, yet there are many reasons which should perswade you not to fauour
 it. Adam as soone as he had tasted of the forbidden fruit did presently blush at his owne na- F kednesse: the reuenues of the Church is like vnto a tree, which God hath forbidden to touch, whose fruits being once gathered, our nakednesse is presently discovered.

There are many things whereof wee might complaine vnto your Maiestie, but lest I should be tedious, I will end with this petition in the name of all the Prelats of the French Church here present, that you will confirme that which hath beene granted to our order, the which hath beene often neglected. Vnto the end your affaires may prosper, that God may blesse you and your Kingdome, and that your Empire may be permanent, and haue no ter-

A ting but the whole world, stretch forth your assisting hand to releue the Church which faints, helpe her, grieve at her misfortune, ease her afflictions, and cure her wounds. Looke vpon so many hundreds of Parishes with pitié, who whereas they feed their flocks with the food of Angels, they scarce eat the bread of mortall men, liuing most hardly, so cold is pitié, and so sparingly they offer vnto God. Wherefore vow vnto God that you will hereafter be a sacrifice vnto him, and labour continually at his Altars, leauing a Testimony to posteritie that Kings should haue a continuall care of the Church and worship of Almightie God.

The Tribes of Israel were forbidden to contract mariage out of their kindred, onely the B Tribe of Iuda had a prerogative, for that it did gouerne the rest, to marrie with the Tribe of Leuie, the which had the Gouernment of the Altar and Priest-hood: By this Simbole the He-brewes did firstly obserue, that the Priest-hood and Gouernment were fitly ioyned. But oh most Christian King! I shall it bee lawfull to speake vnto thee as the Israelites did vnto their King? Flesh of my flesh, blond of my blond, and bones of my bones: Let vs hereafter be one, and an vnindiuied couple: thy weepings are teares to me, thy sobs shall force me to sigh, and being conuer- ted one into another, I can comfort thee with these words: Daughter of Sion full of sorrow, leaue off thy teares, I am he that will free thee of thy sack-cloth and mourning weed, and wipe away thy albes and deformitie, and will make thee shine with Balsamm and sweet smelling ointments.
 And as the Hebrew Daughter-in-law did thus flatter her King; I will that posteritie shall C know that I haue clad thee with Purple and Scares, and enriched thee with the first fruits; thy Sabbaths and Holy-daies haue beene worshipped by me: I haue armed thee with the Target of the strong: I haue girt thy thigh with the sword of Ionathan against thine enemy, which cannot be blunted, being accustomed to be goared with his blond. Giue then oh King! vnto the Church her Rights and Tributes; reioyce with thy mother, who hath called thee her first begotten sonne, and hath giuen thee the first kisse, whom aboute all others the world haue rest in her bosome.
 For so many worthy Titles grant she may bee free. That if Thyameus the Philosopher did sometimes lay of Titus Cesar, Titus did vanquish Iurie, and Appolonius Titus; the Church may speake thus; Henric crowned with victories and happinesse, hath ouerthrowne and conquered all his enemies Armies, but the Church hath vanquished Henric with her teares and D supplications.

I may not forget the reception of the new Bishop of Orleans, being rare and singular aboute all the Prelats of France. Anselme being chosen Bishop the first day of September, he caused a Proclamation to be made, that on the foureteenth of the said moneth, after the ancient manner, he would make his entry into Orleans, promising impunitie to all male-factors, not onely to such as had slaine men accidentally, but euen for premeditated murders, and for all other crimes whatsoever. Thither flocke the most wicked amongst men: On the thirteenth the Bishop lay in the Abbey of Saint Hubert, where the next day the Abbot hauing said Masse, he put on his Mytter and other pontificall ornaments: Staying there, the Chanons of Saint Croix came vnto him, with the Doctors and Officers of the Vniuersitie, E and the Magistrats of the Citie. The Bishop goeth forth bare-footed: being come to Saint Anians Church, the Chanons receiue him, who holding his hands close together, praect that they are free from his iurisdiction: yet they bring him to the Altar, after which, his feet are washed and cleansed, and white shooes of Silke put on: then hauing taken an oath not to attempt any thing against their Rights and Priuiledges, he is carried by foure of the chiefe of them in a chaire without the walls of the Towne, where they call forth foure Barons, who are subiect to the Bishop by their fees, and are euery yeare bound on the day of the Invention of the holy Crosse, to bring foure great Wax lights in forme of gutters, euery one weighing at hundred pound weight. These Barons presented themselves to carie the Bishop, but he of his grace freed them of this seruice. Then the Clergie went before in or-F der: being come to Bourgonie gate, he was met by the President, the Rayle of Orleans, the Lieutenant criminal, and all the Gouernours of the praediall Court. There all male-factors were let out of prison, who with great exclamations cried for mercy. The Bishop commanded the Iaylor so sayd the prisoners were simple, and whether there were any male-factors detained, who being assured that they were freed from bonds, two of them were commanded to goe before all the rest: being come to Saint Croix, the Bishop rung a little bell, and then he made himselfe ready to say Masse, which done he began to pray with the Chanons, the Judges were seated in another room, and all the male-factors in the Bishops hall.

hall. After dinner the Crier being a Divine, makes them a sharpe admonition, and wils them A to live better hereafter: the Bishop confirms his speech: which done, they cried often for mercy. In the end, the Bishop giuing them his blessing, dismissed them with this charge, That they should pay all Fines and the charges of Sutes. Thus by the comming of the new Bishop, there were about an hundred freed from the Gallowes: the parents, children, and widows grieving that they were deprived of all meanes of reuenge.

Father Angelo of Ioyeuse going out of France, had past the Alpes bare-footed, by the commandement of his Superior. At Turin a Feuer tooke him, the which when he felt, being no longer able to goe on foot, he caused himselfe to be carried in a Litter to a religious house of that Order at Riouli. The Duke of Sauoy hearing of his sicknesse, sent his chiefe Physician, and an Apothecarie with all kinds of comfortable things fit for the recovery of his health, and Cooks to dresse his meat, being so carefull of his health, as twice a day he sent men in post to bee aduertised thereof. There was nothing omitted that the art of man could inuent: but the violence of his Feuer did make frustrate all their skill. The tenth day of his sicknesse, being the five and twentieth of September, his soule leaving the prison of his body, went happily to heauen. He died as he liued, not in the Court of Turin, nor in a bed of Downe with rich furniture, but in his garment of haire, and coucht vpon straw, in the prison of his Conuent he left the burthen of his flesh. Renold Walter, one of the Presidents of the Kings great Council, being there by chance to negotiate some businesse for a Prince of the Blood, as he had bene deare vnto him liuing, so he was still by him in his sicknesse, and receiued his last dying words. His body was imbalmed and laid at Riouli, vntill that France his native Country should require it, as it did the yeare following. Walter aduertised the King on the feuen and twentieth of September, of the whole manner of his sicknesse, of his happy end; of the Duke of Sauoy's singular care, and of his last words, by the which he would haue his fatall hour made knowne vnto the Duchesse of Montpensier his Daughter by father Joseph of the same familie. So the good father did fore-see his daughter might receive the easier wound: he knew well that Joseph was an excellent Artift to pacifie minds thus plunged in sorrow, and without doubt he did much mollifie the bitterness of this fatall message.

Inundation of the River of Loire.

The River of Loire did this Autumne swell so suddenly, as breaking the banks it overflowed the whole Countrey with strange whirl-pooles, rooting vp corne, woods, and old Trees, drowning herds of cattle, and overflowing houses and farmes, or whatsoever withstood the rage of it. At Blois, Amboise and other townes, the arched bridges being broken, and the river swelling suddenly, many were drowned. The Duke of Suilly receiued great losse by this inundation: when as he feared nothing that the violence of the River should any way hurt his castle standing vpon Loire, behold it swels suddenly with such whirl-pooles, as it overthrow some towers of the castle which were very strong. Some Countrymen were seen escaping vpon tables, some climbing vp trees, and to the tops of mountaines, and some by swimming laboured to flee death. And to speake in a word, all was Sea. The ruine and spoile it made, mans wit could not estimate, the which was fatal to the husbandmen for many yeares, their fields being so spoiled with stones, land, and bulhes, as they could not cleane them but with an incredible charge: for the River arising out of the Mountaines of Auvergne, fragments of Rocks came rolling downe, which made the land barren: much vnlike to the River of Nile, whose mud doth make their fields fat, whereupon the Country-men say, Egypt is fertile without raine.

Duke of Nevers sent to the Pope.

The most Christian King sent an honorable Ambassage to Pope Paul the fifth, to acknowledge his obedience, by Charles of Gonzaga Duke of Nevers. Having made great preparations at Paris for his journey, and taken his leave of the King, he came to Marcellies, where he was transported with his whole traine in feire of the Kings Gallies; and landed at Samona, from whence he went to Genoua, where the Duke and Common-wealth receiued him with great honor, sending forth troops of Soldiers to meet him: being come into the citie, he was brought into the Senate by foure Senators, sat in the highest seat, & had leave to giue his voice. Having giuen thanks to the Genouois, he went on his journey, and came to Cinis-vecchia, (a towne belonging to the Church) where the Popes officers receiued him with a piously entertainment, and that nothing might be wanting, Fabio Gonzaga the Duke of Mantoua's Lieutenant, with many other Noblemen, came to congratulate his coming at their departure, he presented them with a great Chain of Gold, the which they refused, nor in disdain of him that offered it, but humbly desired no reward from the Kings Ambassadors but his loue.

A The Duke proceeding on his journey, he was met by Monsieur de Breuil, the Kings Ambassador resident at Rome, the Marquis of Malateba, the Bishop of Abrincentes, Marchmont, and all the French Nobility which was then in the City. Greeting neere to Rome, there went forth to meet him, the Duke of Carpineta, the Marquis of Pallaucino, and Marke Anthony Victorio the Popes Nephew, whom the Duke of Nevers did much respect; him hee tooke into his Caroch, and entertained him very familiarly. The Cardinals stood at the entry of the City to receiue the Duke, with the Archbishops and other chiefe Prelates: the Pope had sent forth trumpets, and troupes of horse, with his Guards and an hundred Suisses (being in all two thousand armed men) to guard him. The Duke of Nevers was accompanied with about three hundred of the French Nobility, all mounted vpon Genets of Spaine, Barbary horses, and courfers of Naples. He entered the City by the gate, which goes to Castle Saint Angelo: after the shooting off of the Ordnance, there was all sorts of musick: the windowes were full of Senators, Gentlemen and Ladies, and the streets pesterd with people: having rested himselfe two daies, he had audience of the Pope, and deliuered the Kings letters, the which being read, he was brought vnto Saint Peters Palace, where he was lodged with the French Ambassadors at the Popes charges. The feasting being ended, he had a second audience, treating of matters of great importance; then after much honour done him by the Pope he returned.

There was a troupe of desperate theues, which did wonderfully annoy the Prouinces of C Poitou, Aniou, Britaine, and the neighbour Countreies with their murders and spoiles, whose infoleny and power was such, as they durst encounter the Prouost Marhall with their armed Archers, who being too weake, these theues (who were called Guilleris of their Leader) had free liberty to continue their theueing: being accustomed in the ciuill warres to cruelty and theft, having no meanes to eatearne their licentious life at home in peace, they returned to their former villanies. They drew into woods and ynouth places, Bankrupts, Forgers, men branded for villanies, Rascals, Theeues, and the scumme of all the world. They say that Guilleris the elder brother (for there were two of them) shewed some greatness in his theueing, for if he did change to meet any poore passenger, he took nothing from him, but gaue the poore man so much as he thought would suffice his journey. If a rich man fell into his hands, and had no present money for his redemption, he would take his Bill, and so dismiss him, with this charge, that if he failed to make payment, at the day appointed, he would remit no kinde of cruelty to befringed of their breach of promise. This elder Guilleris did so despise them that sought after him, as he would often mocke them. He came into an Inne, whereas the Prouost Marhall of Rheims with his Archers was lodged, alighting from his horse, hee sat downe with them, and entertained them with discourses and playing at Dice, till it was very late: rising early in the morning, having payed for his and their charges, he willed his host to tell the Prouost and his Archers, that they were improuident, seeking in vaine for Guilleris, with whom they had supped the last night, who hauing wonne their money at Dice, had paid for their supper. Hence you may coniecture what a bold and vndunted these this Guilleris was: But now let us see what denne this Guilleris lodged, in a deepe Valley, and in the furthest part of a thicke wood, hauing no ordinary passage vnto it, where he had built him a lodge like vnto a Fort. Having taken a Gentleman of good note, he brings him thither blindfold, being in pain, he betwixes him all his theifs store of victuals, and a good armory with a wall, rampier and ditch to repell force: Having dined with him in denne, he dismisseth him, taking an oath that he should not bewray what hee had seene: he keeping his faith, for that he could not discover what hee had not seene; yet he observed the wood, and all the passages, and by this means they went into the Minotaur, who could not bee drawne forth but by a siege, and so into the said peace. Seeing himselfe inuironed by the Prouost Marhall, the Nobility, and the whole Countrey, and prest with smoke, fire, and sword, going forth with his horse men, he takes thorow the thickest Troupes, but being kept backe by their shot, hee forced them unwillingly to kill him; for that hee thought death to be better than that pest him. The youngest brother and about three score others were taken, the rest escaped, who finding no saluage land became Pyrats: the captiues were carried to Rome, and from thence to Rochell, where they were broken vpon the wheele, and executed according to their merites and deserts.

This month, that voyce was sometimes called the Millers bridge was finished and began to be passable: The which was drowned in the River, is now made more beautifull, from ruine and shipwracke, it hath received increase and glory: being before contemptible for the A safe vie, it is now famous for the worthy trades: being despised before for the ruinous houses, it is now glorious for the uniformity of the building, losing the antiquity and the name both together: it hath not his name from milles and grinding, but from the flapes of birds which distinguish the houses, or from the builder, as passengers may obserue by these two Verses:

Pons olim submersus aquis, nunc mole re surge, Mercator fecit, nomen ex ipse dedit.

I was a bridge late drown'd with flood, now rais'd in richer frame, Marchant was he that made the worke, and gaue the worke his name.

But now hearken to an admirable and bloudy fact, proceeding from blinde loue: Peter
Arrices Bourdeus, a Spaniard borne, an Augustine Monke, being for his great learning made publike Professor of Diuinitie at Tholose, before all his competitors: who besides his scholership, exceeded all others in preaching of the Word, honesty of life, and sincerity of manners. In the presidiall Court there was an old Councillor called Franciscus Geraldus, an obseruer of the Law, free from fraud, and of good fame; but mans life is not knowne but by the last act. Both being austere in their manners and behaviour, fall in loue with a young maid:
she was borne in Portugal, and came to Tholose with her father and Familie: her name was Violantilla of Castro, whose bewitching eyes and alluring countenance had set on fire the weake and decayed Councillor, and this Stoicall Monke. Neither doth loue disdain white haire, nor withered cheekes; and although loues fire doth flame in this old man, yet he ioynees with the Monke, they diuide Violantillas loue and embracings betwixt them, and onely these two Coriuals agree together, admitting no other competitor: they had both one care, to enioy the wench with equall liberty. In the end they thought it fit to hide the stolne and vnchaste fire vnder the ashes of wedlocke. Geraldus hee procures the marriage, with a young Advocate borne in a towne neere to Tholose; the marriage is concluded and consummated, and these two Solicitors pay the dowrie. The feast being ended, the new spouse resolves to carry his wife home to his friends; these two Sutors repining at it, especially Geraldus, who promised to procure him many Clients in the Court of Parliament of Tholose, or at the least in the presidiall Court. But he (whether finding himself vnfit for the City eloquence, or doubting of his wifes honesty, by reason of these iuuals) stood firme in his resolution to carry her to his owne home. But they forming at the departure of the woman, for that the marriage procured for their stolne loue, had not succeeded according to their intents, they study how to draw them backe to Tholose. Geraldus follows the married couple, he feasts there with them a moneth together, and perswades them to returne to the City; but finding his words to be of no force, he returns much grieued at the husbands imperious command, relating to Bourdeus, the mans austere disposition, and the poore womans seruitude: they consult how they may recouer their old louses, and take away the mans life. To attempt it by poison they thought it not safe, they therefore resolved to doe it by the sword: and to the end it might bee the more easily effected, they call the husband to Tholose, vnder colour of a suit which was then in question. Geraldus agrees with a Scholler, or rather a murderer called Candelas; and another named Eshaldas, to kill him; and pates them halfe the price of this wicked bargain. The vnfortunate husband, being ignorant of the plot, came to Tholose, and was invited to a solemne feast by Geraldus: the guests were Bourdeus, Candelas, and Eshaldas, where their fare was great, and their entertainment in shew answerable: after supper Bourdeus retires himselfe; and the rest went forth to walke, being in the heat of Iuly: in the meane time Geraldus entertained the husband with a long discourse vntill it was late, left the light should bewray the murderers: at length being darke, hee was let forth, and loone after was taken and led into solitary and vnknowne places, where he was murdered with many wounds. The perswader of this murder hearing thereof, cries out that his friend and guest had bene let vpon by Thieves; who seeking to take away his purse, and he resisting, had slaine him: Hee sent for the Officers of the City, and the Captaine of the Watch. Eshaldas swearing, and testifying the truth of the fact, was taken flying, the dead body was brought into the Towne house, the Monke hearing that one of these murderers was apprehended, hee resolved to sic presently with Candelas

1609

A Candelas the diuine murderer, going without his Frocke to Tonius a towne held by them of the Religion. Being still tormented with the testimony of his owne conscience, hee demanded of a Minister, whether hee might safely remaine there? But being doubtful of his life, he presently fled to Millan, and from thence he went to Nismes. This mans flight, and the casting away of his professed habit, made the Court to hold him guilty of the fact, sending forth letters to apprehend the Monke. The President Verdun giues charge to the Prouost Marshall to make diligent search after them, the Monke was apprehended at Nismes, where they of the Religion tooke him from the publike Magistrate, pretending that hee was of the Religion; that hee was maliciously accused for that cause, and that hee could not be tried but by the Chamber of the Edict, wherein they preuailed so much, as he was deliuered to the Iudges of the said Chamber, both Courts contending for their right.

The President Verdun having by his letters informed the King of this controuersie, there was at length a Decree made by the Kings priuie Counsell, by the which the capital question was referred to the Court of Parliament of Tholouse; they of the Religion complaining that the Edict was broken. At the length Bourdeus and Candelas being taken out of prison from the Chamber of the Edict, were brought bound to Tholouse, the Court was diuided vpon Bourdeus triall, some concluding for his present death, others requiring a stay, vntill that Candelas (being put to the racke) should discouer the whole matter: But in the end they resolved not to protract his punishment any longer. Bourdeus hearing his sentence read, and seeing the Racke before him, he laid open the whole matter as we haue reported it: He accused the Countessour as the perfwader and companion of the murder, having with him pated the murderers for the fact. He commends the Court for the equity of their iudgement, and giues God thanks, who by a momentary punishment had recalled him from a sinke of sinne and heresie, whereunto hee was running, hauing fled to them of the Religion only with hope of impunity: hee accused Candelas and Eshaldas, that with their blou-dy hands they had done this premeditated villany. He was carried to execution with teares in his eyes, and a contrite heart, derelicting much the fact: passing by the Augustines, hee staid awhile exhorting his fellow Monkes to a more holy life, and entreating them to pardon him, for that he had so much defiled their Order by this foule fact: and being come to the place of execution he made a long Prayer, and so had his head cut off, and his body quartered.
After the Monkes execution, the Councillor denies the fact to oblatinately, as if hee would haue all men beleue he had bene free from this wickedness: he was put to the racke, yet the bitternesse of the paine could not draw a word from him: remaining thus wilfully silent, the first President by a witty fiction, and without any force, wrested the truth from him, he threat-ned him that his sonne should be tortured: to whom the father answered, that his sonne had not defered it; that he was an innocent and altogether ignorant of the fact; then being urged to declare the matter and to free him from the present danger, the father was more moued with a fatherly affection, then with all their torments, confessing himselfe to be guilty, that he might free his sonne from danger; who relating all as Bourdeus had done, was condemned to the like punishment. Bourdeus was executed the fifth of February, Geraldus the twelfth, Candelas the thirteenth, Eshaldas the fourteenth, and Violantilla the sixteenth, being the onely cause of the adultery and murder. She comming to the place of execution, made this speech vnto the company.

O you that assist at this fatal spectacle, to you my friends I speake: Having obtained con-fiancy from God to suffer death, I doe now treat the helpe of your prayers at my approaching end: Learne by my vnfortunate mischance, how deceitfull and fraile vanity is; behold I am she who euen now abused with the alluring baits of Beauty, desisting others, presented my selfe before all, thinking that for beauty and wit not any one did equal me. But see the fruits of vanity and pride which I now reape. The enticing baits of the world, bankers, dancing, and such like follies did bewitch me, and haue forced me to act this fatal Scene, an eternall reproach in respect of the world, but to God-ward a testimony of a contrite and penitent heart. I giue him thanks, whom it may be in some other kinde of death I should haue forgotten. These are the fruits of my youths wantonness: hauing not past the age of six and twenty yeeres, I die a scorne to the world: But I would to God in the beginning of my being, that my cradle and funerall had bene inseparable. O fortunate and happy death! if my life had bene longer it had bene more wicked; and more yeeres had increased my sins,

Death of the Duke of Cleues.

This yeere in March the Duke of Cleues hauing languished long of sicknesse, hoping of some recovery, was intercepted by death, going a hunting, to the great griefe both of his C subiects and neighbours, for that dying without children, he should leaue a doubtfull contention to them that pretended the inheritance, which did seeme to threaten warre and desolation: the sparkles which did shew vpon his death, gaue cause to feare a great fire, as you shall after heare.

Discourse of Terrail's apprehension and execution.

I must now relate vnto you an enterprize vpon Geneva, made by Lewis of Combourfier, Seigneur of Terrail, and other places, Vicount of Ranell, Knight of the Order, Cornet to the Dauphin, and Baron of Moyllac, being executed there the ninth of Aprill. About three yeeres since there was intelligence giuen, that Terrail being much discontented, that the Spaniards had not assisted him well in his enterprizes in the Low countries, foreseeing that in the end they would ruine him, he gaue it out that he would serue the Gobet (for so he called the D Duke of Sauoy) laying openly that he had a notable enterprize vpon Geneva. Soone after he came to Paris, vpon colour to recouer the Kings fauour, but they were aduertised that hee should come into Sauoy. His desseignes were then disappointed by the murder which hee committed in the Louvre before the King, who treated of his peace with the Gentleman whom hee slue: so as to flie the Kings indignation, he returned to the Arch-duke, where hee remained, vntill that he undertooke a voyage to Loreto with La Basside, an Engineer, whom he had taken to assist him in his executions. They went on foot, and in their returne had conference with the Duke of Sauoy. Notwithstanding that the Earle of Fuentes had disswaded Terrail, telling him that the Duke would ingage him in his enterprizes against Geneva, and that it would be his ruine. At which time the Duke imparted vnto Terrail and his man, his E desseignes vpon Geneva: from which time they continued in Sauoy, hauing made two voyages to that effect to Thurin. They of Geneva grew presently into ialousie, hauing had sundry aduertisements of a great and almost inuisible enterprize against them, managed by Terrail: being in this perplexity, God sent them some more light, the which did serue them as a meane to enter into the ground of the businesse, and to consult Terrails man, and afterwards himselfe. Hauing played at Tennis at Chambery, and being hot, he retired himselfe into a Chamber, where lying vpon a bed, a seruant of the Tennis-court aying a shirt, he saw La Basside and some others, present a Paper to Terrail, (which was a plot of the towne of Ge-neua) discourring secretly as of affaires of importance. This seruant hearing them name some of the Forts of Geneva, gaue more attentive care, and perceived for certaine that they F deuised of some enterprize against the towne, hearing Terrail (after a long discourse) make no difficulty, but of the meanes to draw a sufficient number of men together for this enterprize:
 wherein being satisfied by the Assistants, he said openly: They are taken, they cannot avoid it. This being vnderstood by the young man, he hauing a brother in the Garrison of Geneua, and desirous to saue him from this danger, went and discovered all to a Burgesse of Ge-neua, who was then at Chambery. This Burgesse made a faithfull report vnto the Magistrates of Geneva, and to the young mans brother, from which time they set spies to obserue Terrails

1609 A Terrails actions. In the end they were aduertised that they were past the mountaines, conferred with the Duke of Sauoy; and that he returned by the Lake Leman, whereof they aduertised them of Berne, sending all the markes of Terrail, and intreating them to seize vpon his person if he past thorow the Country. The which they had expressely commanded, hauing notice of the D. of Sauoys practises against Geneva, their Ally, and against their owne Country. It happened at the same time, that a Deacon of Yuerdun, a towne belonging to the Ber-nois, neere to the Frontier of the County of Bourgondy, being at Geneva, came to salute the second Syndic of the Towne, and brought him letters. After some other discourse, hee acquainted him with the aduertisements they had receiued, of the enemies enterprizes against Geneva, and the country of Berne, but especially vpon the towne of Yuerdun, a place very important, being the key of the country ioyning vpon Bourgondie: hee gaue him also the markes of Terrails person, whose picture they had gotten at Geneva, doubting that he himselfe would come to view the towne. Some daies after Terrail returning from Thurin, he past the lake, but with some ill preface by the falling of his mans horse into the water, which made him in a manner resolute vpon his returne, yet in the end being perswaded by his man he passed on, he came into the Country of Berne, but not into any frequented places: passing thorow their Country, he diligently obserued the places of most importance, neuer lodging in any towne, but in villages, hamlets and peasants houses, vntill hee came to Yuerdun, where he stayed not, but passing the bridge he found the Bailiffe and others, whom he saluted, but they obserued him not. Hauing past the bridge, seeming to stay for some other cause, he turned towards Yuerdun, and viewed the situation and defences of the place: the which was well noted by them that were yet vpon the bridge, thinking simply that hee had staid vpon some other occasion: but hauing past a little further, the forelaide Deacon being in a Garden, saw him come a farte off, and hauing obserued his countenance, he beganne to doubt that it was Terrail, and the better to discouer him, knowing that hee was bald, he made him a low courtesie, to moue him to vncouer, the which hee did, and the Deacon being now assured, ran speedily to the Bailiffe, deliuering his opinion. All the Assistants which had noted the countenance of the man to haue turned, and obserued the place, perswaded the Bailiffe to send after him, the which hee did by two men onely, who should obserue what course hee tooke; that if he went not toward Bourgondy, they should returne without any further pursue, but if he went that way, they should follow him to his lodging, without making shew of anything, and obserue particularly the markes which hee gaue them of his person. There hapned another act of Gods providence, Terrail hauing past a village called Villebois, which is within halfe an houres iourney of Bourgondy, meaning to lodge that night in the Country, passing thorow a quag-mire, where his horse being mired, he returned and went ouer a plank; vpon the which his horse stumbling hurt himselfe, which made him halt: this made him resolve to lodge that night at Villebois. Being lodged there, the two which were sent from Yuerdun, obserued him diligently, and one of them returned speedily to carry newes to the Bailiffe: who presently sent foure horsemen led by the Capitaine of Yuerdun to bring him backe, giuing them charge also to require aid of the Peasants: arriving in the morning, they found Terrail ready to goe to horse, to whom the host and others being aduertised of the fact, had said that hee could not passe the mountaines, where there were two great guards, which staid all men that had not giuen account to the Bailiffe of Yuerdun. This was confirmed by them that came in the morning, and although that La Basside stormed at this affront, yet Terrail seemed willing to returne to Yuerdun, with 4. or 6. horse, whom hee might haue demanded, if he had foreseene his calamity. After his intention, he repented him often that hee had not shewed his great courage at that time: but God blinded him, for from that time hee shewed the signes of valour or deuerty, whereby he might often haue escaped, as wee shall see. Being returned to Yuerdun, and intreated by the Bailiffe who was wily and of great F experience, he answered, that he was a Gentleman of Dauphiny, called Pas of Comans, and that he went into Loreto to follow a suite, which did import him much, intreating the Bailiffe to dispatch him presently. Hee was hauing no greater ground, bred more iea-lousie in the Bailiffe, so hee resolved to seize vpon his person, vntill hee had better aduice:
 whereupon he demanded his sword, the which hee deliuered, and caused him to be lodged in an Inn very carefully guarded by foure men. Among other causes to breed suspicion, being at Villebois, seeing that he must returne, and that there was no meane to escape, the passages being guarded, he called for a Candle, with the which he burnt a long letter written on both

both sides. Being demanded thereon, he answered that it was a letter written to Monsieur de A Creguy from his kin-foman, to be a mediator vnto his Maieſty for him; the which hee ſtill maintained, and that he burnt it, left his name and quality ſhould be knowne. The Bailiffe for his better ſatisfaction ſent preſently to Geneua, to haue ſome one that knew Terrail: to whom they ſent one of the Magiſtrates of the towne and a ſouldier, who had ſerued vnder Terrail in the Low-countries, and had giuen many aduertisements of his enterpriſes, whereof he had the knowledge from his owne mouth, by the means of ſome of his ſervants. Theſe two being come to Yuerdun, it was held good the ſouldier ſhould enter ſuddenly into the lodging, where Terrail was at ſupper: he enters, and at the firſt ſits downe at the table without making ſhew of any thing. Terrail ſeeing him, was much troubled, ſeeming to be very ill, and deſiring them to warme his bed: thus he retired to his Chamber much diſmaied, whether he ſent for the ſaid ſouldier, whom hee entertained very courteouſly, intreating him to tell if he were not ſent to diſcover him, the which the ſouldier hauing iuſtified, he began to vſe ſtrange ſpeeches vnto him: That he knew not why they of Geneua did malice him: That he had had diuers aduertisements from Chambery, that they laid wait for him at Geneua: And that they would employ the ſaid ſouldier to diſcover him: That he ſhould die a gallant Knight and an innocent. That the Earle of Fuentes, the King of Spaine, and the Arch-duke would reuenge his death: That he neuer had had to doe with the Duke of Sauoy, who he ſaid was an vnworthy and an ingratefull maſter, wiſneſſe the end of Albion. He beganne to ſuborne the ſaid ſouldier to helpe him to eſcape, promiſing him a thouſand crownes, if with all ſpeed he would write to the Earle of Fuentes, and goe into Bourgoyny, to the Earle of Charite, to aduertife him of his extreme danger. And La Baſſide would haue delivered the ſaid ſouldier an hundred crownes, which he reſuſed. Terrail intreated him to reſume early in the morning, for that he had matters of importance to deliuer vnto him. In the meane time the Bailiffe being aduertised of the truth, & finding it not fit the ſouldier ſhould confer any more with him, cauſed him with his man to be conueyed to the Caſtle, where they were lodged a part, and well guarded. They of Geneua hauing notice of his detention, the Councell reſolved to ſend to the Seigneurs of Bearne to demand him, giuing the charge to one of the Sindics of the towne, who being firſt heard in the Councell of Burgundie, he let them underſtand the great and iuſt grounds they had at Geneua, to deſire to haue Terrail: that they had certaine proofes of his practices: that the wiſneſſes which they had at Geneua, could not be without danger transported: that the cauſe of both Townes alſyed was common: that the enterpriſes concerned them inſeparably; that in the like caſe, they at Geneua had deliuered priſoners to Bearne: that the Kings men not long ſince had granted them a priſoner for the like attempt: that the conſequence would be very great to diuers undertakers, if they ſaw they could not without danger come about Geneua. In the end, the party Councell of Bearne, being perplexed in this buſineſſe, aſſembled the great Councell of ſix hundred, where the like matters being propounded with vehemency, it was generally concluded, that Terrail ſhould be deliuered into their hands with his ſervant and goods. The Kings Ambaſſador reſiding at Soluerre, did greatly allow of this reſolution.

The aduice of this grant being come to Geneua, they vſed wonderfull diligence and denity to perſwade his brother (which dwells in the Towne of Chambery) to goe thither to fetch him with goodly promiſes: the which hee eſteemed faithfully and ſpeedily, ſo that in three daies he was at Geneua, and did ſerue much in the diſcovery. They alſo ſent the Souldier which had knowen Terrail to Monsieur de Lyons, where they knew that he was a ſouldier which had ſometimes bene his horſe-keeper, and had heard his ſpeeches touching the enterpriſes of Geneua, the which he had oftentimes told to Balsine (which dwells at Chambery, his name of Geneua) but the horſe-keeper was abſent: but the ſaid Balsine ſent his brother ſouldier at Lyons, his Camerado, who aſſured him that he ſaid horſe-keeper had ſent conferred with him of this buſineſſe, whereof the ſaid Balsine took an othe by a Notaries hand. Terrail was deliuered to the Sindic of Geneua, and conſidered with a guard from Yuerdun to Morges, a little towne ſeated vpon the Lake Lemani. B. Jergues from Geneua, where hee was deliuered in guard to the Bailiffe of Morges, ſayd they ſhould ſend for him to Geneua by water. This was done by a Decree of the great Councell of Bearne; with this proviso, that before he went out of their territories, they ſhould ſeize them ſeuerall vnder the Seale of Geneua, that it was done without prejudice to their iuriſdiction, & of antient grace and cuſtome. Terrail was brought alone from Yuerdun, his ſervant remaining behind, left they ſhould conferre:

A ferre: vpon the way he vſed ſtrange ſpeeches to the Sindic, asking him often, of what death will ye make me to die at Geneua? he ſeemed to feare much to be deliuered into the Kings hands, for which he had changed his name & faſhion: that the King hauing him he will keepe him long in the Baſtile, whereas being farre off, he might make his peace with greater aduantage, yet ſince feeling himſelfe taken, he ſaid he had no will to fall into the hands of them of Geneua, but to be deliuered to the King, hoping by this meanes to make his peace very eaſily. He ſaid alſo, that he had diſſwaded the Duke of Sauoy from the enterpriſe of Geneua: but with ſuch frivolous reaſons, as they might eaſily ſee they were inuented of purpoſe. Being at Morges, he ſo bewitched the Bailiffe with goodly words and promiſes, as he reſuſed him to them that came the next day to fetch him to Geneua by water, giuing Terrail meanes to eſcape, if God had not deprived him both of courage and iudgement. There were ſome of M. Des Diguiers men which paſt by Morges, entreating the Bailiffe to keepe him vntill hee had a new warrant from Bearne, whither they went to that end: there was a weake guard in Morges, he had the liberty of the Caſtle, and meanes to ſpeake with whom he pleaſed, and to write to his friends, hauing ſent a very artificiall and paſſionate petition to the Seigneurs of Bearne. Hee had alſo won the fauour of the people of Morges, by his good behauiour, iuſtifications and bounty, ſo as if there had come but twenty reſolute men to his reſcue, he had bin ſafe, and this had bin eaſie to execute; the like in this place being but 3. little French leagues ouer, and right againſt Morges, all being the Dukes, if he had the aſſurance to haue gone out of the Caſtle, he had eſcaped by the means of them of Morges it ſelfe, ſo much they fauoured him. They of Geneua ſent ſpeedily to Bearne to complaine, and to re-demand him, the which was confirmed with much indignation againſt the Bailiffe of Morges, who before any answer made to the Seigneurs of Geneua, had receiued letters of inunction, commanding him ſpeedily to deliuer Terrail vnto them, the which he was forced to doe. For which contempt the Bailiffe was in diſgrace, and there were preſumptions, that Terrail had promiſed him ten thouſand Crownes to keepe him from going to Geneua, or at the leaſt that his man might not come: the which the Bailiffe had promiſed faithfully, hoping to effectuall by the means of his great credit and alliance, but ſell out otherwiſe. The Earle of Fuentes, the Catholike Cantons, and Terrails kin-fmen laboured much at Bearne to ſaue him, but ſome came too late.

D He that was ſent from the Earle of Fuentes, was entertained till the afternoone without audience, vntill that Terrail was deliuered into the hands of them of Geneua. The Seigneurs of Bearne did carry themſelues very affectionate and zealous in this action. Terrail was conducted in an armed Frigate: vpon the way one of the chiefe of the Towne which did accompanie him, entertained him with very honourable and kinde words: That if he would declare that which concerned the ſafety of the Towne, he promiſed him in the name of the Seigneurie, pardon, liberty, courteous vſage, and interceſſion to the King: but he denied all, yet he was much perplexed, ſaying that he was no man of iron, and if they put him to the Racke he ſhould ſpeake any thing. Being come to Geneua the fourteenth of Aprill about midnight, he was lodged in the Towne-houſe well guarded. The next day being ſent for to the Councell, they did in like manner let him know how deſirous they were to ſaue him, requiring him to ſpeake freely, and to helpe himſelfe, for that they had ſufficient in their hands to conuict him, promiſing him liberty and all good vſage, if he would voluntarily declare the buſineſſe. This was repeated about ten times vnto him: but ſill he perſiſted in the negatiue, with great execrations and oaths, ſo as in the end they told him, that ſeeing he would not ſaue himſelfe, there was no more grace for him. Whereupon they cauſed him to answer criminally, vſing ſome rough ſpeeches vnto him, which amazed him much: being confronted by Balsine the Souldier, he denied all, yea that which was moſt apparent, ſo as they began by his doubtfull answers to diſcover the whole truth. On Munday morning being the 17 of Aprill, he was led from the Towne-houſe to the priſon: about the ſame time the ſaid Sindic with a Secretarie of the State, brought his man from Yuerdun to the priſon, and preſently brought him to his answer, cauſing the young man of Chambery to ſee him, from whom they had their beſt intelligence, who hauing viewed him, affirmed confidently that this was the man which had preſented the paper to Terrail, and had vſed the above-mentioned ſpeeches vnto him: This young man being examined apart, what appeared La Baſſide did weare then, he told what hee had ſcene, the which La Baſſide did confeſſe, but he denied the paper and the ſpeeches, and ſo did Terrail. In the end, ſeeing that the young man did conſtantly maintaine his ſaying, it was reſolved that La Baſſide ſhould be put to the Racke; who having endured the strappado twice, being ready to be put to it the third time, he said he would A confesse all. This resolution to put him to the Racke, was also grounded vpon another occasion; for that a Burgeisse of Geneva hauing by chance seene La Basside the same day in the Court of the prison, did witness that he slept one night with him in a neere Village, and that in the morning the host had told him, that La Basside had handled many maps and plots of Fortification, before he parted, so he was knowne by the host to be an Enginer, to whom he confessed it, and yet in prison he denied all. After La Basside confession, he was confronted with Terrail, who began to disauow him, but La Basside persisted in his confession, whereupon Terrail being presented the Racke, with teares in his eyes he confessed the whole act voluntarily, and had no torture: The French King, and the Estates of the waied Prouinces, B were presently aduertised of that which did concerne them. La Basside confessed that he was an Enginer, hauing long serued the Arch-Dukes, that since he had given himselfe to Terrail, to execute the enterprise of Geneva, and that he had sometimes beene a scholler. He was gallant of his person, and cunning in matter of fortification. That about foure or five moneths past, returning from pilgrimage with his Master, passing by Thurin, the Duke discoursed with them, both of Geneva, & of the great desire he had to be master thereof, demanding their aduice: he refused to assaile it, not by sieg or open force, but by enterprise, wherein they offered him their seruice, the which he accepted, with many thanks and promises, giuing to Terrail 700. Duckers, and a Jewell of 300. crownes price, and to La Basside 280. Philips Dollors. To effect this desire, the Duke gaue them charge to view the gates, Guard, Port, and C state of the Towne, whereupon La Basside undertooke to goe into the towne, where hauing viewed all, he brought vnto the Duke a plot of all that which had bin reformed in the fortification, since the Scalado, according to the which, the Duke did renew his ancient plot. That Terrail and La Basside going to Thurin, they could not agree vpon the meanes of the enterprise, Terrail inclining to surpris a gate with a petard or otherwise, and La Basside shewing that it was a matter of infinite danger, by reason of the great number of defences which were at the gates, and their carefull guard. After some dispute, the Duke inclined to La Basside's opinion, to attempt the Port, where there was not so strict a guard, and the which being sur-prized by a sufficient number of men, they should be in the heart of the towne, and could not be in danger before they were entred: the which being executed, La Basside made no difference D ty, to accomplish the enterprise, being very easie (as he said) to seize vpon the Port de Rine, which was neere. Terrail hauing heard all, yeelded to his opinion, and went with La Basside to passe the Lake about Euian, where he remained eight daies, informing himselfe particularly, from all the Water-men which went to Geneva, touching the disposition, guides, and defences of the Port, visiting of boats and other things belonging to the navigation of the Lake, by whom he discovered many errors in the Guard: and to be the better assured, he caused La Basside to goe ouer the Lake to Morges, to the end that he might passe in one of the Barkes of Geneva, which on certaine daies goe thither to market, and obserue the state of the port, and enter into Geneva without ialousie; the which he performed so cunningly as no man suspected him. The like spie had bin taken some two yeeres before, hauing grossly visited the chaines, who being amazed, and wauering in his answer, confest by force that he had bin sent to view the place, not knowing any more of the enterprise, nor who had sent him, for the which he was hanged. Some thinke he was of Terrail's faction. From that time they had fortified the fort with another ranke of double chaines, but that did not serue to warrant them against this last enterprise. Terrail and La Basside (who returned vnto him by land) hauing againe visited the Port of Rine, by the which he past, he returned to the Duke, assuring him of the certainty and facility of the enterprise, taking vpon them to be the Leaders and conductors of the execution. The enterprise was plotted after this manner: Terrail and the D. had made their desseigne to provide 4. or 5. great flat-bottomed boats, such as doe usually carry wood vnto the towne, especially in May, when as they make their prouision, and to lodge vnder the wood 150. or 200. chesse men in euery boat, the which should approach without suspicion, for that their counterfeited water-men should be attired like vnto them of Geneva. As for the search which was heretofore made within the towne, they did not regard it, hauing resolved to kill the searchers suddenly, & to leape all together out of their boats: they should at an instant gather their troups together, farre from the commerce of them of Geneva, and at a prefxed time (ship them, when as they should see a favourable Northern wind arise. Terrail should be in the first boat, and the D. or his eldest son in the last. The first exploit being done,

A the D. or his son should also haue other troups, especially horsemen ready, the which might well be drawne together, vnder colour of the D. of Nemours marriage, which should be celebrated at Amilly in Sauoy, 8 leagues from Geneva: and although the day of the said marriage did cause some difficulty, yet they had so many other encounters, as they held the enterprise infallible: the facility was, in that they might imbarke them secretly, a favourable wind carrying them in a quarter of the time that is required by land: they thought that 500. men or more being entred, would be able to slay all the people, & seize vpon the Canon at the Port, and also at the Port de Rine, by the which the Duke or his son should enter with their landtroups. The enterprise was appointed at such a time, when as the towne seemed to be most vnarmed, by reason of their country labours, & at dinner time when it seemed euery man retires himselfe. They haue confest also (since their condemnation) that their voyage thorow the Country of Bearne, was to obserue it, for the pursuing of their victory, after the taking of Geneva: for although the D. entred alone into this enterprise, and that the Earle of Fuentes had not discouraged himselfe to be of the party: yet Terrail said, that the D. had assured him, that the Spaniards which were in Sauoy, had commandement to follow and obey him, as he pretended in this enterprise. Terrail went into the Low-countries to take his leaue of the Archduke, to retire such meanes as he had yet remaining there, & to bring some of the best executioners that he could finde, with some Mariners. He and La Basside agreed both in their confessions, being examined apart, wherby they had drawne from them the grounds of the enterprise, against the which they themselves did afterwards giue them direction to defend themselves, especially Terrail made a draught in paper of the meanes how to preferre any Port from the Pottard: he said, that the D. was so bent vpon this execution, that notwithstanding his imprisonment, if they kept the confessions close, & gaue it out that he had not discovered any thing, but continued in prison still, vntill that time, the Duke would continue his enterprise, and might be easily taken both he and his son: but this was a forged meanes to delay his punishment, and to giue time to the intercessions which he knew would be made for him, by his kinsmen of Dauphiné, the expedient also was too dangerous. Being demanded if they knew not that it was a capitall crime, to make like desseignes in a time of full peace, & sworn and well obserued, the which they both confessed freely: Terrail desired that he might be kept in alle between 4. walls, and La Basside intreated, that they would not make him lose his soule by some cruel punishment: being both condemned, La Basside disposed himselfe to die with a constant resolution: being vpon the ladder, he said vnto the Spectators; My masters I pray you pardon me, I am more ioyfull to die here ignominiously, then if the enterprise which I had in hand had succeeded: pray vnto God for me that he will pardon me, for the loue of his soune, who shed his blood vpon the crosse for me and for all true repentants. Terrail was condemned to lose his head vpon the place of Molard, where he was executed the 19. of Aprill, and La Basside was hanged at the same place the 21. They both died very resolutely, especially Terrail, who neuer changed his countenance, neither shewed any gesture vnworthy of his fore-passed life: La Basside was much grieved that torture had made him accuse Terrail, of whose death he vnderstood, desiring rather to haue bene drawne in peeces with foure horses. Terrail was interred on the Bulwarke of Loy, whereas the heads of those which were executed at the Scalado were buried. If Terrail had made vse of the grace which was offered him in the beginning he had bin saved: but he did not thinke they should be able to conuict him, relying vpon the promises of the Bailiffe of Morges, that his man should not be deliuered to them of Geneva; as indeed he was staid at the instance of the said Bailiffe vntill a second voiage. It was held for certaine that the gouernment of Sauoy had bin promised by the Duke vnto Terrail, if the enterprise had succeeded happily. On the eleuenth of Aprill there was a conference between Monsieur du Moulin, one of the Ministers of the reformed Church of Paris, and Father Gontier a Iesuite, being seconded by the Barromesse of Salignac: after which it was F red abroad, that Gontier had confuted du Moulin in diuers points which they of the Religion did hold, Gontier himselfe writing a glorious letter vnto the King to that effect. du Moulin finding his reputation touched, and the truth mis-reported, was forced to publish a true discourse of the whole conference. The particular Arguments I must omit, being a more proper subiect for them that treat of controuersies of Religion then for History.

On the nineteenth day of Aprill being Easter day, the vines hauing thrust forth their buds vnseasonably by the forwardnesse of the spring in March, were withered with the mornings frost, and the Sunne rising, burned them vp quite, so as that moneth which doth open, and

The King persuaded to alter
the coine.

gave them great hope, did presently extinguish it, and they were deceived of their vantage, A especially about Paris, the which was the more grievous, for that three yeeres before they had had small store of wine, so as the poore labourers were terrified from the charge: whereupon they drew so great store of Brewers of Beere out of the Low countries to Paris, as the signes of Alehoules were more ordinary then of Tavernes.

France is not vnlike vnto a fat fertile soyle, the which wish come puts forth Cockell, Darnell, and such like, so as that kinde of Vultures are more greedy then any Farmers of Impoll, who make traffike of diuine and humane things; and know nothing but to suck the marrow from the poore people, employing all their policies, cares, and counsels, to scrape what is remaining, and to shake the whole state of the Kingdom by their dangerous inuentions, like y vnto Horfleeches, which neuer leaue the skin vntill they burst with blood: They are the authors of new Edicts, the which when they had bought for little, they oppress the subjects, ruined and spoiled them vtterly. Some of these blood-suckers perswaded the King to abate his coine both in goodnesse and weight, by which wickednesse all mens fortunes would be shaken, and both ours and foraine trade vtterly ouerthrowne. This publike infection had so posselt the King, as he was fully resolu'd to alter his coine, and an Edict being vpon the Prestle, should presently be published, yea against the will of the Court of Parliament.

They in whose perpetuall guard the Kingdom is, made it knowne vnto the Kings Coun-cell how dangerous it would be to alter the old coine; and what clamours and inuasions it would breed. That they had read of examples in former times of great ruine which had growne thereby, the which should make them more warie to runne into the like: Next vnto ciuill warres and a generall desolation, the abatement of coine is the greatest mischief: By this sinew, traffick is maintained, the which being dissolued, France would languish, like vnto the Arteries which want nourishment. In the end the courage of Achilles preuailed, or rather the eloquence of Harley, that Nestor of our France, with whom the whole Councell assented.

The King heard his speech willingly and commended it, chasing those caterpillers farre from him.

There was a kinde of people, who hauing gotten great credit by their great trade, taking vp great summes of money at interest (they finde many desirous rather to liue vpon the vie of D their money, then to purchase lands.) In the end finding themselves oppress with vsurie, and vnable to make payment of their debts, they are forced to breake, and to runne away.
They are the wickedest amongst men, who hauing purchased places of authoritie for their sonnes, and married their daughters with great dowries, hauing conueyed great store of gold, wares, plate and stufte into forreine parts, they change their soile; the which hath hapned often within few yeeres. But the boldnesse and impunitie of these publike theenes, which in others haue beene neglected, was punished in one. It was a Merchant called Pingre, very well knowne for his great trade, whom the fame of his former life, and his abundance of Merchandise, had purchast great credit vpon the Exchange. He hauing defrauded his Creditors, and conueyed away his goods and his state to his friends and neighbours, and being fled into the Low countries, was found by his Creditors at Valencia, and was brought backe to Paris, where he was called in question before the Masters of Requests: his Procresse being made, he was condemned to come into the Court in his shirt, and a torch in his hand, and to aske forgiveness, then to be carried thorow Saint Dehins street where his house had beene, hauing hanging at his backe these words written in great letters, A TREACHEROVS DEFRAYDER OF OTHER MENS MONEY. Whereupon there was an aduertisement made touching this crime, in these termes.

As good Lawes spring commonly from bad manners, so we from two great mischiefs which began to grow in this Realme, fee two very wholesome Edicts made in one month, to suppresse so many Duels, which tend to the ruine of the flourishing estate of the Nobilitie; p and to prevent Bankrupting, which we see so ordinarie, or at the least to punish such as shall be conuicted thereof, with their complices and adherents.

Leauing Duels for a more ample discourse, we will only speake a word vpon the subject of the Decree against W<sup>m</sup> Pingre, condemned for Bankrupting, and falshood, both foule crimes;
the which draw others after them, as theft, couzenage, the robbing of the publike treasure, and counterfeiting, all capital. There hath beene some doubt vpon the interpretation of these words, to punish them extraordinarily, and capitally, by the Tenor of the Ordinances
of Punishment of a Bankrupt.

1609

A of Orleans and Bloys; if the new Edict which it hath pleased his Royall Maestie to send vnto his Court of Parliament this month of May, in the yeere of our Lord 1609, had not taken away all cause of further doubt, appointing death for such offenders, to the great content of all good men.

But for that no Law is good or commodious to euery man, and that Iupiter himselfe (as the old proverbe saith) whether he send raine or faire weather, cannot content all the world;
I will yeeld some apparant reasons to them, which hold there is too great severity and cruelty in this Iudgement, and more in the Kings Maesties Edict. They say there must be some pitie and commiseration had of those, who hauing lost their goods not by prodigality or B fraud, but by some great force, or by mischance, or by the breaking of some one of their Creditors; and that our custome and the Ordinances haue often allowed them, respits, delays, and surceasings by letters or Iudgements, which the Soueraine Courts haue confirmed. But admit it were so, and that there are some which are not vnworthy of the miserable remedie of cession of their goods, carrying the marke which is a Greene bonnet and hat, I say, a Greene hat, to prevent the fraud of such as hauing made cession doe still wear a blacke hat, and a little Greene night-cap vnder it, so as it can hardly be seene: Yet can we not too rigorously punish; not onely with a ciuill death, which is the losse of their goods and honour, but also with naturall death, those that are duely conuicted to haue by fraud or dissem-bling taken and carried away great summes of money out of diuers good purfes, and then C sie into forraine countries, where they enjoy their spoiles, an infinite number of good families being ruined, and brought to beggery.

These are (saith Tacitus) the fruits of vsury, whose biting is like vnto the wounds of certaine Serpents, whereof he that is stung seemes to feele no paine in the beginning, but in the end it brings them to a death full of anguish and paine. There is not any Bankrupt, but hath been a Vsurer, active and passive in diuers sorts: And if Cato compared an Vsurer to a murderer, we may well say that a couzener is a very theefe, seeing he doth with a fraudulent intent get, and maliciously carry away the goods of so many poore men, and that by subtil and malicious practises, whereof the fraud depends, the which shall be called couzenage, if there be no other more significantie.

D Robbing of the publike Treasure, is not often found as it was in the dealing of this Pingre, yet molle doe deale in it that manage the publike Treasure, whence grows the shame of either side, as well his that takes, as his that giues.

There remains the most grievous crime of all, which is falshood, whereof no man breaking fraudulently, can excuse himselfe: for in stead of making good and loyall bookes of accompts, they make them false: If they say that all such faults, that are not punishable with death, as in a Notarie, Register, or some other publike person, and that by some Iudgements they haue beene content to cause them to burne the day: I answer, that by the Roman Lawes, such Registers of Bankers which are called Argentarij, Argyroprestes, mensularij, and Cermatistae, of whom Seneca speaks in the preface to his Declamations, is a sufficient testimo-
E nie in Iudgement, and it hath beene iudged by infinite Decrees, that their Iournall is a good prooffe. He then that falsifies that rule, or makes it double, merites no lesse punishment then forgers, by a capital: punishment, not onely by the losse of reputation and credit, but by losse of life, as the Edict will haue it, and is practised in some Soueraine Courts, namely at Rouen. But the equitie and necessitie of this Senatus consulu, fortified by Edict, will apcoole their heat, who to affect a greater gaine vpon the place, contemne all honest meanes to employ their money, either in purchasing of Land, which is the most safe, or else in buying of rents by constitution, which is lawfull both by the lawes of God and man, which is the F onely honest meanes to make profit of money with a good conscience. The King therefore to prevent these falshoods, published an Edict in May as followeth.

HENRY by the grace of God King etc. To all present and to come greeting. Desiring to provide for the disorder and most frequent troubles, which the corruption of manners proceeding from the liberty of the foresaied troubles, hath brought in, and to restore Iustice to her authoritie, and former beaury, to the end that vnder her our subjects may be better used and maintained in their duties: We haue considered that one of the things which we are speedily to redresse, is the abuse and apparent dook which is committed vnder the name and pretext of playing Bankrupt, to the prejudice of poore Widowes, Orphelins, and other A of our good and loving subiects, by the means of which crime, which is growne frequent and in a manner common, for want of being punished as it deserves, the publike faith and trust amongst our subiects is greatly diminished, and the trafficke and commerce almost wholly decayed.

And for that the ancient Kings our predecessors have ordained small punishments against Bankrupts, for that during their reignes, infidelitie and corruption of manners had not so fully crept into the hearts of their subiects: King Francis the first, our most honoured Lord and great Vncle, vpon the aduice which was giuen him in the Citie of Lyons, ordained in the yeere of our Lord 1536, that they should proceed extraordinarily against Bankrupts, which B did breake fraudulently, their factors and dealers, by informations, confrontations of witnesses, and all other extraordinary means, and the fraud being discovered, the culpable to be punished corporally, by condemnations, asking forgiuenesse, to the profit of the parties interested, standing on the pillory, or otherwise, as it shall be determined by the Iudges, and to be kept close prisoners vntill they had made full satisfaction. And K. Charles the 9. also, our most honoured Lord and Brother, vpon the complaints which were made vnto him in the Assembly of the Estates held at Orleans, that the said crime of Bankrupting grew too common: He ordained that such as should fraudulently breake, should be punished extraordinarily & capitally, which Ordinances the last King deceased, had confirmed by an Edict made at Blois, in the yeere of our Lord 1579. and declared his intention to be, That they which C should fraudulently breake, or make cession of their goods, should be punished exemplarily. The which hath made the said crime so familiar, as many of our loving and loyall subiects, have suffered, and doe suffer daily great losses. Desiring therefore to make these complaints which have bene made vnto vs to cease, after mature deliberation, we have held it very fit and necessarie to renewe and augment the said punishments against Bankrupts and cessionaries, which have broken in fraud.

For these causes and many other considerations vs mouing, with the aduice of our Council, and of our certaine knowledge, full power and royall authority, by this our present Edict perpetual and irrevocable have said, decreed and ordained, and doe say, decree and ordaine, will, and our pleasure is, that according to the Ordinance and Lawes of our said D Lord and Brother, vpon the complaint of the Estates held at Orleans, they shall proceed extraordinarily against Bankrupts and Debtors, breaking & making cession of their goods to defraud or beguile their Creditors, their Factors and Dealers, of what estate, qualitie and condition soever they be, and the fraud being proued, they shall be exemplarily punished with death, as theues and publike affronters.

And notwithstanding for that most commonly the said Bankrupts breake with intent to enrich their children and heires, and the better to couer their malicious designs, make Transports and Cessions of their goods to their said children, heires, or other of their friends to keep them for them: We haue by the same means declared, & do declare such Transports, Cessions, and Sales and Donations of goods, moueable or immouable, made to defraud or B beguile the Creditors, directly or indirectly, to be void and of no force at all; forbidding all our Iudges to haue any regard thereof: But contrariwise if it shall appeare the foresaid Transports, Cessions, Donations and Sales shall be made to defraud the said Creditors; we will that the Cessionaries, Donataries and Purchasers, shall be punished as complices of the said frauds and breaking.

We will also and it is our pleasure, that they which, contrary to the truth, shall iustifie themselves to be Creditors to the said Bankrupts, as it often happens by Monopolies and intelligences, to the end they may draw the true Creditors to composition, shall be also exemplarily punished, as complices of the said frauds and bankrupts: forbidding all men expressly to retie the said Bankrupts, their cautions, factors or dealers, goods, moueables and papers, R nor to giue them any comfort or assistance in any sort whatsoever, vpon paine of being punished as Complices, as is said. We doe also inioyne all those that are true Creditors (vpon paine of losing their debts and actions) not to make any accords or contract, or to giue any time vnto the said Bankrupts, or their mediators, but to pursue them by the course of Iustice, according to our intention. Allowing any one of our subiects, yea without Decree or Warrant, to stay any Bankrupt flying away, and to present him vnto Iustice, notwithstanding all Iudgements, Decrees, and Outcomes to the contrary. We command our loving and full

A full Councillors holding our Court of Parliament at Paris, Bayliffes, Seneschals, and all other our Iudges to whom it shall belong, to cause these presents to bee ready published, inrolled and observed, according to their forme and tenor.

And to our Proctor Generall and his substitutes, to haue a care thereof, and to certifie vs of the contraventions which shall be made to our present Edict, as they will answer to the contrary, for such is our pleasure. And to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, we haue caused our seale to be set to these presents.

Given at Paris in May. 1609.

Signed Henry.

The King at the same time being much troubled with the daily combats of his subiects, one calling another to field vpon every light occasion, whereby many Gentlemen of Noble families did vntimely lose their liues, by the aduice of the Princes of the blood; the Comfortable, the Marshalls of France, and other Officers of the Crowne, hee made an Edict to suppress it, as followeth;

HENRY by the grace of God, &c. To all our subiects greeting. The Kings our Predecessors and we haue made diuers Edicts and Ordinances, for the restraining of the too frequent vse of Duels and single Combats, in this our Realme, moued as most Christian Kings with our duty and the discharge of our consciences towards God: and as loving and good fathers tending the safety and preferuation of our subiects: hauing likewise a care to maintain our soueraine Authority, which is much interested by the disordered and vntimely liberty of the said combats. To this end we haue by our Edict dated in the moneth of Aprill, in the yeeres of our Lord 1602. with the aduice of the Princes of our blood, Officers of our Crowne, and others of our Council, which did then assist vs, declared all such as vnder colour of drawing satisfaction from any one, for a pretended injury, shall challenge, or cause to be challenged, guilty of high treason; and withall we did ordaine they should be punished accordingly, as also they that should answer to any such priuate challenge, or assist and second them; expressly forbidding all our Officers, of what quality soener, to dispense with any that are guilty of the punishments prescribed by the Lawes of our Realme, for treason, or to moderate the same vpon any consideration. Hoping that the terrour of the said punishment would be a meanes to suppress that detestable custome of combats.

E But we are so farre from attaining to our iust desire, as to our great griefe, and the contempt of Almighty Gods Commandements and ours, these Duels haue since bene more frequent then before, which we haue chiefly observed, for to proceed from a false, and rorionous and long conceived opinion, too deeply rooted in all the hearts of our Nobility (who haue alwaies more valued their honours and dignities then their liues) That they ought not to seeke any satisfaction for received injuries, but by armes, without disparaging and disgracing their reputations, and incurring some blemish of cowardise, especially in those cases which they thinke cannot be sufficiently repaired but by armes.

Notwithstanding that, we, to free them from this doubt and colour, haue by our said Edict shewed that we haue bene willing to charge our selues with whatsoever might bee objected in this regard, against those that should subiect themselves to the observation thereof.

Moreouer many, as malicious, as rash, not considering how severely we doe censure such actions, doe oftentimes willingly ingage themselves, to the hazard both of soule and body, thinking thereby to increase their reputations, and to get the advantage of others. Howbeit in effect it is contrary to true honour, no way becoming a true Christian; and altogether displeasing vnto vs: so as they are to hope for so little fauour from vs, as we hate those that practise these Duels, as a more then brutish madnesse.

Being

Being therefore very desirous how to satisfie them that build such opinions vpon so dangerous and deceitfull foundations; and by the same meanes provide (as much as in vs lieth) for the inconveniences and difcommodities which fall our daily by this vnrestrained liberty; Experience teaching, that it is sometimes necessary and commodious for the publike good of the whole common-weale, to alter and change Lawes and Decrees, and to accommodate them to such accidents as shall happen in succeeding times, to make them the more profitable and beneficiall: wee likewise haue thought it good and requisite, with the aduice of the Princes of our bloud, Officers of our Crowne, and other great personages neere vnto vs, who by expresse commandement haue often met about this subiect, to adde to those precedent Edicts and Ordinances, made by our former Predecessors and our selfe against the said combats (without reuoking or disannulling them in any sort) this Edict, which wee will and commaund to be inuiolably obserued and kept by all persons of what estate and condition fouer they be. Expressely forbidding all persons: As also the Queene our deare and welbeloued Spouse, with all the Princes of our bloud, and our chiefe Officers and Seruants, nor to make any petitions, supplication or suit vnto vs to the contrary, vpon paine of our displeasure. Proceitling and swearing by the euerliuing God, neuer to grant any grace nor pardon, that may derogate from this present Edict, nor to dispence with any man for the punishment thereby prescribed, in fauour of any whatsoeuer, nor for any cause, colour, or particular respect, that may be propounded, pretended, or vpon what ground fouer alleaged.

He enioyned all his Subjects to liue in peace and concord, nor to prouoke one another by priuate scandals or open injuries. That they should respect all men according to their births and dignities, and that they in like manner should forbear to wrong others. That all Controuersies amongst his subiects, whereof the decision did belong to Iustice, should be ended by the ordinary course of Law, vpon paine to lose the thing in question, for him that should attempt the contrary. That no man should demand the combat of the King, Constable or Marshalls of France, by another, of any supposed wrongs done vnto them. That they should addresse themselves to the Governours of Prouinces, & in their absence to the Kings Lieutenant generall, to deliuer their grieuances, and to demand their combat; which if it could not be otherwise ended, they should aduertise his Maiesty, and receive directions from him. That the party offending should appeare before the King, the Constable and Marshall of France, or before the Governours and Lieutenants generall, when they should be called; who not appearing after due notice giuen, should be suspended for bearing armes for his contempt, and turned ower to the Courts of Parliament, to be punished as breakers of the Kings Edict. That if any one should refuse his Iudges to whom hee was referred, and the causes thereof found frivolous, he should be returned with blame to the said Iudges. That whoeuer should demand the combat vpon so light an offence, should be returned with disgrace. That he that did offer wrong to any other to the prejudice of his honour, should be suspended from all honours, offices, dignities and pensions, for the space of six yeeres, and neuer to be restored, vnlesse he should demand pardon of the King, and satisfie the party interested, and withall recouie a new declaration of his Maiesties pleasure. That whoeuer had no office, or dignity nor pension, should lose the third part of his yeerely reuenues; & if he had nor any or lesse then 20. pound a yeere sterling, he should remaine in prison two yeeres. That whoeuer should carry a challenge for any other, or be the bearer of a dishonourable message, should be for euer degraded of his Gentry, and kept in perpetual prison, or put to some infamous death, and withall should lose a moiety of his lands and goods. That whoeuer should make his own challenge, hauing not formerly demanded leave, should for euer be held incapable to make his party good by armes with any one, nor recieue any satisfaction for the wrong which he shall pretend to be done vnto him; and if the party called should giue notice thereof, as was ordained, then the officer or pension which the Challenger enioyed should be giuen vnto him, if he be a man fit to hold the place; but if the party challenged repaire to the place without giuing notice, hee shall vndergoe the same punishment with the party challenging; If any fight and kill one another; he that killeth shall suffer death according to the Law, and vnill he be taken, he shall be deprived of all dignities and pensions whatsoeuer; and lose halfe the reuenues of his lands, to be disposed of by his Maiesty, giuing no satisfaction to the heires of the party slaine in regard of his disobedience. And if both parties were slaine, their bodies should be deprived of buriall, and the thirds of their lands to be imploied at the Kings pleasure. And if they had not any, their children should be declared ignoble; and sub-

A left to tax for the space of tenne yeeres; or if they were taxable, to bee held vnworthy for euer to be counted noble, or to hold any royall dignity or office. That all which should assit at such combats, if they did once draw their weapons, should lose life and goods: if they were but lookers on, and yet went to the fray, should be degraded from bearing armes, and lose their offices and pensions. If they came accidentally, and did not seeke to part them, should be suspended from their Offices and pensions for six yeeres, and not restored vntill they had asked pardon from the King. That whoeuer did fight in single combat, should incur the paines of death, or perpetual imprisonment with the losse of halfe their goods, and vntill they were apprehended, should be degraded from their Nobilities, and deprived of all their liuing during their liues. In the end be enioyned the Constable, Marshall of France, and all other Officers belonging to the Crowne, to whom the decisions of the point of honour did belong, to haue a carefull regard of the obseruation of his Edict, and not vfe any moderation, nor to suffer it to be infringed by any fauour or conniuenue, notwithstanding any command that should come from him, as they desired to please and obey him.

There was a Turke of Constantinople, a man of good yeeres, who had bene taken prisoner by the Knights of Malta: he spake the Siriake tongue very well, and did write it perfectly. A Dominican Friar at Malta, learned both in Diuinity and Philosophy, and very delirious of the tongues, obtained his liberty, and brought him to Paris, where he instructed him in the principles of Christian Religion, and vpon our Ladies day he was brought to Saint Benets Church to be Chrified. Being examined of his demand at the Church doore, the Dominican being his interpreter, he answered that he desired to be a Christian, whereupon (hauing abured the superstition of the Alcoran) he was baptized, hauing noble witnesses. Alphonso d Ornano, Marshall of France, and the Kings Lieutenant in Guenne, was the one, and Mary of Seneton, a Lady of an honourable house, was the other. There was so great a concourse of people, as this spectacle was preiudiciall to many, who being sore bruised and hurt, could hardly retire themselves out of the presse.

Charles of Gonzaga Duke of Neuers, had laid the foundation of walls in the furthest part of his Country, neere vnto the riuer of Meuze, and caused his surveyors to measure our ground for the building of houses: he determined and resolved to make and erect a goodly new Towne, imitating Sedan, Iametz, and many such other petty Princes, who the neerer they are to Germany, hauing freed themselves from the Eagles talents, which did sometimes oppress the world, tooke vpon him a kinde of command, he drew new inhabitants to settle themselves there, with promise of immunities, and would haue it called Charleuille, making a new coine with this Inscription, Carolus Gonzaga Dux Niuerni. Et Rethel. sup. Principis Archenfis.

Joachim of Chetardy a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris, one of the Clergy, died in Iuly; But why should I ioyne him (though a man of a singular good life, and well deserving his purple roabe) with great personages? his goodly Act, deserving eternall memory, makes him worthy.

He was Prior of Saint Cosme, neere vnto Tours vpon Loire, the which he repaired and restored, being decayed and ruined, as well by the violence of ciuill warres, as the negligence of his Predecessors, and not onely tooke away the long deformity, being in old time a holy and sweet place, seated in the Elisian fields of France, but also finding great Rensards bones to lie in a bare, mure and illiterate coffin, more iust then they that had bene aduanced by his rich spoiles: he would not suffer his ghost to lie any longer neglected, causing a stately Tombe of Marble to be made for Rensard, and a liuely Image to be cut by the Phidians of Paris, with a short inscription; for it was sufficient to admonish Passengers that there lay Rensard; neither did he need this care and charge of mortal men, who in his life time saw his owne eternity, whose glory after death cannot exceed that, which he did reape liuing: yee this goodly and bountifull Councillor, by this good Office hath deferred much of all them that honour learning. And as it was sometimes said of a Roman, who when he had erected another mans decayed statue, that he had fixed his owne, so Chetardy building vpon Rensards monument in dumbe marble, he hath placed his owne in the monuments of writers. Vpon the Tombe these words were grauen.

Marriage of the Duke of Vendosme.

In the beginning of Iuly the King performed an Act of great content to himselfe, which was the marriage of the Duke of Vendosme his base sonne, by the Duchesse of Beaufort, with the sole daughter and heire of the Duke of Mercuer, which marriage had bene formerly concluded vpon at the said Dukes reconciliation vnto the Kings seruice: But the Duchesse her Mother was drawne, and perswasiuely induced vnto it with great difficulty. She was one of the greatest marriages of France, for besides her fathers inheritance, she was by her mother heire of the house of Marignies in Britanny, a House of great possessions, and issued from the Dukes of Britanny. The King would haue this marriage solemnized at Fontainebleau, with as much pompe as might be, and therefore the Courtiers spared no cost to please the Kings humour: and the more to honour it, he called the Princes of the blood, the Officers of the Crowne, and the chiefe Noblemen to Court: among others came the Prince of Condé, the first Prince of the blood, and the first Peere of France, who some few moneths before had bene married to the Constables daughter, one of the fairest Ladies of France, whom the King did very much affect, and was the chiefe meanes of the making of that marriage. In consideration whereof, they say that the King augmented the Princes pension to ten thousand pounds sterling by yeere, being before but eight, and that he gave vnto the young Princess a pension of two thousand pounds sterling more. The marriage day at Fontainebleau being come, it was put off vpon some pretended cause, and so was protracted from day to day fifteen daies together vpon many coloured excuses: but those that knew best the humour of the Court, said, that the King did it of purpose, that he might the longer enjoy the sight of that faire Princess of Condé, whose beauty had made him great a breach in his heart, as hee could no longer dissemble it, nor hide it from the eye of the world. But the Prince was not well pleased with these long delays, protesting that if the marriage were not consummated the next day, he would be gone home to his house, whereupon all excuses were laid apart, and the ceremony performed, after which were great triumphs and sports, especially running at the Ring, where the King himselfe won the prize from all the Gallants of his Court, hauing taken the King three times in foure courses. The sports being ended, the Prince of Condé hid him home with his Lady to his house, meaning (if it were possible) to prevent that which he feared, and to keepe his honour vntainted. The sequell you shall heare hereafter.

Rumor in France of warre against Cleues.

The marriage being ended, the King retired to Paris, where they beganne to consult in Counsell of making warre in the Duchy of Cleues. It was generally thought it would be so, for that the King had called some of his companies of men at armes, and given them their Rendezvous by a certaine day in diuers frontier townes in Champagne vpon the way to Luxembourg. There was Artillery provided, Leues for forraigne forces set downe, and all preparation for war: but it went so slowly forward, as they might easily iudge of the event by the beginning. In the end they began to treat of a peace by their messengers with no doubtfull hope,

1609

A hope, the Duke of Neuers (whose mother is issued from the House of Cleues, as appears by the name she beares, and Henry de la Marke, Earle of Mauleurier, and Titular Duke of Bouillon, being a younger brother of that House, who pretends no small interest to the Earldome of La Marke, sent their Commissioners to an Assembly held at Delpord, where being heard, they were willing to shew their Titles: but the Marquis of Brandenburg, and the Duke of Newburg challenged the whole inheritance: what the success will be you shall heare in the following yeere.

We haue said in the yeere 1606. that by reason of the straitnesse of the Pest-house, which was built in S. Iaques Suburbs, the plague was wonderfully disperst in Paris, and very violent, whereupon the Magistrats of the Citie, and such as had the charge of the publike health, resouled to build a more spacious one on the other side of the Citie. The worke did equal their designe: for in Saint Martins Suburbs they made so large and spacious a building of Free-stone and Bricke, covered with Slate, with such chambers, porches, and walks, as it doth equal or exceed many Palaces. Which worke was finished in three yeeres: vpon the front of it this was grauen in Marble.

On the five and twentieth day of November the Queene was brought in bed early in the morning of a daughter: France being sufficiently supported with fonnets, had now need to be strengthened with daughters, by whose marriages it might get alliances with forraigne Princes. If euer children came happily, they doe at this time, when as the ancient enemies of France renew their old practise, whereby they seeke to withdraw the chiefe men from the duty and obedience which they owe vnto their Prince and Country, they receive such as flee away, who thinking and desiring to returne, they disswade them with assurance of safety, vainly seeking the ruine of France, which hath fallen out to their owne losse. So in the memory of our Grand-fathers, the Burgondian receiued Charles the seventh his sonne, flying from his father, who commanding him to returne, he kept him and entertained him seven yeeres. But Charles sent the Burgondian word, that he did feed the Fox, which would one day deuoure his pulleine: which Prophecie he proued true: for Lewis pursued his receiuer and nuce with all force and policy, vntill that by his vnfortunate death, at the siege of Nancy, he left France, Lorraine, the Suisses, and in a manner all the borderers in peace.

brought in bed
of a daughter.

At this time there fell out an accident which did much trouble the whole Court, but especially the King. The Prince of Condé had during the Queenes lying in, come to Court to doe his duty to the King, who receiued him very graciously, and dealt earnestly with him to bring the Princess to Court to see the Queene in child-bed. The King prest him so much, as in the end he promised to goe and fetch her: and so he tooke his leave, seeming to haue no other intent, but his thoughts were farre otherwise: for being come home to his house which is about 16. leagues from Paris, vpon the confines of Picardy) whither he gaue it out that he would goe a hunting, so as within two daies after he tooke his Caroach with the Princess, one Gentleman and a Gentlewoman, and without any other traine or prouision, hee set off with all speed possible thorow Picardy to recover the Arch-Dukes Country. Two daies were past before the King was aduertised of his retreat, who vnderstanding the manner of it, conceived what his intent was, when that he was very much discontented, holding it a great affront & dishonour to haue the first Prince of the blood abandon his country after that manner, without his leave or priuity. He sent the Knight of the watch with other in post after him, to bring him backe if they could ouertake him; but they came too late, for he was gotten out of the Kings dominions. At his returne the King vnderstanding where he was, he sent Monsieur de Praslin one of the Captains of his guard to the Arch-dukes, to demand the Prince,

Condés re-

Prince, and to request them to persuade him to returne into France. He had charge also to tell the Prince how highly he had offended his Maiefty, who notwithstanding would pardon what was past, and receive him againe into fauour: the Archdukes dealt with the Prince to that end, who answered, that he was his Maiefties most humble subiect and seruant, but there was no safety for him in France, vnlesse the King would grant him a towne for his assurance. With which answer Monsieur de Pratin returned. The King holding it an indignity to haue his subiect (who had offended him) capitulate with him, yet before he would take any seuer course against him, he resolved to make him another summons: whereupon he sent the Marquess of Coeuvre, brother to the Duchesse of Beaufort, in ambassage to the Arch-dukes; who with Monsieur Brulard, Ambassador Leager for the King, and some others, repaired to the Princes lodging, and there in the presence of the Prince of Orange (the Prince of Condes brother in law) did intimate vnto him the greatnesse of his offence, and his Maiefties iust discontent. That he affected him as a father doth his childe. That by the mediation of the Arch-Dukes, he had promised to pardon all his offences, and to restore him to his dignity and fauour. And that contemning the Arch-Dukes counsell, he had incensed his Maiefty by refusing his grace; yet they said they had commision to make the like offers vnto him, if he would obey the Kings will. The Prince answered, that vntill he might haue some better assurances from the King, there was no safety for him in France; saying withall, My masters, take not this if it please you for disobedience: The Ambassadors summoned him againe, in the name of the King his loueraigne Lord, to returne speedily into France, vpon paine of the Kings indignation, and to be held as a Rebelle, and guilty of high treason. The Prince desired to haue an act of this Summons, vnder the hand of a publike Notary, the which was sent him. The Prince returned an answer in the like forme, intimating that he was the Kings most humble seruant and subiect, borne of the royall house of France, and neere allied to his Maiefty, and that he was ready to obey his Commandements, hauing reasonable assurance for himselfe and his family, beseeching his Maiefty that he would not take his answer for any disobedience, and withall he protested nullity for any thing that should be afterwards done to his prejudice. This Act of the Prince was sent by a Notary to the Ambassadors lodging, who grew much discontented therewith, & would haue offered him some violence if he had not bene restrained by the respects he bare to the Arch-Dukes. D

The last yeere was spent in Conferences, Messages, Ambassages, and Treaties touching the affaires of Cleues and Iuliers, to see if the question for the inheritance might be quietly compounded, but being of diuers humors and dispositions, the controuersie is not yet ended. Sigismund Marquess and Elector of Brandebourg, before he would goe to armes, published his pretensions after this manner. About some 100. yeeres since, there was a marriage made betwixt Mary daughter to the Duke of Iuliers and Berke, and Countesse of Ravenspourg, and John Duke of Cleues, and Earle of Marke, and then it was concluded, that all those Estates & Seigneuries should be for euer vnited by an indissoluble knot, and neuer diuided. As wandes bound together are hardlier broken then when they are dissolved, so they thought their houses and families well conioyned, would with greater difficulty be shaken and broken. Of this marriage betwixt Mary and John were borne William, Sybilla, and Amalia: in the yeere 1526. Sybilla married with John Frederick, Duke of Saxony, vpon these conditions: That if either of them died without heires male, that then those vnited Provinces should descend vnto Sybilla the eldest daughter, and John Frederick of Saxony her husband, vpon condition they should giue dowries to two Sisters answerable to their qualities.

But that William was married in the yeere 1545. to Mary of Hongary, after that he returned into fauour with the Emperour Charles the fifth, from whom hee had fallen being in league with the French King. From him he obtained a grant, that if there were no issue male of him and Mary, or they should chance to die, that then those three Dukedomes should descend to the daughters of William being liuing, or if they were dead, to their heires. Charles being dead, F and his brother Ferdinand succeeding in the Empire, he confirmed this coniunction of those States, and would haue it indissoluble: after him Maximilian and the Emperour Rodolphus, now liuing, renewed this first Decree, by a perpetuall Law, that the heires of William, in the direct line of either sex, sonnes or daughters, should enioy the whole inheritance. This William thinking to haue made a firme coniunction of his Estates by the Emperours letters, in the yeere 1572. married Maria Leonora his eldest daughter to Albert Frederick Marquis of Brandebourg, and Duke of Borralia, with these conditions; that if he and his wife Mary should

A should die without any issue male, then the Duchies of Iuliers, Cleues, and Berke, with the Countie of Maria and Rauenspourg, and all their dependancies, should come vnto Maria Leonora, and to Albert Frederick Duke of Borralia her husband, but with this caution, that Albert should out of his owne money, pay a portion set downe by William his father in law, vnto the Sisters of Maria Leonora, in regard of their pretensions to those Seigneuries, and one of the Sisters dying, that money which she should receiue in lieu of her inheritance, should accree to her surviving sisters, with this condition, that at the payment of the money by Albert, the future husbands of the said Sisters, should renounce, and vterly disclaime all their right vnto the inheritance.

B Of Maria Leonora and William, the eldest was Anne wife to John Sigismund of Brandebourg: who by the disposition and conveyance of Duke William his father, was called to these vnited Estates. It happened that the second daughter, being married to Philip Leopold, Count Palatine of Newbourg, committed this decree, expressing words, her interest to the inheritance it should befall to her without children: The like was done by Magdalene the younger sister, marrying with John, the Count Palatine of Rhine: and with this caution Brandebourg right was sealed and confirmed, drawing his beginning from the elder: Notwithstanding that by the contract of marriage betwixt Maria Leonora and Albert Frederick, not only these and the heires male that were to be borne, but also the women by right of substitution were called to the succession. The Duke of Newbourg, defended his right, by other letters and grants, but hee soon agreed with Brandebourg, and they two ioyned their forces together, and vnited their martiall powers against the other Pretendants: whereby it appears, the Christian King could not iustly refuse his succours to the confederate Princes of Germany.

The greatest Pretendants against Brandebourg, were the Electors of Saxonie, and Leopold, who had obtained a right and iurisdiction from the Emperour. He contends that the Duchies of Cleues and Iuliers, are fiefdomes taken from the Eagle, bought from the Hocke, and beames from the Sunne. And therefore a Fee belonging to Males cannot fall to women: for if any one will search into the Record of Antiquitie, he shall not only finde, that the Emperours of Germany, but also of Rome, haue giuen Provinces and Lands conquered from their enemies in warre, in reward to their old soldiers, vpon condition, that as often as the Empire should be prest with war, they should willingly serve in, by reason of their fees. And no man will deny, but the Electors of the Germane Empire, the chiefe Ministers and Officers, are tied to a manly seruice and duty, both in peace and war, at the Emperours pleasure. The Lawes of the Empire haue excluded women from all iurisdiction and publike charges, yea in private causes, much more where the Maiefty of the Empire is in question. In France (which falls not to the distaste) after the death of Charles Duke of Bourgondy, who was slaine at Nancy, the Earle of Nevers might iustly haue challenged the Countee of Bourgondie, for that a disposition made in fauour of Philip the Hardy, extended to the women, who notwithstanding by the publike lawes of the Empire are excluded. By which example the Law made in the Contract of marriage betwixt Maria Leonora and Albert Frederick, is to be held vaine, void, and of no force. Tacitus hath obserued in his booke of the manners of the Germanes, that they did not only fauour males, but did hate the women kinde, and that it was their manner and accustomed order to leaue the whole inheritance to the eldest sonne as his lawfull right, left being diuided into diuers parts, it should runne to nothing, and to their younger children they gaue their cattle, money, plate, busse, and other furniture belonging to an house.

The Electour of Saxonie pretended the inheritance of Cleues by two titles: first, by a grant from the Emperour Fredericke the third, who gaue Cleues and Iuliers in Fee to Albert of Saxonie, for the great seruice he had done vnto his Maiefty, and Maximilian did grant the same vnto Ernest, the Earle of Saxonie brother. His other title was grounded vpon the contract made at the marriage of Sybilla with John Frederick of Saxonie. These were the words: That if Duke John and Mary Duchesse of Cleues, Iuliers and Berke his wife die without any issue male, or if she males issued shall leaue no heires, in that case it was agreed, that all those vnited Seigneuries should descend to his daughter Sybilla, and to the children that should come of her and Fredericke of Saxony.

The Electour of Brandebourg did impugn the title of Saxonie, as that grant made by Fredericke the third, and Maximilian the first, Emperours, vnto Albert and Ernest of Saxony, was held as abandoned after the departure of William Duke of Juliers and Berke, the Saxons never obtained that possession of the foile, which the Interpraters of Fees teaching William would: or if they had, they lost it for want of use. Such is the nature of Fees, that they suffer an Ineffect to be made to another, and makes not his claim within the year, is excluded from the Fee, much more so that suffers another to enjoy the Fee, ten, twenty, thirrie, or fortie yeares, and neither makes any question to it. Neither did it auaile the Saxons to haue made a protestation of their right, wherein no due forme of Law was observed, and had beene made void by prescription. Whenas it first began, and continued three yeares together, is void: and fillall causes if they are not produced in time, after a long Indemnition are reiecte.

Leopold title by the Emperours gift.

Pretensions of the Electour of Saxonie to Cleues.

Duke William, and the sonne of William, receiued the Ineffecture of these States, from the Emperor and King of R. maine, without any question or opposition made by the Saxons of their pretended right, so as their first protestation made by words onely, is to be held void. For it is receiued by the ciuill Lawes, that these protestations are void, which are not often repeated, and fortified by formes of Law, and therefore the Saxons right (if they had any) is lost by their owne negligence. Neither is the Saxon to be tolerated, who so much brags, that Adolphus had deposed the Ineffecture of the Emperor, for his warlike exploits, when as he and Brabant by their continuall silence fouredecie yeares, haue silently renounced it. How often did they (being alive) cease William Duke of Juliers and Cleues, in their private letters, writings, and titles? It makes nothing to the question, whether it be a Masculine Fee, and in patience of a woman's command. For the clause which is contained in the Emperor Fredrick the third's grant, if the Duke of Juliers shall happen to die without issue male, is to be referred to the first case, that is, when as John and Maria should die without sons, and that by the opinion of Lawyers, who hold, That every disposition speaking of any Alc, is only to be understood of the first: and he that is once excluded from the succession of a Fee, is neuer more admitted. For a Right being once extinct it self no more, as in the yeere 1511, the Estate of Cleues was giuen to Maria, daughter to Duke William, by Maximilian the first, so all true Right of these Estates was giuen by Charles the fifth, and after him by a new grant, vnto the daughters of William and their heirs.

But it appeares by the Annals, that the Estates of Cleues and Juliers are falsely termed a Masculine Fee, where it is manifest that Arnold Duke of Guelders & Juliers, giue vnto Charles Duke of Bourgondy, Guelders, Juliers, and the Countie of Zutphen, who dying, they came to Maria his onely daughter, wife to the Emperor Maximilian, whence it happened, that in the yeere 1511, whereas William Duke of Juliers died, not the house of Saxony, but his daughter, and wife to John Duke of Cleues, challenged her fathers inheritance, with whom there was neuer any controuersie. It hath bene obserued in all ages, that the four Dukedomes of Juliers, Cleues, Guelders, and Berke, the illust male falling, the inheritance hath by right come vnto the women. Maria after the death of Edward her brother, succeeded in Guelders, and afterwards marrying with William of Juliers, she brought it as her dowrie.

Renold made Joane his Sister heire of Guelders and Juliers by his testament. Engilbert Duke of Berke, having lost his sonne, hee left the Earledome to his suruiuing daughter. And the daughter of Theoderic of Cleues, wife to Adolph of Mark, obtained the inheritance of Cleues. In Henault and Holland it is receiued, that such Estates should come vnto the Daughters: neither is that insoient law allowed of in the greatest Kingdomes: neither in old time were women tied to their distaues. Among the Sutchians Thomyris, and once the Egyptians Schirramis, Arfinoe, and Cleopatra did reigne. And now England, Spaine, Scotland, Ireland, and Naples, are subiect to the Government of women; yea women are called to such Kingdoms, not onely by right of inheritance, but also by testament.

Charles the fifth in his last Will made 1554, and in a Codicill 1558, ordained, that if Philip his sonne should die, then Maria his daughter, Queene of Bohemia, should succeed in all his Kingdomes. And likewise Philip in his last Will made 1597 prouided, that if his son should die without heires, his daughter Isabella Clara Eugenia should then be heire of all his Estates. It is therefore manifest by these examples, that women are called not onely to Duchies, but to great Kingdomes. And Cornelius in his booke of Fees, proues, that Cleues is subiect to the rule of a woman. The nature (saies he) of the Fee of Cleues is, That no male remaining, the females are called to the succession in their order.

Whereas the Saxon and others pretend the Emperor to be Judge of this controuersie, they flatter

A flatter themselves with an error: although it be provided by the Imperiall Lawes, that if there grow any controuersie for a Dukedome, Earledome, or any other great fee, they must goe vnto the Emperor, as to the head of all Fees, that he may determine of the possession, and command them to be quiet which offer violence to the possessors, yet this was not alwaies obserued, but it hath bene often tried in other Tribunals, and euen that hath bene lawfull for the Saxons, when as they were oppressed and grieuouly iniured by the Emperors feueritie, and the preminence and power of their ill-willers.

Moreover, the grant which Leopold hath obtained, it comes not from the Emperor himselfe, neither is it gotten by iust suffrages, but by the sinister praisties of Courtiers, the which was not allowed by the Electors and Imperiall Cities, who haue of late required by their Deputies, that it should be made void. The Saxon knowes it well by many familiar examples, that the Emperor decrees nothing priuately in such controuersies, but hath sent for the Electors, Princes, and Vicars of the Empire: In their Decrees they obserued more strict formes, then in these which are granted in fauour of the Saxon and Leopold. No man but knowes, that the Electors and Princes cannot be called by any Libell or Edict out of Germany, into a forraigne Court: as the Bohemians and they of Prague may not (by the Lawes of the Countrey) be called out of their owne limis.

No man is ignorant, that Leopold hauing left the course of Law and Equitie, hath fetled all his Interest in Armes, hath leuied Souldiers, hath called in the aides of his Confederates: forced Townes and Castles, built new Forts, hath called religious men to accompany him in this warre, who attentive to the Trumpet, as if the question were for their Altars and Religion, and not for a prophane thing, haue promised him money to make a ten yeares warre. If the Saxon be not blinde, he will easily see, that these attempts are not for his good, nor for the dignitie and greatnesse of the House of Saxonie, but that the Spaniards may be the more mightie in Germany, (who haue already swallowed it vp in hope) that they may vndermine it, and quite ruine it, the which his Predecessors of Saxony haue long since made trial of, to their owne losse, when as they like true Germains, and louers of their Countries libertie, suppress that violence and imminent destruction which began to disperle it selfe thorow their Countrey.

Brandebour who pretended to be before all others in the right of inheritance, when as he had protested his Right by written Tables after the manner of Clients, thoroughout all Germany and the Netherlands: yet admonished by the examples of the Ancient, that the controuersies of Princes are not decided in Iudiciall Courts, but that their Right consists in Armes, left if his Competitors should seeke to oppress him by force, he should be found vnprepared. He draws his Allies and confederate Princes of Germany vnto him, who were not slow to assist him, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Wittemberg and the Prince of Anhalt, who being sent Ambassador from the rest to craue aide and succours of the French King, he found him very tractable and willing, and the rather in that respect: for if his heires should be debarred or deprived of their Inheritance, it were to be recouered by iust Armes, and the vniust possessors to be expelled by force.

The instance of the Prince of Anhalt, and other Germane Princes, moued him to ioyne with him in this warre: for that when as the King was oppressed with ciuill warre, they had sent him great succours. He therefore thought that aide was not to be denied them, who siffit of all had so well assisted him. And to the end he should not fildie his friends being in danger, and might remoue all violence and oppression from them, he sent Baiffe, a man of great wisdom, of sound iudgement and knowledge, who had bene intployed in many Ambassages, and had performed weightie affaires, and important negotiations, vnto a generall Assembly of the Princes of Germany: who whist he remained there in the Kings name, to obserue their Councils, and to perswade them to that which concerned the libertie and dignitie of Germany, and whilst that in this assembly they contend with words and speeches, they make preparation for warre in France: money is giuen to Captaines to leuy men, Arillerie, Powder, and Shot is drawne out of the Arsenall, it is purto Bords, and carried vp the Riuier in Champagne, that if happily they should fallow open warre for the question of Cleues, all this preparation might be ready, and the Christian King performe that in deeds, which he had promised in words. In the meane time Baiffe deliuered the cause of his Ambassage vnto the Germane Princes, in these termes: What shall I say, when I shall see you, the beginning of my imposed charge (most renowned, mighty Princes, Electors, of the sacred

Baiffe speech to the Princes of Germany.

1610 " sacred Romane Empire, worthy and noble Eagles, magnificent and honorable Ambassadors A
 " of the Cities of the Empire, shall rise from the manifold health, wherewith Henry the most " Christian King of France and Nauarre, my Soueraigne Lord, greeteth you, Wilhing that in " this Assembly you enter into such sound counsels, as the imminent danger which now threa" tens Germany, may be repelled, and that you may proceed in your affaires well and coura" geously: moreover, he willeth you, to expect such good offices from him, as you may iust-
 " ly hope for, from a most friendly King, your kinsman and associate. But when as by the sin" gular grace and mercy of God, and the victorious armes of the King my master, the practises
 " of the most wicked were preuented, and that France began to enioy her ancient peace and " tranquillity, his Highnesse out of his most Royall disposition, thought it not sufficient for B
 " the glory and honour of his name, vnlesse he might also prouide for the generall peace and " quiet of Christendome. Of which his commendable intent, the ten yeeres Truce in the Ne" therlands, obtained by his mediation and authority, are sufficient witness, whereby those
 " Prouinces are now refreshed, and Italy freed from the feare of a most cruell war by the recon" ciliation made betweene the Pope and the Venetians. But there was nothing, whereof his " Highnesse tooke like care, as the safety and liberty of your country of Germany: the which
 " when he saw to be many waies infringed, after the example of his worthy progenitors, he hath " profest himselfe a champion and defender thereof. Thus much he thought himselfe indebted
 " vnto you, both in respect of ancient amitie and league of the Kings of France with the Prin" ces of the Empire, and for your owne great merits, and good offices conferred towards him-
 " selfe and his Kingdome, in his greatest extremity: which kindnes that he might sometimes re-
 " quite, he thought he should doe a matter worthy and befitting himselfe, if he were carefull
 " for your generall safeties. When therefore not many yeeres since he obserued many things to " be attempted to your ruine, as the depopulation of your countries, and the vsurpation of your " townes and cities, contrary to the lawes and priuileges of the Empire, and that there were fa" ctions nourished amongst the Princes, he could not chuse but by the lawes of friendship to " admonish you, how necessary true loue and vnitie was among you, the better to repell those
 " iniuries; and herein he dealt the more earnestly, for that he did preface to himselfe, that Cleues
 " and Iuliers, and other Prouinces of the house of Cleues would be the subiect of all troubles &
 " dissensions in Germany, touching the which, he oftentimes treated with you in the Dukes life D " time. And since his death (because that businesse seemed directly to concerne the peace of " Germany) how willing and ready he hath beene euer to vndertake the protection of lawfull
 " heires, I thinke you doe all know sufficiently. And to the end he might manifest his minde the " more plainly in that cause, wherein the safety of Germany is in question, he thought good
 " to publish the same to all the Princes in Europe, that he would neuer faile in so iust a cause
 " to assist his friends and associat Princes, to whom those Estates by lawes defended, the which " he did not, thereby rashly to intangle those Princes in war (for who hath knowne the hazards
 " of war better then himselfe?) but rather the King his Master out of his great wisdom was " highly pleased with that Treaty obtained by the labour and counsell of that most excellent,
 " prudent, and most courageous Prince the Landgraue of Hesse, touching the getting possession E
 " of those countries, and referring the contention & variance between the Princes pretendants,
 " to the iudgement and ordering of friends, which busines that it might be the more safely effe-
 " cted, he sent afore-hand some troups of horse to the confines of the kingdome, to be assisting
 " to these Princes, howsoever things should happen: for he knew very well, that some neighbour
 " Princes had long since plotted, by what means they might adde those countries to their own " Dominions. But after the possession of those countries gotten, when the Princes seemed some" what remisse, neither did impart their resolutions to the King, he fearing lest that delay might " hinder their affaires, in respect of the warlike preparations then made against them, he thought
 " good to admonish them by letters and secret messengers, that they should beware that they " were not surprized whilst they were in consultation of their business. But in the meane time, F
 " whilst that the messengers went and came from one to another, the noble Prince of Anhalt
 " came secretly to Paris, being most deservedly welcome to the King my master, as well for his va" liant & worthy seruice in war with his maistie vnder your fauours, as also for his great know" ledge and praise-worthy experience in marshall affaires, wherein he excelleth and is renowned
 " amongst the Captaines of our age: who by letters brought from the excellent and mighty
 " Princes, the Elector Palatine, and Duke of Witttemberg, signified to my Lord the King,
 " That he was resolved by the confederate Princes, to defend by force of armes the possession of

A of the Princes the heires, if so his Maiesty would supply them with those aides which they " expected. How royally and friendly he was entertained, and how affable and tractable he " found the King, you haue heard by report of the Prince himselfe. He treated further about " sending an Ambassador, that might confirme the Confederates in their resolution, and might " thoroughly certifie them of the Kings intention: to which charge though vnfit for it, I was by " his Maieste chosen, and sent to be as it were the interpreter of his good pleasure and liking.
 " Now therefore, most excellent Princes, it is your parts to looke that the Common-weale be " not dammed, nor that the Princes your kinsmen be not vnworthily cast out from their an" cient seats by forreine Princes that are no friends to you, who by possessing these countries
 " B lay themselves out a way to invade Germany. As for that which concerns the K. my Lord
 " and master, although he be not ignorant that by taking your part, he doth (as it were) draw
 " vpon himselfe much trouble and discommoditie, yet the interest of his friends shall be euer of " more force with him, he will protect and defend you and your Counsels against all violence
 " and wrong, with men, mony, and all kinde of helpes, which he hath already prouided and in " readinesse, wherein notwithstanding there will nothing be attempted against the Maieste or " right of the Emperour: neither hath he any private respect herein, but this only he desireth,
 " that Germany being the Bulwarke of the Christian Common-weale, may enioy all happy
 " peace and security, and that his friends and well-deseruing associate Princes, may still retain " their owne rights and priuileges, if so as their Ancestors haue done, and you haue constant-
 " C ly performed, ye doe still remaine in league and amity with the King my Master.

The Marshall d'Ornano, famous for his worthy seruice in the wars, brought ynder his " father, a Colonell of forreine fouldiers, that were then stipendiaries to the French Kings.
 " Afterwards he grew renowned by many prosperous exploits done vnder Charles the ninth,
 " and Henry the third: for in the yeare 1587, he defeated Chastillon leading two thousand Suisses
 " by crosse waies thorow the countrey of Auvergne for them of the Religion, where he tooke
 " diuers of their colours, and mightily annoied that partie. Henry the third being cruelly mur" dered, Alphonse was a violent and vnreconciled enemy to the league, from whom he tooke
 " Lyons and many other strong towers and forts in those parts, at length being taken prisoner
 " by the Leaguers, they offered to giue him his libertie, with the chiefe charge of the Army, and
 " D other aduancements and preterments, if he would quit the Kings party, yet he rather chose
 " his freedome by the payment of fifty thousand Crownes, then by his defection to ioyne with " them, which thing in a fouldier is like to a white crow: he was an vniuersall and frequent seruer
 " of God, and more zealous in his prayers, then many that were religious, and had taken holy " orders, as he that had a daily custome to sing his Psalter.

When as the passage of his vrine was stopped, and that with much torment he eased his
 " bladder, he was content to be cut, which falling out vnfortunately, he died of that deadly dis" ease at Paris, whose death was a great griefe both to the King and all true louers of the Com" mon-weale: For he not only shewed by his valour how much he loued his countrey, but he " did also without feare in August last past, disswade the King constantly and coutagiously
 " E from certaine Edicts too greivous and bitter to the people, and so much preailed by that " his worthy and manly speech, as he made certaine horseleeches and brokers (which make
 " sale of our soules) to blush, and tooke the morsell out of their lawes.

He being dead, how few Alphonse's hath the court, which play not the claw-backes, but are
 " vpright and iust Counsellors? In his last words he willed his body should be carried to Bour" deaux: and because all power of a Testament dieth, if the liuing neglect the behests of the " dead, his body being embalmed and put in a Caroch couered with blacke, drawne with foure
 " horses, was brought to that graue which himselfe had appointed; all the States of Aquitaine
 " bewailed him; not only as the Kings Lieutenant, but as their father, and the want found by " his death, shewed how honest his life was.

F But after that France had lost Alphonse, the most Christian King substituted in his Office
 " and place Desgignieres, equally vnto him, if not superiour in valour, who being brought forth
 " by the Duke of Vendosme, and a most chiefe company of fouldiers to the Court of Parlia" ment, was for this noble exploits publikely praised; in an eloquent Oration, as truly in this " last ciuill war, he had serued the King very valiantly: A while after he was sent to treat with " the Spaniard, about most weighty affaires, which I will publish a little as they come to " light for whatsoever is worthy the knowing, both in this and the yeeres ensuing, I will adde to " my Commentaries, if I may steale so much leisure from other lites.

Conspiracy against Geneua.

We shewed in the preceding yeere, that the attempt of Terrail and Bastide against Geneva A did not only remaine vnaffected, but that it was publickly reuenged by the death of them both: This yeere an attempt not vnlike the other, not by frangers and Catholics, but their owne home-bred and native Citizens, was renewed and reuenged, so they will neuer cease from treacheries and stratagems, both within the walls and without, vntill either by surprize ora siege, it lose all command and power. Canalis, a man not meanly reputed of, both for his knowledge in phylicke, and the languages, was drawne into suspition of treason, detected by obscure signes, and his inconsiderate speech increased the same: for such is the force of truth, that it will breake forth euen in spite of the offender, and being tortured, he confessed all things more plainly: He being a man of good reckoning, and not the last or lowest B amongst the Treasurers and Decurions of the Citie, did by spies certifie the Duke of Sauoy of all the counsells of the Citizens, hauing promised him all his faithfull endeavour, and if at any time he intended the surprize of the Citie, by some stratagem in the night or by scalado or wilde fire, that then he would priuily fire the powder, that thereby he might avert the Citizens (being euery where scattered and busied in quenching the fire) from keeping out the enemy: Neither was there ability wanting to performe his treachery, inasmuch as to his custodie the powder and munition was committed: He accused also (as priuie to this villany) one Maitlerie, before that time found guilty and imprisoned for robbing the Treasury, and one Blondie, whose brother for the same cause was before executed. But I heare that Canalis being found guilty as well of that first conspiracy, whereof we formerly made mention, and C which was not farre from effecting, as also of this new and fresh remembered treason, was condemned, and his body broken, and so laid halfe dead on a wheele vnbound, he was cast from thence to be burned in a fire vnder him. It is strange that so often treacheries against Geneva haue bene undertaken in so few yeeres, or rather that before a yeere compleat (the treason of Terrailus being discovered and punished) another within the same yeere should breake forth.

A godly institution.

So neglected is the knowledge of holy things, as they which professe themselves Christians by name, did daigne to expresse the same in deed, being children in faith, so as they are ignorant of the rudiments thereof, and they which are most quicke of sight in prophane matters, are most blinde in matters of faith, which thing when Nicholas Pellegens matter in the chamber of the Kings accounts did obserue to be done, to the great desight of Religion, and hindrance of saluation, being a man of singular godlinesse and learning, he instituted for a yeerely stipend a holy Preacher of the Dominican Order, who out of the publike pulpit euery Sunday in the yeere should euidently shew to the youth, & the people, the rudiments of faith by short questions or oppositions (which we call the Catechisme) a Counsellor excellently well determining of the Christian commonweale, which hath renewed the godly institution of the primitive Church, for they which were willing to beare the name of Christians, before they were baptized, were instructed by preaching of the holy mysteries. Which custome by degrees through the negligence and ignorance of the parish Priests is discontinued, and of so many hundreds of Ecclesiasticall persons, only the Iesuites in their Colledges haue not suffered this B light of faith to be extinguished. Many perchaunce will account me idle to make mention of such a popular matter, although posterity ought not to know any thing more, then those things which are ordained to reach vs how to lead a godly and blessed life: Neither ought that to be a reproofe vnto me, which the Protestants reckon as a great honour to Sleidan, who spends himselfe wholly in the commendations of his reformed Religion.

About the end of February it was seriously debated by the means of Cardinall Perrou, Augustus Thimannus and other wellwillers of learning, concerning the enlargement of the Kings, or Cambray Colledge, and the increasing the number and stipend of the professors, and also for the pulling downe of certaine cottages, which hindered the prospect of the Court and Orchard, and now the Surueyors haue set out the bounds of the place, although in deed the Vniuersity hauing bene long waste, and like a wilderness, needs not so much large walks and Colledges, as Students to frequent and liue in it.

We heare also that Leopoldus and the Saxon haue had some bickering with Brandeburg, as it seemes rather in some accidentall light skirmishes, then any set or generall battell. The Marquess of Brandeburg had sent afore-hand some thousand foot without ordinance, to winne, or more likely, to surprize a little towne, whilst he kept himselfe with his footmen not farre off in his Campeto bee ready to releue his men, if need required: but the businesse succeeded

and Brande-
burg.

A succeeded not as he expected, for whilst the Brandeburgers were ouer-long in winning the place (being vnprovided of Ordnance) Leopoldus being aduertised of the townsmens necessity, sending some field peeces before him, set vpon them on a sudden with a great power of horse, at the first vollee of whose Ordnance the Count of Salmi Colonell, and at the second vollee his Lieutenant were both slaine: the rest being terrified with their death, and afraid of a greater power of the enemy approaching, tooke them to their heeles. The Marquis hearing of their flight by some runne-awaies (who are quicker in coming home, then going to the field) came in all haste with some troupes of Horse, and restrained Leopoldus in time, who hauing the victory in his owne hands, knew not how to vse it, for if hee had pursued them B more speedily, whilst they were disperfed, and in that perplexitie, he might vtterly haue defeated them, but by these euents the Brandeburgers were well warned to bee more prudent. But oh the inconstancy of humane things! that no Nation hath peace permanent, and quiet fastned with some sure hold, for behold the Germaines and the high Dutches, who since the death of Charles the fit, haue so long obtained from domesticke armes, who by their helps maintained warres abroad, are now informed to vse them for themselves, and to desire helps from others, shaking off the rust from their swords, and the rest of so many yeeres.

Our Ancestors (saith Tully) would neuer suffer a poore man to lose his cause for want of a Patron, or Aduocate to defend it. When many in France through their great pouertie vnable to defray or sustain the charge of their suits, being destitute of helpe or counsell from Aduocates, were constrained to forsake their intangled, though wealthy inheritances, or whatsoeuer else they had, and to yeld them vp into the hands of the mightie and more powerfull partie: it was decreed in the Kings Counsell, that in euery Court Parliament as other Courts, there should be chosen Aduocates and Proctors of approved integritie, that should helpe poore men with their best counsell and furtherance without any fee or reward: so straightly was the law Cincia imposed vpon them, that if they were lame and crippled, they should not take so much as a wand of their needy Clients, but that contenting themselves with the Kings allowance, they should look for a greater reward in heauen: for euen amongst the heathen it hath bene accounted glorious to helpe the distressed, and to defend and support those that are oppressed, as it was also accounted most wicked and execrable to abandon D or deceiue the Client: for Cato against Leuulius did earnestly auouch, that there was nothing more religiously obserued of the ancients then to defend Orphans, and to be faithfull to their Client: inasmuch as it was lawfull for Aduocates to witness for their Client against their own Kinsmen, but by all meanes prohibited for their Kinsmen against their Clients: questionlesse a godly decree, but no longer of force then the like good and excellent lawes, whose setting or fall hath not bene much distant from their first rising.

Religion and custome require of necessity to anoint the Kings of France with that sacred oyle which is kept at Rhemes, as anointing was necessarily imposed vpon the Kings of Israel by the Hebrew Law: but for the Queenes of France to be anointed, it is more of custome E then of precept. Neuerthelessse, it is now growne to that order, that the Queenes also be installed with those Christian ceremonies: Neither ought we to enuy that this honour is done them, from whom spring young grafts, and stens for the Flower-de-Luces, who are companions of the bed and Scepter, who also are Regents of the Kingdome, either in the sicknesse, or after the death of the Kings their husbands, to whom only the law Salique enuieh the royall throne, although through them it is neuer empty: with the like step of honor haue the Cæsars dignified their Emperresses. For Princes (saith Papinian) honor their Princellesses with the same priuileges which themselves haue, and Plinian doubts not to mention the Treasury of Cæsar and the Impresse by one and the same title: hence it is, that in ancient Monuments and Coines, we behold the portraictures of Kings and Queenes, circled with Lawrell and

F Corall. After the golden Mines of India were discovered, Ferdinand and Isabella caused both their Images to be grauent in that new gold, as it were the one beholding the other: In like manner Katherine de Medice, caused to be coined a peece of Gold with the Sunne vpon it, so made and called in her owne praise and application: and now of late the Archdukes Albertus and Isabella in this Low countries, haue caused their coine to be stamped with their two faces. The managed makes Queenes companions, so as they may well say, according to that old Prouerbe, where Women challenge to themselves halfe the charge and command of Saint house, Where thou art Caius, there am I Caius. They report out of the three wilbes of Saint Augustine,

1610 Augustine, that he wished to see the Cæsars and the victorious Consuls going vp to the Capitol in their triumphant Chariots, but I wish to see a Queene drawne in a golden Chariot.

In such a Chariot as Cybele rides,
Thorow Ida's towred townes.

But now the Court of Parliament (according to the ancient custome in the happy and joyfull Inauguration of Kings and Queenes) prepareth to remove out of the ancient house of Themis and the lawes, into the house of the Augustines next adioyning, not to returne thither againe, till the publike triumph be accomplished. Not vnworthily sometimes, and very fel- dome in many yeares, doe the Lords of the Councell lend this house (appointed for ministeration of right and iustice) to the Kings and Queenes for some few daies, as the Kings haue confirmed the same to them for euer; for therein they hold the Royaltie of their Court and coronation. This removing hath hapned three times in this age, as I gather out of the Annales, the more ancient of which was, when Charles the fifth, Emperor, hauing safte conduct to passe out of Spaine thorow France, advanced himselfe to repress the infolencies of the Gantois: the next, when Henry the second espoused his daughter Elizabeth to Philip the second, King of Spaine, and his Sister vnto Philbert Emanuel Duke of Sauoy. The third and last, was in the yeere 1562. That I am more tedious in a matter that is yet to come and vnexpected, my desire to see it constraineth me; and desire to enioy the pleasure of it, carrieth me C beyond my selfe.

THE King after he had receiued the protestations of the King of Spaine by his Ambassador, not to infringe nor alter any thing in the peace, nor to meddle in the action of Clieues: hauing bene also intreated by the Emperor, to be an Arbitrator in that businesse, knowing that the Pope sent the Seigneur Rimarello Bishop of Nazareth to that end; that the Protestant Princes did wholly incline to his intentions, and that the Archdukes had assured him of passage, victuals, and of their owne forces: Hauing resolved to see his Queene crowned with as much State as might be, all things for the solemnitie being prepared, they came D to Saint Denis in France, on Wednesday the twelfth of May 1610, being attended on by the Daulphin, the Ladie Elizabeth his Sister, Queene Marguerite Duchesse of Valois, and by many Princes and Princesses, with a great number of Noblemen and Ladies: the next day being Thursday, the Act and Ceremony of the Coronation was done, as followeth.

There was a great Scaffold built in the midst of the Quier of the Church in the Abbay of Saint Denis, set before the great Altar, about nine foot high, being eight and twenty foot long, and two and twenty foot broad, to the which there was an ascent made of many steps. About the midst of this Scaffold inclining somewhat towards the backe part, there was another Scaffold aboue a foot high, hauing two steps vp vnto it, which Scaffold & steps containing about ten foot in length, and six in bredth, were couered with Carpets, on the which was set the throne or chaire of State, appointed for the Queene: which chaire was couered with azur'd veluet, imbroided with Flower-de-Luces of Gold, and ouer it a cloth of State of the same sute: the great Scaffold and staires were couered with crimson veluet, imbroided with gold. There were other Scaffolds both on the right hand & the left, as well for the Princes, Knights of the Kings Orders, Gentlemen of the Chamber, and other Noblemen, Captaines, and men of marke, as for Ambassadors, Ladies, the Queenes women, and others: within the compasse of the high Altar, there was a forme couered with cloth of Gold, for the Cardinals of Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and behinde them was another for the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelats, appointed as well to serue at the Coronation and Masse, as to assist there.

Ioyning vnto the Altar on the same side, there was a Table honorably prepared for the great and lesse Crownes, the hand of Iustice, and the ring appointed for the said Coronation: On the other side on the right hand, there was a chaire couered with Violet colour Veluet, imbroided and fringed with Gold, hauing two long cushions, for the Cardinall of Ioyeuze who did the Office, and behinde on the same side was a table richly appointed for the bread, wine and candle, vntill that the master of the ceremonies should come to fetch them, and deliuer them vnto Ladies appointed to carrie them vnto the offering.

The

A The floore of the Quire, and from the great scaffold vnto the high Altar, was couered with crimson veluet imbroided with gold, with good and rich carpets round about the said Altar, and ouer the said carpets was a covering of cloth of gold.

The said Thursday being the thirteenth day of May, the Queene was found ready in the morning in her chamber, attired with a kirtle and bodies of Ermines, a mantle ornament of her head, and other royall habits. Her mantle was of blew veluet imbroided with Flower-de-luces of gold, and furred with Ermines, hauing a traine seuen ells long. The attire of her head was all garnished with pretious stones, her bodies were also of blew veluet, couered with Flower-de-Luces of fine gold, and her kirtle enriched with great diamonds, rubies and B Emeraude, all of such riches and excellency, as the value was inestimable.

Being thus attired, shee was conducted with great state vnto the Church, being attended on by the Daulphin, who carried the traine of her Royall mantle, being assisted by Moun- sieur de Vitry, the Lady Elizabeth, Queene Marguerite, and by many Princes and Princesses, and other Noblemen and Ladies in very good order. The Queene being come into the Church, shee kneeled downe vpon a cushion before the great Altar, whereas shee found the Cardinall of Ioyeuze in his pontifical ornaments, accompanied by the Cardinals of Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and a good number of Bishops, Abbots, and other Prelates, of either side of the great Altar, after which shee did prostrate her selfe, praying very devoutly, which being ended shee was raised vpon her knees, & then bending her head the Cardinall of Ioyeuze pronounced this prayer in Latine: O Lord God heare our prayers and supplications: that that which is to be done by the Ministry of our humility, may be filled with the effect of thy vertue through Iesus Christ our Lord, &c. This prayer being ended, he tooke the phyll in which was the holy vnction, and poured so much into a vessell of gold as he thought necessary, and anointed the Queenes head, and then her brest, saying, In the name of the Father, the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, this vnction of oile may profit thee in honour and eternall confirmation. After which vnction he said this prayer: God eternall and almighty, pacified by our prayers powre the abundant spirit of thy blessing vpon thy servant, to the end that this day being instituted Queene by the imposition of our hands, shee may alwaies remaine worthy by thy sanctification: and that shee may neuer after be separated from thy grace, as unworthy, throughout Iesus Christ, &c.

D The Cardinall proceeding in the said Coronation, hee tooke the ring and put it on the Queenes finger, saying: Take the ring of faith, the signe of the holy Trinity, by the which thou must auoid all hereticall malice, and by the vertue which is giuen thee call the barbarous nations to the knowledge of the truth. After which he said this prayer following: God from whom proceeds all power and dignity, giue vnto thy servant by this signe of faith the prosperous effects of her dignity, in which faith shee may alwaies remaine constant, and strue continually to please thee, by our Lord Iesus Christ, &c.

Then the Cardinall put the Scepter into the Queenes hand, and the hand of Iustice, which done, he tooke the great Crowne which he offered to set vpon the Queenes head, being in the meane time supported by the Daulphin and his sister, and then was taken away; and in stead E thereof was set on another of lesse weight enriched with Diamonds, Rubies and Pearles of infinite sumable value. The Cardinall setting the Crowne vpon her head, said these words: O Lord the fountain of all goodnesse, and giuer of all honours, graunt vnto thy seruants well to gouerne this dignity which hath taken, and fortifie in her by good workes the glory which thou hast giuen her by our Lord Iesus Christ, &c.

The Coronation being ended, and the prayers said, the Queene was placed in her Throne, which was prepared vpon the Scaffold, and the great Crowne set before her vpon a stobbe couered with cloth of gold, and a cushion of the same, and on the right hand there was a Nobleman which held the Scepter, and on the left another, which held the hand of Iustice.

The Queene being thus seated in her throne, masse began to be celebrated by the said Cardinall of Ioyeuze. The Gospell being read, three Ladies carried vp the offering of bread, wine and candle, to the which there were thirteene peeces of gold added. After the elevation of the Sacrament, when they came vnto the Altar, they presented the Pix vnto the Queene, who kisse, who was afterwards lead vnto the high Altar, where shee receiued the Sacrament with great deuotion and reuerence, which done, shee said her prayers, and then was conducted backe againe vnto her throne, where shee heard the end of Masse.

Masse being ended, the Queene descended from her Throne, and was conducted backe vnto her Chamber with the same order and Ceremony that shee had bene brought vnto the Church.

there may be present order given concerning his service, and the good of his State; which cannot be well governed by the Queene, during the minority of the King her sonne; and that it would please the Court to declare her Regent, that the affaires of the Kingdom may be governed by her. Whereupon having consulted, the Court hath decreed, and doth declare the said Queene (mother to this King) Regent in France, for the government of this State, during the minority of the said King, with all power and Authority.

The King goes to the Court of Parliament.

ON Saturday the fifteenth day the King, being assisted by the Queene, the Prince of Concy, and other Princes, Noblemen, Prelats and Officers of the Crowne; for the Earle of Soissons was yet at his house and came not till Monday) went vnto the Court of Parliament, where sitting in his seat of Justice, he made a little speech vnto them without interruption: but the Queene beginning to speake shee broke downe in a twone, but in the end the Chancellour wonne great reputation for the order and success of this action, the which was as famous for the manner of it, as pitifull for the teares that were shed.

It seemed that Heaven and all creatures did feele the mourning of men; all was so horrible and desolate, both in Court and City, and much more in the Countrey. At that time the King made a declaration, confirming the Decree of the Court of Parliament for the Regency of the Queene his mother, as followeth.

A declaration made by the King.

THE King sitting in his seat of Justice, by the advice of the Princes of his blood, Prelats, Dukes, Peeres and Officers of the Crowne, having heard the request made by his Attorney Generall, hath declared, and doth declare (according to a Decree made by the Court of Parliament) the Queene his mother Regent in France, and to have the care of the bringing up of his person, and the government of the affaires of his Kingdom, during his minority. Commanding this present Edict to be introlled and published in all the Ballewicks, Snes, chaulhes and other iurisdiccions depending vpon the said Court of Parliament, and in all other Parliaments of this Realme.

Given in the Court Parliament the fifteenth day of May, 1610.

Infants sent for to successe the Kings heart.

THE King vpon the foundation of his royall Colledge at La Fleche for the Iesuites, had resolved to have his heart layed there, after his death; the which they remembring, sought all means to recover it, and to preserve this precious peece of that cruell shipwrack, Monsieur De La Ferme who had from the beginning laboured to aduance this Colledge, did now shew his love and affection to them. He remembring the Queene of the deceased Kings will, who willingly granted that it should be executed in every point; whereupon he presently sent vnto the Iesuites being in their preest house of Saint Lewis, that they should be ready to come and receive this Treasure when they should be sent for, and soone after he sent them certaine Carosses, in the which they were brought into the Louvre, to salute the King and Queene and to offer them a new their most humble service, on Saturday the fifteenth of May.

Infants come to the King and Queene.

Being come into the Kings chamber, and having done their ordinary obeysance, his Majesty having embraced the chiefe of them, father Coton made a speech for them all, witnessing the extreme griefe which the company felt, by the incurable wound it received by the deceased Kings death, and that they were resolved for to spend and consume themselves in the service of his Crowne. The King assisted by Monsieur De Sorens his Governour, assured them that amongst the other qualities which he desired to inherit of his Lord and most honoured father, was his love to this order, and that continuing to affect his service, they should finde the like affection.

This being done they went vnto the Queenes Chamber, whom they found accompanied with certaine Ladies of her Court, and some Noblemen and others. All the fathers having humbly saluted her, father Coton made offer of the like service as he proposed vnto the King. To whom the Queene said, The deceased King my most honoured Lord and husband loved you dearly, as every man knowes, and in testimony thereof, he would have you after his death to be the depositors and guardians of his heart. I have commanded it shall be deli-

And vnto you; and that his will be effected. Having this precious peece, and continuing towards the King my sonne in that duty which you have shewed vnto him; my love and affection cannot faile you. As for your selves I will maintaine you, and will haue great care of your preferation, as men who I thinke doe watch for this our Royall Edict. On this word and in the sound of the bell, the Iesuits, who having taken their oaths were directly to the Chamber where they did inhabit the Kings body. A lamentable sight, namely for those who but two daies before had seen him for pleasant and full of health. The Prince of Concy arrived presently after, who melted in teares: He knelt downe before the royall heare, and his prayers being ended, takinge up on a cushion, he delivered it into the hands of Monsieur Jacques, Superior of the house of Saint Lewis, who being attired in a surpise and roale, he reclosed it in the name of the whole company, with profection of the eternall bond which the whole Order should owe vnto the memorie of this deceased King, in that he had honoured them with so precious a peece. Then being accompanied by his brethren, and followed by a great number of the Nobilitie, many torches being light, he was conducted to the great gate of the Louvre, whereas the Caroches did attend them. He went with foure others of the same Order, and two Gentlemen which carried torches in that where the Kings heart was, which was the same wherein this good Prince had received that lamentable and bloody wound of death. The guard, appointed by Monsieur de Vary, did accompanie this dolefull convey, the which came to Saint Lewis about eight of the clocke at night, on Saturday the fifteenth of May.

Iesuits receive the Kings heart.

The furniture of this mournfull convey, made the afflicted Parisiens (who love their Kings with passion) easily to discover what it was; so as many notwithstanding the raine and the great discommoditie of the time, went on with the troupe, the most to witness their affection to their deceased Prince, and not satisfied to have cast holy water vpon his heare, they would, in imitation of the Iesuits, kiss it one after another, yea if it had bene possible a thousand times, euer detesting the memory of that damnable parricide and wicked slaughterer that had decepted them of their dearest Jewell, the which was not done without great lamentation, and fudding of many teares.

After three daies rest in the Iesuits Chappell; it was conveyed with a solemne pompe to La Fleche, where after great ceremonies, it was laid in a place of rest, vnill a stately Vrine might be prepared.

This sudden and lamentable disaster did wonderfully afflict all the French in generall, and bred strange apprehensions in the mindes of many, who remembring the miseries and confusions which had growne through the factions of great men, during the minority of former Kings, praised generally for vnitie, and some did write of that subject among others, one Pelleter, discoursing of this miserable accident, concludes with an exhortation to great men to live in vnitie, for the generall good of the Estate.

It is not (saies he) the propertie of great men to speake, for teares and heart-breaking sighes are the best demonstrations of greatest passions; the which maketh me to expresse in few words, the great griefe and publicke sorrow wherewith France is now afflicted: Know then, and let future ages for euer lament, that on Friday the 14. of May, the next day after the Queenes coronation, our great Henry (of most famous memory) King of France and Nauarre, passing thorow the Citie in his Caroch, as a Prince which lived without feare or suspicion of his subjects, accompanied with some few of his Nobilitie, and without any of his vittal Guard, was murdered by an accursed and execrable Assassin, called Ravaillac, borne at Angoulesme.

A discourse made by Pelleter.

Is it not a wonder to the Christian world, to see France a second Affricke, breeding such detestable monsters? How infamous is this age; in regard of that of our fore-fathers? What a misery is it, that a French King should not be free from the rage and state of a cur-throat villaine, one of his owne subjects? Accursed villaine, thou hast deprived vs of this great Prince, whom we lament with teares, and whose losse we shall euer feele. Thou didst thinke in thy damnable designe to swallow vs vp in a gulf of miserie and desolation: but God in his goodnesse hath preserved vs; and otherwise disposed the hearts and affections of the French, than thou in thy frenzie didst conceive, or the hellish counsell of Satan suggested. The darke prison wherein thou art now detained, where new torments are prepared for thy offence, offence, will not let thee see how (notwithstanding thy sicked A.B.) that all things continue a constant in the same tranquillity as they were in before. It is so God please to whom we are bound for this grace, yet will we not forget to give due praises to those instruments which haue brought us to this situation: for our Princes, Officers of the Crowne, the honorable Court of Parliament, with the Magistrates of Paris, haue all with one heart and common consent assured the Estate: for there is not any the least mutation or sedition amongst this great multitude: but submission and modestie, which make the Petitioners to be much commended, and so as an example to all other Princes of the Realme. I might say more, I should not be here, but the charity of this horrible sentence, all the nobility can be content making offers and procreations of themselves, and of their children, to be sold now though the substance be taken away, the soule is left, to succeed in this Government: though he be young, yet shall he be fortified with the wisdom of great Princes, and of the Queene his mother, who amidst her griefs, sorrowes, will not forget the common good, and hath vouchsafed for our comfort to accept of the Regency and Government of the Kingdome in the presence of the Princes, Peeres, Countable, Chancellor, Cardinals, Marshalls of France, and other great Officers of State, all assembled in the great Chamber of the Palace, with authority of the Court of Parliament, his lawful Successor sitting in his throne, was solemnly acknowledged and proclaimed King of France.

To conclude, this young Prince is so worthily brought vp, in the love and feare of God, with all other virtues, which becometh a great King, that reaching in the first steps of the late King his father, he will shew the Religion, loue Iustice, he generous, meeke, affable, gracious, and shine in a full lustre, like a glorious Sunne over all France. All things shall flourish vnder his reign, his people shall be blessed him, and wish eyes lift up to heauen, pray for God for his preservation.

This now we see this Prince happily sealed, and so well supported with the forces of France, advice of his Counsell, and the loue of his subjects, as it shall be in vaine for any one to pretend to attempt any innovation without condigne punishment: seeing then his coming to the Crowne is so blessed, and seconded by the fauours of heauen, let vs not provoke the anger of God by our ill dispositions: let vs each one haue this cursed murtherer not only detested of all French-men, but also held in abomination of all strangers: Let vs remember, that contrary winds cause stormes and tempests at sea, so diuision and factions trouble a State. If our owne judgement cannot instruct vs, let the schoole of reason teach vs: let vs consider, that as if an humane body there is a head, and vnder that head many members, that the member appointed for one seruice, shal not execute anothers office, the legges will not be the armes, nor the lungs the heart: Even so in a well-governed State, one is acknowledged for head, and giue life to all the other members, which moue not but vnder his command, so as every one discharging his duty by a good vniuersall and correspondency, Kingdomes are preferred, and of small become great, whereas contrary by diuisions and factions great States are ruined and come to nothing.

Remember, that it is about 1200 years since this Realme of France hath bene held for one of the greatest Monarchies in the world: Let not pastieitie reproach vs, that it hath bene ruined in our time, and that by our intemperate rage, we haue overthrowed that which our Ancestors haue built vp by their wisdom and valours: and if the publike interest doe not moue you, yet let enery man respect his owne particular: we are all imbarke in one vessel, it is perill, hardly will any one escape: we are all in one house, if it falle, we shall be buried in the ruines. Let vs not forget, that we are yet drenched with our last shipwracke: that we haue not beene long freed from ciuill warre, the which neuer comes alone, but is attended on by plague, famine, and all other calamities and miseries, as losse of goods, imprisonment, ransoming of our bodies, the sacke and spoile of our townes, the ransoming of our wives and daughters, and the slaughter of our children.

Let vs know, that experience is the mistress of fooles, and let vs not attend repentance after our errors. We are now in peace, let vs continue, preferue, and seeke to maintaine it with the assistance of God. Let vs not be like vixen Magicians, which procure stormes by their charms, contrary to the course of nature. Calamities and miseries come but too soone, let vs not provoke them, or goe to meet them. You great men which haue the charge and government of the State, in Gods name, haue no other object before your eyes, but the good and seruice of your King: his diuision, which like a bad Counsellor, seeking to ruine others, overthrowes overthrowes it selfe. Assure your selues the greatnesse of the Estate is your owne, her tranquillitie is the Basis and foundation of your owne families. Studie not who shall ruine his companion, but who shall serue his Countrey with greatest loialtie. It is incident to men of weak iudgements to be full of enuy, malice, and dissimulation: carry your hearts in your faces, loue one another, that you may the better serue one Master. It shall be your prosperitie, and doubt not but there are more good then bad in an Estate, and that there was neuer any one so malicious & factious, but in the end he was curbed by the Authoritie of his Soueraigne. You haue at this day a King redoubtable, our whole person the eie of the diuine Providence doth so watch, as although he be young, yet shall he not be left obeyed and feared thorough all his Kingdome: the Edicts of the deceased King his Father shall be observed as his owne: you shall haue him a common father to all his subjects.

It is said, that Alexander made no distinction betwixt Greeke and Barbarian, but onely by their virtues, not regarding the difference of their habits. So our King will iudge who are good and bad French-men, by their obedience and fidelity, every one shall be partaker of his grace and fauour, as he shall make himselfe worthy by his seruice. So as all things being thus firmly settled within the Realme, we shall haue no cause to feare any danger from abroad: The King is in peace with his neighbours, and we assure our selues, that there is not any one of them but he is so generous, as he doth deplore this lamentable accident befallen our late King. And although he had before the death of this Prince, some designes to preiudice France, yet now he will turne his hatred into loue, moued onely by commiseration of this disaster. And if we may hope for this kindnesse from forraigne Princes, what ought we to expect from those which are naturall borne French-men.

God indeed in this dangerous confusion, did heare the praies & vowes of good men, and did to vniue the hearts of great men, as every one did striue by emulation, who should do best seruice to the King and State: but above all, the Queenes constancy was admirable, who in the midst of her greatest afflictions laboured continually, and did not neglect any thing, that might tend to the publike quiet of the Realme, causing the King the two and twentieth of May, to make a Declaration for the entertainment of the Edict of Pacification made at Nantes, as followeth:

LEWIS by the Grace of God, &c. Since the most vnfortunate and detestable murther of our most honored Lord and Father, the King late deceased (whom God absolve) the Queene Regent our most honored Ladie and Mother, (hauing alwaies teares in her eyes, and sorrow in her heart) hath not let to labour incessantly, and with great magnanimitie and wisdom, lest this fatall accident should be preiudicial to our person, our state and subjects, holding her selfe bound vnto this duty, not onely for the naturall affection which she beareth vs, but also for that she hath bene declared Regent, and in this qualitie charged with the government of the affaires of the Kingdome, by the sufrages and consent of the Princes of our blood, and other Princes, Peeres, Prelats, and chiefe Officers of the Crowne, and the Judges of our Parliament, being all assembled there together (we sitting in our seat of Iustice) wherein her endeouours were so happy, & the affection of all our Subjects which were then neere vs (especially of the inhabitants of our good Citie of Paris) so great and sincere towards vs, as we cannot with nor desire more in their obedience and loialties, then in the good and well government of the Queene Regent, our most honored Lady and Mother. Hauiing also had intelligence by the aduice which comes daily vnto vs, that in all parts of our Kingdome all our Subjects, as well Catholikes as they of the pretended reformed Religion of all qualities, strue by a commendable emulation, to exceed one another in readiness of obedience, and in actions which may yeeld some testimony of their loialties and duties: for the which we haue great cause to thank God, and to hope that as it hath pleased him heretofore to preserve this Realme from great dangers, so make it flourish to many ages, that he will still by his bountie take our young Iewels into his protection, and giue vs leisure to grow in pietie and vertue, hereafter to employ the greatnesse, whereunto he hath raised vs to his honour and glorie. The which we heartily craue at his hands; and that he will inspire which shall be fittest and necessarie for the well gouerning of our Subjects in this time, and to waite them in peace, vnitie & loue, one with another as being the true grounds, whereon (when after God) depends the safetie and preservation of the Realme: Experience shewing that in times of great dangers, that the fury and violence of Armes, had not onely beene vnprofitable to draw vnto the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romane Church, A their subiects that were diuided from it, but was rather hurtfull: which made them haue recourse by a more happy counsell, to mildnesse, granting them the exercise of the said pretended reformed Religion, whereof they made profession: In whose imitation, the deceased King, our most honored Lord and Father, had made the Edict of Nantes, to reconcile all his louing subiects: The obseruation of which Edict, with the Orders made in consequence thereof, haue serued an assured quiet amongst them, the which hath euer since continued without any interruption. By meanes whereof, although that Edict be perpetuall and irrevocable, and by that meanes hath no need to be confirmed by any new declarations; Notwithstanding, to the end our said subiects may be assured of our loue, and that our intention and will is to cause the said Edict to be inuolubly kept, being made for the good and quiet of all our subiects, as well Catholikes, as those of the pretended reformed Religion:

We make it knowne, that it hauing beene propounded in our presence, by the Queene Regent, our most honored Ladie and Mother, we haue by her good aduice, of the Princes of our bloud, and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of our Crowne, and many notable personages of our Counsell, decreed, and ordained, and our pleasure is, that the aforesaid Edict of Nantes in all points and Articles, together with all other Articles which haue beene granted vnto them, and the Orders made, and Iudgements given vpon the interpretation, or execution of the Edict, and in consequence thereof, shall be entertained and kept inuolubly, and those which shall infringe it, severely punished, as troublers of the publick quiet: inioyning all our Officers to this effect, to see it very carefully kept, as they will answer to the contrary, whose negligence shall be punished as rigorously as the disobedience of such as haue broken it.

We also command our louing and faithfull Iudges of our Court of Parliament at Paris, to cause these presents to be proclaimed and inrolled, and the Contents to be kept, entertained, and obserued in euery point according to their forme and tenor, not suffering anything to be done to the contrary. For such is our pleasure. In witness whereof We haue caused our Seale to be set hereunto. Given at Paris the two and twentieth of May, 1610.

THE State being somewhat settled, and freed from all feare of factions and alterations: the Court of Parliament proceeded to the arraignment and condemnation of the infernall monster of nature, Francis Raulillac, borne at Angoulesme, by profession a Lawyer. Being prisoner in the Concergerie, (which is the prison for the Court of Parliament) his proccesse was duly instructed and made, in the Chamber of the Tournelle (which be the ordinary Iudges for all criminall offenders,) who being put to the Racke on the 25 day of May, on the 27 day sentence of death was given against him, by the which he was declared, duly arraigned & convicted of treason in the highest degree, both against God & man. His execution was according to the sentence, after this manner. He was brought out of the prison in his shirt, with a torch of two pound weight lighted in one hand; and the knife wherewith he had murdered the King, chained to the other; and then he was set right vp in a numbrell or dancergate, & so he was conducted with a good guard vnto our Ladies church, where being condemned to doe penance, he had beene torne in peeces by the peoples rage, if the Officers had not restrained them. After this he was accompanied to the place of execution by two Doctors of Diuinity, who still perswaded him to saue his soule from euilllasting punishment, by revealing his associates, the which he would not, but still maintained, that he did it only by the instigation of the deuill, and the reason was, for that the King did tolerate two religions in France. In this manner he was carried to the Greue, where there was a strong scaffold built for his execution. Da Vie the Kings Attorney was appointed to assist at his execution, and there to gather his life might be some further light of this hellish conspiracy. His death was terrible, and drew all murderers from the like attempts. At his coming vnto the scaffold, he stood himself in figure that he died a Papist, then he was bound vnto an engine of wood, made like unto a Scaldring Crosse, which done, his hand with the knife chained to it (where with he had labored the King)

the murder-

1610

A was put into a Furnace, then flaming with fire and Brimstone, wherein it was in a most terrible manner consumed, and yet he would not confesse any thing, but cast forth horrible cries, like a soule tormented in bell: and surely if his torments might be felt on earth, it was proued in this mans punishment, the which (had not the foulness of his fact beene so horrid) would haue moued all the lookers on to pitee and commiseration. After which, the executioners hauing made pinners red hot in the same furnace, they did pinch his paps, the brawnes of his armes and thighes, with the calues of his legs, and other fleshy parts of his bodie, pulling out collops of flesh, and burning them before his face: then they powred into these wounds, scalding Oyle, Rozen, Pitch, and Brimstone molt together: after which, they did pour a hard roundell of Clay vpon his nauell, hauing a hole in the midst, into the which they powred molten Lead; yet he revealed nothing, but roared out most horribly, like vnto him that was tormented in the brazen Bull of the tyrant Phalaris. But to make the last act of his Tragedie equall in torments to the rest, they caused foure strong horses to be brought to teare his bodie in peeces, where being ready to suffer his last torments, he was againe questioned with, touching the discouery of this truth, but he would not reueale any thing, and so died, without speaking one word of God. But his flesh and ioynts were so strongly knit together, as those foure horses could not of a long time dismember him, nor pull him asunder: but one of them fainting, it is remarkable to see the affection of a Gentleman who was present, mounted vpon a mightie strong horse, who seeing one of the horses straine but faintly, hee lighted from his owne, and taking off his saddle, hee tied him to one of this wretches members, yet for all this, they were constrained to cut the flesh vnder his armes and thighes, with a sharpe Razor, by which meanes his body was the easier torne in peeces: which done, the fury of the people was so great, as they pulled this dismembered carcase out of the executioners hands, which they dragged vp and downe thorow the dirt, and cutting of the flesh with their knives, the bones which remained were brought to the place of execution, and there burnt, the ashes were scattered in the wind, as being held vnworthy of earths buriall: the people shewing by these exterior acts, the great and sincere affection which they bare vnto the deceased King, our common father, and restorer of the estate. By the same sentence of condemnation all his goods were declared forfeited to the King; and moreover it was ordained, that the house where he had beene borne should be beaten downe (a recompence being giuen to the owner thereof) and that neuer any other should be built vpon that ground. That within fiftene daies after the publication of the said sentence, being proclaimed by the found of a Trumpet in the Towne of Angoulesme; his Father and Mother should depart the Realme, and neuer to returne againe, which if they did, they should be presently hanged without any other forme of proccesse. His Brethren, Sisters, Vncles, and other his Kinsfolks, were forbidden euer after to carrie the name of Raulillac, inioyning them to take another; vpon the like paines, the substitute of the Kings Attorney Generall hauing charge so to see the execution of the said sentence at his perill.

It was an admirable thing after so great a disaster, to see the vnion & tranquillitie which was generally in the State, there remaining not any markes of so great a mischief; but the mourning weeds which all men did weare, and the sighes which all good French-men did breathe forth for the losse of their good King: neuer King was more lamented, nor Parricide more detested. This wicked murderer confessed no other motive of his crime, but the booke of Marians, a Spanisht Iesuit (so horrible a fact could not be committed if a Iesuit were not an Actor) which booke by a decree made by the Colledge of Sorbonne, and confirmed by a sentence from the Courts of Parliament, was for that cause condemned to be publicly burnt before our Ladies Church in Paris: the Tenor of the sentence was; The Court, the great Chamber, the Tunnelle, and the Chamber of the Edict being assembled, hauing scene the decree of the facultie of diuinitie assembled the fourth of this Moneth of Iune, according to a sentence giuen in May last, vpon the renewing of the censure in matter of doctrine made by the said facultie in the yeare 1423: confirmed by the holy Councell of Constance; that it is an heresie full of impietie to maintaine that it is lawfull for subiects or strangers, vpon any pretext or cause whatsoever, to attempt against the sacred persons of Kings and Soueraigne Princes. The Booke of Iohn Marians intitled, De Rege et Regis insublimitate, Printed as well at Mentz as in other places, containing many execrable blasphemies against the deceased King Henry the third of most happy memory, the persons and estates of Kings & Soueraigne Princes, and other propositions contrary to the said decree: vpon the conclusions of the Kings Attorney General, the matter being propounded; the said Court hath and doth ordaine, that the said Decree of the fourth of this present month of June, shall be entered into the registers thereof, and heard at the instance of the Kings Attorney General, and read every year on the like day on Sunday, in the Parishes of this Citty and Suburbs of Paris. It doth also ordaine, that the booke of Marians shall be burnt by the Executioner of Justice, before our Ladies Church in Paris, forbidding all men, of what estate, qualitie and conditions soever they be, upon paine of high treason, to write or cause any booke to be printed against the said decree & sentence. It doth also injoyne, that Copies taken out of the Originals of the said decree, and this present sentence shall be sent vnto the Bailewicks and Seneshallshouses of this iurisdiction, there to be read and published after the accustomed manner and forme. And B moreover at Euenſong, in Parishes, in Townes, Suburbs, and other Burroughes the first Sunday of June. Inioyning all Bailiffes and Seneshals to proceed to the said publication, and the Substitutes of the Kings Attorney General to have a care of the execution, and to certifye the Court of their diligence.

Boy condemned for words.

Yet those holy men had such power and credit, as they staied the publication of the said sentence for a time, whereat many were much scandalized. Presently after the execution of this Parricide, there was a young Boy of the age of thirteene yeares, dwelling with a Weauer, apprehended, for that he had said, that if he had the knife and the characters which Rauillac C had, he would doe as much to the young King, whereupon he was condemned to be hanged by the Prouost of Paris, from which sentence he appealed to the Court of Parliament. And the Prouost of Pluuiers, twentie leagues from Paris, being accused to haue said, the day that the King was murdered, that he was slain or wounded that day, strangled himselfe in prison.

Succours of Clenes refused on.

Another man of Meaux making profession of the religion, and reputed for a very honest man, came vnto the Duke of Bouillon (being accompanied with letters from the Minister of that place) to let him vnderstand that the Deuill had appeared vnto him, and had incited him, to kill the King, saying; That if he would not doe it, another should effect it before the end of Iuly. In the beginning of the Queenes Regency, all her care and endeavour was for the preferuation of the peace and the safety of the Realme; She sought to giue contentment D to the Princes at home, and to entertaine the alliances of France, which made them resolute (though not without some opposition and difficultie) to pursue the desſeine of Clenes, and to send the 10000 men which the deceased King had promised vnto the Princes, but the number of horse was not so compleat; the Marshall of La Chastre was chosen Generall of this Army, and Monsieur de Montigny was made Marshall of the Campe; there were foure peeces of Artillery, commanded by the young Marquis of Rosny (who was newly made Master of the Ordinance) to begin his Apprentitship there. This army began to march but slowly in Iuly towards Metz. The Marshall preparing himselfe for the voyage, there came two Iesuites to seeke him out, who told him that he could not goe his iourney, nor carrie succours vnto Heretikes with a good conscience, seeking to terrifie his conscience with threats, E as that if he undertooke it, he could not be saved. But the Marshall giuing no credite vnto their words, sent them away with a sower answer; yet soone after they came vnto him to change their language, and to pacifie him.

They now prepared for the Kings Funerall, and the Duke of Elsperton with Mounſieur de Bélegarde, Master of the Kings horses, were sent to Compiegne to fetch the body of King Henry the third, which made many thinke that his Funerall should haue bene ioynt with the Kings, but his body was carried directly to Saint Denis, where it was interred without any pompe and ceremony.

The Prince of Conde being aduertised of the Kings death, he sought to make his peace and reconciliation, writing letters full of humility and obedience to the King and Queene Regent, whereupon their Maiesties did write graciously vnto him, by a Gentleman whom the Princesse of Conde his mother sent vnto him with 20000 Crownes to desgage him from the Spaniards. At this time the Government of Normandy was giuen to the Earle of Soissons, and that of Dauphine to his Son, which bred great debate betwixt the Prince of Cony and the Earle his Brother, the which did much trouble the Queene, who could not well tell how to pacifie the Prince; The Court of Parliament at Rouen, refused to verifie the Earles Patent for the said Government, whereupon they had a new commandement sent them:

They

A They grounded their refusal vpon this reason, for that they had already received the Duke of Orleans for their goernour, by a commandement from this deceased King.

After the execution of the Parricide Rauillac, and his confession, that the Booke of Marians the Iesuites, had bene the onely motive to draw him to that damnable attempt; there was a fowle imputation laid vpon the Iesuites, and many condemned them as abettors and fauourers of the murderers of Princes; wherein they were the more confirmed; for that Marians booke had bene condemned to be burnt by a decree of the court of Parliament. Further Cotton a Iesuite, who had bene in more credit and fauour with the deceased King than any one of that company, seeing their credit now in question, and that this brand of infamy was like to stick vpon them, hee imployes all his Art and eloquence to wipe it off, and to that end hee writes a letter or declaration vnto the Queene Regent, of the Iesuites doctrine, in the which hee disauowes Marians Booke in the name of their whole Company. And to winne them the more credit, hee procures their a Testimoniall from the Bishop of Paris, the which he plants in the Preface of his discourse. The Bishop writes, That whereas since the cruell Parricide of the deceased King, there had bene many bruits disperſed in Paris; to the prejudice of the remarkable Order of the Iesuites, we being desirous to provide for the honour and reputation of the said Order, knowing well that such bruits proceed only from ill will, grounded vpon spleene against the said Fathers; We declare by these presents, that the said bruits are impossibilities, and handers in C nented maliciously against them, to the prejudice of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, and that not only the said Fathers are free from all such blame: but also that their Order is as well for doctrine as good life, profitable for the Church of God, and to this E state. In witness whereof we haue signed these presents. After all this, Cotton begins his declaration vnto the Queene Regent after this manner.

Bishop of Paris writes in the behalfe of the Iesuites.

Madams: God ordained in the old Testament, That they should not see the Kid in the mothers milke: to teach vs, (as Philos the law doth expound it) that we must not surcharge him with new affliction, that is otherwise oppressed. According to this rule being of the same nature, those of our Societie did hope; that after this fatal accident which hath shaken the two Poles of Christendome, they should at the least haue had free liberty to sigh after their D incomparable losse, a losse which is as particular to them, as it is common and general to all. But it is befallen them, as vnto those that are vnder the ruines of a great building; whereas one stone attends not another, to couer and ouerwhelme those vpon whom it falls. We were buſied both hearts and bodies at the translation of that precious gage, which it pleased your Maieſtie to cause to be conſigned into our hands by my Lord the Prince of Cony, and to this which the chiefe Noblemen of France yielded the last honours, when as some (in affected to the Catholike Religion, and to them of our profession, to desame vs, and make profit of our absence) disperſed bruits, so far from likelihood and probability, as no man could thinke such flanders could enter (no not in dreaming) in the conceit of any reasonable creature. This grew by reason of a bad booke, the doctrine whereof hath bene iustly condemned by the E Court of Parliament: some maintaining that the doctrine contained in the said booke was common to all the Iesuites; others, that it was so particular to the Author, as many of the same company had written against it; and altogether condemned it in a Provinciall congregation, many yeeres past. A controuersie which the least passionate will decide, concluding, that a disauow were a satisfaction, and that they should attend what we could say. Whereupon (Madame) having bene particularly named, it hath made me now to set pen to paper, to represent vnto you (as to her who is wholly affected to the true Religion, the most interested in the good of this State, and the most assured Sanctuary which innocency can finde) that which the Doctors of our Company haue written of that libellous, knowing that the greatness of our affaires will now suffer you to heare it, nor the little loue which our ill-willers beare vs, to make you a true discourse of it.

Cotton the Iesuites letter to the Queene Regent.

After which he cites some Authors of that Societie writing of obedience to Princes; which held, that it was not lawfull for subjects to be stranger to attempt against the life of a Prince, although he doth abuse his authority, and is condemned the error of Marians. And then he sets downe the opinion of the whole company, touching the question of obedience to Princes, concluding, that it is not onely vnlawfull to attempt against the persons of Princes, but that it is an execrable Parricide, a prodigious offence and a detestable sacrilege.

Anti-Cotton.

This Declaration was printed, but therein as a refutation presently written, called Anti-Cotton, in 1599, that the actions of the Iesuites allowed and maintained the parricide of Kings, and the rebellion of subjects, which had procured out of their own Authors. Francis Rahadine, writing of the parricide of James Clement, he saith; Forasmuch as the resolution which Henry the third took upon him, was the advice of a Politician, and a Machiavell, not conformable to the rules of a King. James behold the reason, was by the just judgement of God, the said Henry was killed by a young man, and died by the stroke of a knife. A Cardus Scribanus a Flemish Iesuite, who calls himselfe Clarus Samaritanus, in his booke intitled, Amphibatrachum honoris, saies, That if it so fell out, that a Demetrius Machiavellus, or an Aristotimus, masters of their ages, oppress France, shall not the Pope have absolute power to annuete against them some Dion, Timoleon, or Philopontes; that is to say, tilters and oppressors of monarchs. And afterwards speaking of a tyrant wasting France, Will no man (saies he) take armes against that tyrant wasting France? Will no Pope set fire to the noble kingdom from the stroke of the axe?

3 He cites Bellarmine, who although he condemneth treason against Princes; yet in ambiguous termes he seemes to approve it, by commanding Garnet the Iesuite in these words: Wherefore was Henry Garnet, a man unmatchable in all kinds of learning and holiness of life, so punished in the highest degree, but only for that he would not desert that, which with a safe conscience he could not. And the same Author in his booke De Pontifice Romano, saies, The Pope may dispose of kingdome, taking from one, and giving to another, as being the superior Prince Ecclesiasticall. And the Iesuite Gretzer saies, We are not such disloyals, as we feare to affirme openly, that the Pope of Rome may (if needfull he require) free his Catholike subjects from their oath of obedience, if their Sovereigne intreat them tyrannically: yea he addes in the same place, Thus if the Pope doe it discreetly and warily, it is a meritorious work. After all this he quotes the doctrine of Tolet, Mariana, and Iohn Guignard, a Iesuit Priest residing in Paris, who had written a Treatise in praise of James Clement, with diuers motives to make away the King which last died, for the which he was executed. But Franc. Verena. Constant, exceeds them all: he affirmes, That notwithstanding the Council of Constance, it is lawfull for any private man to murder Kings condemned of heresie and tyrannie. And Emanuel Sa writes, That the rebellion of a Clerke against the King is no treason, inasmuch as he is not subiect to him. The which Bellarmino in a manner confirms, saying, The Pope of Rome hath exempted Clerks from their subiection to Princes: Kings are now no more superiours of Clerks. And to proue their doctrine of killing Kings more plainly, he produceth the equiuocations and euasions of Garnet, being apprehended for the powder-treason, the which is iustified by many of that Societie: Iohn l'Heureux writing thus; When any man is drawne into question under an vnjust trial, no man standing bound to reforme against himselfe (as the law of nature teacheth vs plainly) he may peremptorily and freely denie that for which he is called into question, without any longer faison, because he alwaies vnderstands this clause, Ve teneur dicere. Which doctrine is confirmed by diuers other Iesuites: One of them affirming, that the doctrine of Equiuocation is grounded vpon the memorable example of S. Francis. In the end he shewes their opinion touching concealing of confessions, which they hold ought not to be revealed. Iohn l'Heureux writing of that subiect, saies; That a thing sealed up with the most holy signes of Confession, cannot be broken without doubtfull sacrifice: and thus there cannot fall so great a mischief for the revealing of it, which is lawfull to betray a Confession. And Suares adds, Yea though the Iesuite of the whole Common-wealth should stand upon it. By all which proofes he shewes, that it was not Mariana's doctrine alone, to murder Kings, but that all the Iesuites haue erred with him in this, whom Father Cotton cannot iustifie in generall.

Anti-Cotton having set downe the Iesuites doctrine, he proues it by their actions. And first, by the fact of Iohn Chaffel Clerke, brought up in the Iesuites College; who having Barbed the King in the mouth the 27. of December, 1604. being examined vpon sundry questions, and among others, whether he had studied Quintina in the Iesuites College, he answered; That he had beene there vnder Father Garnet, with whom he had continued two yeeres and a halfe. And being asked if he had euer beene in the Chamber of Medications, whether the Iesuites vnder colour to reduce them to a better life, thereby to cause a perturbation in their minds, and consequently vpon such resolutions, to thrust them forward to the vndertaking of some great action: His answer was, that he had often been in this Chamber of Medications. And being questioned, Iesuites doctrine proued by their actions.

A questioned, whether the killing of the King were not an ordinarie discourse among the Iesuites, he answered, that he had heard them say, It was lawfull to kill the King, and that he was no member of the Church, and that we ought not to obey him, nor hold him for our King, until he had receiued approbation from the Pope.

Peter Barriere being apprehended at Melun in April 1593. being discovered by an honest Friar, confessed that he came purposely to Court to kill the King, and that he had bene perswaded thereunto by one Parade a Iesuite, whose daily practise was to defame the King with vile speeches, by whose perswasion he had provided a knife to doe the fact. He first of all discovered his intent to Aubry, Curate of S. Andrew des Arts, who directed him to Parade Rector of the Iesuites College, who confirmed him in his resolution to kill the King, assuring him, that in case he were put to death, he should obtaine in heauen a crowne of Martyr-dome, and adiuuring him vnto this action, vpon the Sacrament of Confession, and the holy Communion. And omitting many other actions of Iesuites both at home and abroad to proue their damnable doctrine, he concludes with Garnet, Hall, and others of the Sect, who were complices in that powder-treason, which was practised to ruine the King and the whole Estates of England.

Iesuits guilty of the Kings murder.

In the end he seeks to proue by many pregnant presumptions, that the Iesuites are guilty of the murder: First, by an advertisement sent from de la Force, the Kings Lieutenant in Bearn, that a Spaniard described by him, was come into France with an intent to kill the King, which Spaniard was brought vnto the King by Cotton, but the King hauing receiued these letters, shewed them to Cotton, and commanded him to bring the Spaniard againe, but he could not be found.

Secondly, the seditious preachings of Gontier and Hardy both Iesuites, the Lent before the fact was committed; inasmuch as the Marhall d'Ornano told the King, that if Gontier had preached so at Bourdeaux, he would haue caused him to be cast into the riuer, and yet he was a very zealous Catholike.

Thirdly, the confession of Rauillac, who iustified vnto Father Aubigny, that he had told him in confession, that he had bene sent to give a great blow, and that he had shewed him the knife, hauing a heart grauen vpon it. But the Iesuite protested, that God had giuen him the Grace to forget that presently, which was revealed to him in Confession; whereby he saved his life.

And last of all, the predictions before the Kings death; as at Bruxelles, where the Iesuites domineere, it was spoken of 12. or 15. daies before it happened. At Prague, a Iesuite had giuen it out, that the King was dead, before it fell out so, and moreover, he told them, that after his death, the Dauphin should not be King, but the King of Spaine, and that for some reasons which Gontier gaue in his Sermons in Lent last: And then the prediction of the Prouost of Pluuiers, that the King was either slaine or hurt that day. He was a Iesuite in faction, and hath a sonne a Iesuite.

Predictions of the Kings death.

The King being dead, the Queene with all the Nobilitie, propounded in Counsell to yeeld him the last dutie in his obsequie: three giues order, as well to pray for his soule, as for all things requisite for the ornament of the Funerall of so great a Monarch. Two daies after the death of this great King, his bodie was laid in a bed, his face bare to the view of all; and then they opened his bodie to embalm it, out of the which they took his heart to carry to la Fleche, and his bowels to S. Denis, as he had appointed in his life time: the which being done, he was laid in a coffin of lead, coated with purple velvet, on the which was a great croffe of white satten. On Whitsunday about foure of the clocke in the morning, his heart being honourably embalmed, and laid in lead, was carried to la Fleche, as we haue said. The bodie being laid in a coffin was set in a chamber hang'd with rich tapestry; and either side were Altars, where there were daily mass said: In the chamber were many formes richly couered, for the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, Cardinals, Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Priests, Abbot, and other Brethren, and Officers of the Church, and nere vnto the holy-virgin Mary, vnto S. Hieronimus, and other S. Fathers were many other seats for religious men, who did ling day and night. Vpon the Kings bodie, were his Crowne, his scepter, and the hand of Justice, vpon a cushion of ambered erize: The Kings bodie remained in the said chamber till the 15. daies together, then was it carried down with great honour, and ceremony into the great lower Hall at the Louue, being intended on by the Bishops, Prelates, and Noblemen of the Court.

Hall of honour

his image.

The said great Hall was hanged with the richest of the Kings Tapistrie, from the top to the bottome, and the pillars and planchers were covered. Along the said Hall there was a Gallery on either side, for the coming in and going forth of Princes and Noblemen, which Galleries were covered with rich Tapistrie. At the vpper end of the said Hall, there was a scaffold made with foure steps, vpon the which was set a great bed-dead, covered with cloth of Gold, vpon the which the Kings Image (being made in wax) was laid, hauing his hands ioyned together, and attired in his royall Robes, with a Crowne vpon his head, the which did rest vpon a Cushion of rich imbrodery. Vpon his royall Mantle was the Collar of the Order, and on either side, were laid the Royall Scepter, and the hand of Iustice, the Scepter on the right hand, and the hand of Iustice on the left.

Neere vnto the said Image were two Altars richly adorned, of either hand one, at that on the right hand was sung a Masse of Requiem in Musicke, and at the other were said foure other great Masses: Ouer either Altar was a rich Canopie, and betwixt the Altars were many seats for Prelates and religious men, who sung as in the foresaid Chamber, and at the lower end of the Hall there were many other Altars richly adorned, wherethey said Masse. The said Image being made as like him as might bee, was daily serued with meat to his table, by his Stewards, Sewers, Cup-bearers, Caruers, Almner, and all other Officers, and all order was duly obserued, as if the deceased King had bene liuing, and then the meat was distributed vnto the poore. The one and twentieth of Iune, the said Image and hangings were taken away, and the said hall both top, sides and floore were hanged and covered with blacke cloth, and the body of the deceased King being in his coffin, was set in the place of the Image, couered with a paul of black veluet, which hung downe to the ground, with a crosse of white fatten, and a cloth of State oner it of blacke veluet: vpon the Kings Coffin, were the Crowne, the collar of the Order, the Scepter, and the hand of Iustice. At the foot thereof was a great crosse of silver, vpon a cushion, neere vnto the which were two great tapers burning continually, and a holy water-pot of silver: on either side of which stood a Herald, the which were euery two houres releued by other of their companions which took their places. On the 25. of Iune, Lewis the 13. now reigning, dined in Longueville house, after dinner he was conducted with great state to the Louvre, to cast holy water vpon the body of the deceased King his father, being accompanied by his brethren, who were carried of either side of him, the Duke of Orleans on the right hand, and the Duke of Anjou on the left. Neere vnto his Majesty followed the Cardinals of Ioyuze and Sourdy. The King mourned in purple hauing a very long traine, the which was carried vp by the Prince of Conty, the Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Guise, the Prince Ionulle, and the Duke of Elbeuf: being followed by the Marshals of France, and the Knights of the Order: Many Bishops, Prelates, and Noblemen, and an infinite number of men of account, Ladies and Gentlewomen were in the said hall, attending the Kings coming, who hauing giuen holy water, retired himselfe into the Louvre. The next day the Iudges of the Court of Parliament at the rising of the Court, went also after their accustomed manner to the Louvre, to cast holy water, being followed by the Iudges of the Chambers of accounts and aides, the Generalls of the monny, and the whole body of Iustice, the Prouost of Paris, the Prouost of Marchants, and the Sheriffs of the said City. On the 28. day of the moneth, the 24. sorrowe Cries of the City, hauing commande-ment giuen them, went with the Kings armes on their breasts and backs, thorowout all the streets of Paris, to depounce the Conuoy and funeral of the deceased King, crying out thus with a loud voice: Noble and deuout people, pray vnto God for the soule of the most high, most mayghty, and most excellent Prince, Lewis the great, by the grace of God, King of France, and of Nauarre, most Christian, most venerable, most victorious, his incomparable magnanimity and cleuency, who is dead in his Palace of the Louvre, pray vnto God to receiue his soule. On Tuesday at two of the clocke, in the afternoon, his Majesties body shall be taken vp to be carried to our Ladies Church in Paris, where the same day shall be said an Euen-song for the dead, and the next day in the morning the seruice and accustomed prayers shall be said, after which he shall be carried to the Church of Sainte Denys, to be interred in the Sepulcher of the Kings of France.

The order of

On Tuesday the nine and twentieth day the streets were hang with blacke on either side from the Louvre to our Ladies Church, vpon the which were the Kings armes, one peere vnto another, and at euery house a burning torch. About the 6. of the clocke in the afternoon, the same day, the funeral began, after this manner: First marched the Captaine,

They followed Benjamin the tiger, carrying the golden spurs: Behind another rider came after him with the Gentlers: Plumes carried after a Scutcheon with the armes of France and Navarre, and another Rider carried the coat of armes.

After all these came the fifth Querrie, who carried the Helmet mantled with purple veluet, Sewet Flower-de-Luces of gold, and lined with Ermines, and upon the Helme was a royall Crowne, all covered with blacke Ouyees: all the riders which carried these peeces of honour, were on horse-backe, with long mourning gowndes and hoods.

After these marched the Preachers, Confessors and Almoners of the deceased King. Then followed on foot seenteene Archbishops and Bishops, two and two; all with white Miters, and blacke Veluet Copes, after whom marched the Archbishop of Lions alone, and a good distance from the rest. Then went the Ambassadors of Sauoy, Venice and Spaine on horse-backe, in mourning gowndes with long traines, every one being carried by six of their Officers, every of which Ambassadors was conducted by an Archbishop or a Bishop mounted vpon moyles.

After them came the Popes two Nuncios, the ordinary and the extraordinary, and of either side of them went the Archbishops of Aix and Ambrun, mounted vpon their moyles. Then followed the Cardinals of Joyeuz and Surdy with their purple Copes and red hats, being also mounted vpon their moyles, and followed by their Officers.

After all these went the horse of honour, all covered with purple Veluet, imbrodered with Floure-de-Luces of gold, and fringed about with gold, the saddle and stirrups were richly gilt; there was nothing to be seene of the horse but the eyes; he was led by either reine by two Squires, being a foot and their hoods on. Of either side of the said horse marched ten Heralds, in mourning gowndes and hoods, having their coats of armes vpon their gowndes imbrodered with Floure-de-Luces of gold.

Then followed the Master of the horse, his horse being all covered with blacke Veluet, and a great crosse of white satten, carrying the royall sword in a scabb, and a scabbard of purple veluet, richly embrodered with Floure-de-Luces of gold.

After him came fourteene Vilers of the Court of Parliament, with wands in their hands, and after them the Presidents and Counsellors in their scarlet robes, being eighty nine in number. After whom went two Vilers of the Chamber with their Maces, being bare-headed, and then followed the Bishop of Paris, and the Bishop of Angers on his left hand, with their Miters, Surplices and Coapes of blacke veluet. Then followed the Kings Image in the same honour as it was lying in the great Hall at the Louvre, holding in his right hand the Royall scepter, and in his left the hand of Iustice, being carried by the porters of salt in Paris: About which Image went many Presidents and Counsellors of the great Chamber, and the Scottish guard. The ground of the Canopie was of purple cloth of Tissue, all embrodered with Floure-de-Luces, and fringed with gold, the which was carried by the Prouost of Merchants, and the Sheriffes of the Citie of Paris.

After which came the Earle of Saint Paul, carrying the Lord Stewards staffe, representing the Earle of Soissons, Lord Steward of France, on the right hand, and the Cheualier of Guise, representing the Duke of Elquillon, great Chamberlaine, carrying the banner of France on the left hand, being mounted vpon great coursers, covered with blacke Veluet, with crosses of white satten.

The Prince of Conty marched after them, vpon a little horse all covered, having a mourning gowne with a long traine, and vpon it the colour of the Order; his traine was carried vp by seven Gentlemen.

The

A The Earle of Soissons followed him, being also on horse-backe, attired in the like habit, and with the order. After whom came the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf on horse-back in the same weed, but without the Order: the Duke of Elbeuf followed them, in the same mourning attire, and with the Order: and then came the Duke of Montbazon, with the same order and habit; their traines were carried vp by Gentlemen which attended the. Then followed the Viler of the Order, carrying a blacke wand in his hand; being in his mourning gown, and his hoods off. After the Princes & dukes came the Knight of the order on foot, with their collors vpon their mourning gowndes, their traines were carried vp by their pages. And then followed a great number of the Nobility, in order two and two:

B After whom came the twelve Pages of the Chamber, attired in blacke veluet, & caps. And last of all marched the Captaines of foure hundred Archers of the Kings guard, with their Ensignes, being followed by all the Archers of the said guards, carrying their armes to the ground, they hauing gowndes and hoods. Before they came from the Louvre, there was some difference betwixt some great men, the court of Parliament, and the Scottish guard, but the Queenes wisdom and foresight did pacifie all without brute. This is the order which was held from the Louvre to our Ladies Church, the way they went was ouer the new bridge along the Angullines key, and then ouer S. Michaels Bridge, to the new market, and so to our Ladies Church, into the which they entred at nine of the clock at night.

The body of the deceased King was set in the midst of the Quier of the said Church, vnder a burning Chappell, the which was made of the height of two pikes (it was so called, for that it had an infinite number of wax candles that were continually burning on it.) The Quier of the aforelaid Church was hanged round about with blacke cloth, and in the midst of the said cloth was a band of veluet, on the which there were fastened Scutcheons of the Kings armes, within two foot one of another. The great body of the said Church, was also hung in like manner, and all along were two ranks of waxe tapers, and the same night Euenlong and Vigile for the dead was said. The next day in the morning, being the last day of Iune, the Princes, Cardinals, Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, the Court of Parliament, the Conuents, Parishes, and all those that had accompanied the Kings body the day before, came vnto our Ladies Church, about ten of the cloke in the morning.

D whereas diuine seruice was said by the Bishop of Paris. After the offering, the Bishop of Sets made the funerall Oration, the which continued a good houre. The seruice being done about two of the clocke in the afternoone, the Princes, Cardinals, Bishops, and all the chiefe men went to dine in the Bishops Palace, and thereabouts, where preparation was made for them. In the meane time the first began to march every one in his first ranke and order, as they had done the day before, from the Louvre vnto the said Church: they went ouer our Ladies bridge, and so through S. Denis street, and without any stay, vntill they came to S. Denis in France. The streets from our Ladies Church vnto Saint Denis gate were hanged on either side with blacke. Vpon which were fixed the Kings armes, and those of the City, about an elle distant one from the other. The religious men, Curats of E Parishes, with the Fathers, Confessors, Almoners, Bachelers, Regents of the Vniuersity, and Doctors of Diuinity, did accompany the Kings body through the City in their order, vnto the Church of S. Ladre, which is in S. Denis suburbs, and then most of them retired, and left the body, the which was accompanied by the whole Court, his Officers, the court of Parliament, the Princes, Dukes, Earles, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Captaines, Guards, and Archers, and by the Chanoins of our Ladies Church, vnto the crosse which is in the mid-way of S. Denis, where the Prior and Religious men of S. Denis came to recelue the body. There the Priests of all the parishes departed, and the Princes, Cardinals, Bishops, Dukes, Earles, Noblemen, with all the Kings Court, the court of Parliament & Officers attended the body vnto S. Denis Church, where it was layed vnder a burning Chappell, and there F Vigels and Suffrages said for the dead. The Church of S. Denis was all hanged both body and Quier with blacke cloth, and in the midst of it there was a large band of blacke veluet, vpon which were Scutcheons with the Kings armes fixed. The High Masse was celebrated by the Cardinal of Joyeuz, and answered in Musick: After the offering, the Bishop of Angers made a funerall Oration. The offices being ended, and the accustomed prayers said, the Master of the Ceremonies tooke vp from the Kings body, the Crowne, the Scepter, and the hand of Iustice, which lay vpon it, and withall the coverings of cloth of gold: Then the Gentlemen Waiters and the Archers carried the body into the vault.

which is before the high Altar of the said Church, vpon the right hand. Then came the Cardinal vnto the vault, and cast earth vpon the body, and the last holy water: which done, he fete downe on the one side of the said vault, by the high Altar, and the Master of the Ceremonies on the other; Betwixt both stood a Herald, who called the Noblemen and Gentlemen, which had caried the peeces of honour, one after one, the which being brought by them, were cast into the vault.

This done, the Earle of Saint Paul strucke the Lord Stewards staffe against the ground, and sayd in a low voice. The King is dead. Then the said Herald taking the word, cryed out three times, The King is dead. The King is dead. The King is dead, Pray all vnto God for his soule. Then all fell vpon their knees, with teares in their eyes.

Soone after, the sayd Earle of Saint Paul, tooke his staffe againe, and said God save the King, and then the Herald tooke the word, and cryed out thrice, God save the King Lewis the thirteenth of that name, by the grace of God King of France, and of Nauarre, the most Christian, our most Soueraigne Lord and good Master, to whom God giue a most happy and long life. Which hauing said, the trumpets, drummes, phifes, hautbois and flutes began to found. After which euery one of the Noblemen and Gentlemen tooke againe the peeces of honour which they had layd into the vault, and the Princes and chiefe of the Nobility were conducted into the great Hall, where the funeral Feast was prepared for their dinner. Euery one hauing dined, the Presidents and Councillors of the Court of Parliament, of the Chamber of Accounts, of Aydes, Generals of the money, Magistrates of the City of Paris, and other officers, came into the said Hall, whereas the Earle of Saint Paul holding his staffe in his hand, made a short speech vnto them touching the Kings death, to whom hee offered his seruice, promising to recommend them vnto the King now raigning, to maintain them in their offices and estates. And in token that his place was also voyde, he brake his staffe in their presence.

There were many funeral Orationes made in diuers parts vpon this lamentable subiect, euery one struing to discouer the griefe of his soule, by the eloquence of his tongue, among which I haue made choice of one, as followeth.

A Funeral discourse, made vpon the death of the deceased King, by the Bishop of Sens chiefe Almoner to the Queene.

MY minde is so oppress'd with horror, so wounded with griefe, and so troubled with amazement (be it for the feeling of present things, or the apprehension of future) as I know not what bounds to giue my thoughts in their amazement, nor what Rule to my words in their complaint: being vnable to gouerne the one by the lawes of iudgement, nor the other by those of Rhetoricke.

Shall the miserable point of a vild and base knife, handled by an enraged Monster, inspired rather with a Deuill then a reasonable soule, be hereafter ordained traitorously to murder the greatest Monarches of the earth? and that which the condition of a man should hold most reuerent, as well by the institution of God, as by the consent of nations, shall it hereafter be expoid, not to the fury of some great and fearefull enemy, who by the lawes of his victorious sword, shall barbarously deprive him both of life and state, but to the frenzy of the most abiect and contemptible vagabond, which lurkes among the scumme of the people: so as by wicked perfwalions, or by cursed illusions, hee may be drawne to this impious resolution, to giue his life, so as he may take away that of a great Potentate, and to ruine himselfe, so as he may ruine him withall. O lamentable age which doeth behold such accidents! O cursed earth which doeth produce such monsters!

It is almost 21 yeares since our late King Henry the third, after so many great and famous victories: which this Realme owes to the happinesse of his sword, when as the prosperitie of his affaires was ready to open him the gates of Paris, being all that time rebelled against his Lawes, and to fettle him in the Throne of his fathers, from whence the fury of his people had in a manner delected him, was miserably slaine in his cabinet, by the villanous knife of an infamous petty humane fury, who to haue access vnto this religious Prince, vsed (as a passport throughout the army) the name and habit of a religious man.

We did not thinke the Sun should euer see the like, as I thinke it had neuer seene, but we did imagine that as this parricide had no president, so it should finde no imitation; but behold

A hold (wretches that we are) at the end of twenty resolutions of yeares, we find our selues plunged in the same gulfe of sorrowes, and confusion of affaires, that we were then: and by the like accident, and in a manner the like murderer reduced by the blow of a knife, no lesse contemptible then the other, to the like or greater despaire, and to more lamentable miseries, our losse being so much the more grievous, as the wife and mild gouernment of our last Prince, with the disposition of the affaires, made his life more necessary for this Estate; and the parricide so much the more detestable, as this good King hauing wronged no man, and received so many, but rather bound all the world vnto him by his bounty, and shewed his power rather in pardoning and sauing, then in punishing and destroying: for which reason he should not be hated of any one, but of such (if there be any such) whom good deedes incite to doe ill, and of whom to haue well deserved, is a sufficient subiect to be hated. I pray you what can be obserued in the life of this Prince, where they haue seene his indignation employ the severity of the publike sword to reuenge any private iniury of his owne? what hath he euer done since his comming to the Crowne, but vanquish and pardon: change by a royall Metamorphosis, with the Charms of his bounty, his very enemies to faithfull seruants? as well to suppress their hatred by good vsage, as their power by the force of his armes, and by his free confidence to binde the faith of the most faithlesse to serue him, loyally? without doubt I do not finde that euer Prince did equall him in this, whose life doth not rather serue him as a lustre to make his glory shine the more, then of comparison to shew any equality. We haue heard him sometimes say that he would make his guards vnecessary, shewing by his words the confidence which the remembrance of his mild actions gaue him. Alas! poore Prince! thou hast done it: thou hast made the care of thy guards fruitlesse and euen that which thou didst royally vaunt of, we do now lament bitterly: It succeeded ill for thee, for if thou hadst not refused the faithfull seruice of their ordinary assistance, when as the vnhappyneesse of France did seeme to lead thee to that cursed and farall street, the which thy death hath for euer made odious vnto vs, we should rather now haue bene troubled to sing thy victories, then to weepe for thy lamentable death: and rather busied to erect Trophies for thee, then to prepare thee a monument & funeral pompe. But who would not in a manner say that the events of things which are called contingent and casual (for that they seeme so to them which know not the motives) are tyed to their first causes, with such chaimes of necessity, as it is almost impossible for the wit of man to auoyd them, either by the counsell of any other, or by his owne providence? No man is ignorant but that this miserable accident was enigmatically foretold him by the inspection of his particular Horoscope, almost at the same time when it hapned. His most dearest did aduertise him the most learned in that art besought him to haue a care of himselfe: the mournfull dreame which some few daies before, the Queene his faithfull Spouse had had lying by his side, and awaking suddenly with the terror of her vision, was also a speaking Image of his future misfortune, which should haue serued him as an Oracle to make him more carefull of his preservation, if the courage of his Prince had bene capable of amazement, and if he had had for himselfe the thousand part of the iust feare which did afflicke vs continually. But as nothing can assure a Hare, so nothing can amaze a Lyon. The memory of his royall actions, and the consideration of his mildnesse, whereby he bound all the world to loue him, made all such attempts incredible vnto him. He did rather cast the eye of his thoughts vpon his own bounty, then vpon anothers wickednesse. It was Caesar which would neither giue credit to his wife Spuria, nor to his faithfull Calphurnia, and it seemes he must of necessity imitate his disaster, as he had imitated his clemency and valor: wherefore in our complaints we accuse him to haue procured his owne death by the refusal of his Guards, and in a manner condemning him as culpable, we grow passionate against him for whom we are oppress'd with passions: yet in the end, looking with the eyes of Iudgment vpon the first Mouer of all our fortunes, who by the rauiishment of his incomprehensible course, drawes all after him, what resistance loeuer they seeme to make, we do presently absolue him of the fauor which in shew hee gaue vnto this detestable Parricide, and accuse only our owne offences, which deserved this punishment, and the tormenting treachery of that infernall monster, whom the vnhappyneesse of this Realme had made choice of, to execute so brutish and barbarous a murder. For as Saint Jerome saith well, Cursed is he who for his vices meritis to be the executioner of wicked and sinful actions, as by the instruments of cursednesse is selfe.

And what act can be imagined, more wicked, more farall, and more cursed, then trayterously to murder his owne King? His lawfull Prince? His visible God on earth? Who the Soueraine King of Kings hath himselfe anointed by the hand of his Ministers, at the foote of his Altars, to make him as it were the Lieutenant of all his power amongst men, and the humane Image of his diuine Maiefty? But can there be any found so wicked as to make this proposition disputable? Hath it not been decided by the mouth of the Holy Ghost, in the decrees of the Law of Grace? Our Saviour as man, and the son of David, was the true King of Iury, as well as King of the whole world by his diuinity: So as if he had pleased him to re-establish his temporall Kingdom; the Gouernors of Iury had been but his Lieutenants: And yet when he was vniuilly accused before Pilate, hee refused not his Iudgement, neither did he tell him that he did vsurpe vpon him (being the true Prince and Magistrate) an vnlawfull and tyrannous power: but he only answered him in milde and re-spectiue termes, Thou shouldst haue no power ouer me, if it were not giuen thee from above.
And St. Paul besides the commendement which hee giueth vs to obey our Princes and Lords, although they be bad, hauing by chance offended in words, the High Priests of the Iewes, and being aduertised thereof, he answered, condemning himselfe, Brethren, I did not know that it was the High Priest, for it is written, Thou shalt not speake ill of the Prince of the people. How then? If it be not tollerable to speake ill of our Princes, shall it be lawfull to murder them? And not with the publike sword, which sometimes a generall rebellion of subiects against their Kings, puts into the hand of a furious multitude; but with the dagger or knife of any desperate mad man, who imagining, that hee is chosen of God for such an enterprize, wil of his owne motion make himselfe Iudge, Accuser, and Executioner, altogether, of him, whom he should not looke on but with trembling, or at the least with the reuerence which is due vnto the liuely Image of the Monarch of all the world. And I pray you what will be the end, if it be lawfull for euery private man, nor onely to censure the actions, but the very intentions of his Prince, and holding them reprehensible, not before any other tribunall but himselfe, and his owne fancy, to vsurpe insolently a commision to punish him, as if he were some new Levi, secretly anointed by the hand of a Prophet, to revenge the sins of Achab, and to raigne in his place? Oh wretched & most cursed are they which by such maxims incourage weake and superstitious soules to such wicked & damnable resolutions, and who vnder a shadow of piety, make them dare things so monstrous-ly impious. But it may be I declaine against an opinion, which is not approved by any one in France, and that his brethren, who they say did sow it in other countries, and vnder another heauen, like an accursed graine of hell, doe abhor, condemne & detest it. As without all doubt it is detestable, and the booke which seemes to confirme it, worthy to burne the hand of the Author in his owne flame, as a damnable infant which should punish his father for giuing him life. For although he speaks not of any but tyrants, the which doth nothing concerne our Kings, being the true and lawfull and iust Princes of this Estate, yet doth he giue vnder this proposition (most wicked of it selfe) a silent praise of a murder like vnto that which we now lament: And who knows not that to commend an action, is secretly to perwade the like? Moreover, from this Maxime which doth only concerne tyrants, may be drawne most wicked & dangerous conclusions. For if he hold it for certaine that it is lawfull for any man to kill a tyrant, what Prince liuing, how lawfull soeuer, can be hereafter assured of his life in the midst of his guards, and in his chair of State. The greatest Monarches do they as soone as they are Kings change their humane and finfull nature into one that is diuine and perfect, and not subiect to sin, and shall they neuer more commit error which may in any sort scandalize their subiects? No, no, they are still men in imperfection, although they seeme Gods in power: neither doth greatnesse, which giues the more meanes to sin, take from them the desire. And will there not be alwaies found, some extraneous spirit in their Provinces, who censuring their faults, it may bee, more bitterly then he ought, will arraigne them in his fancy, giue them his imaginations for soueraigne Iudges, will conuict them to be tyrants, and as such will seek to murder them, if hee can come neere them? Yes without doubt, there will be alwaies some one found, And this venomous seed will find some soyle to make it fructifie, especially if they crowne so depre-sate an enterprize with praises, if they propound the recompence of an eternall & future life, to those who to execute it, lose the present and mortall life, and yet they call the punishment of such murders Martyrdom, communicating vnto murderers and Parricides, the

A the glory of Saints, and of the blessed Champions of our faith. Wherefore oh all you Kings and Princes of the earth, which shall hear the report of this horrible affluinate, you haue an interest in this lamentable accident, whether you loue vs, be our enemies, or hold vs indifferent; and the murder of our Prince should fill you with horror and amazement, for your selues; there being not any one of you, whom the same knife by which this great Monarch receiued death, doth not threaten with the like aduenture: when as neither the innocency of his life, the glory of his actions, the wonders of his valor, his mildnesse, bounty, freedom, piety, liberality, wisdom, and all other royall vertues, shall not shroud and protect any, against the impious presumption of the like frenzy. For if we shall distinctly measure all the actions of his life, by the particular rule of euery one of the vertues which B I named, I assure my selfe that in some he shall be found without equal, in others without a superior, and in all without a second. And to begin by the innocency of his life (I alwaies except those fraile and humane sins, which make the most iust culpable before God) can they iustly reproach him, that he hath against reason attempted against the life, honor or goods of any one of his subiects? Did he euer take away any mans wife by force? And hath it euer beene scene that by his incontinency, as by that of many other Princes, the beauty of Ladies hath benee farall to their husbands? The delights of a goodly house did neuer cost the Masters life: and during his raigne hath there beene found a new Quintus Aurelius, or a second Naboth, which haue accused their goodly vines & farmes to be the causes of their death? His greatest cholier and indignation against any one, was it euer made a crime against them whom he hath most hated? No, no, but contrarywise that royall soule which had nothing in it but courage, seemed to saile in reuenge: and although that offences and seruices did equally touch him, yet had he no memory but for the last.
As for his valor, whosoever holds it vulgar and ordinary, after so many proofes which he hath giuen within these twenty yeares, he hath had neither eyes nor eares, or else made himselfe and enuy hath made him stop them. France doth proclaime it sufficiently by the eter-nall memory of so many combats, so many encounters, and so many towne besieged. We will produce new testimonies, when his owne enemies shall cease to confesse it: we will ex-toll him with new praises, when euen those whom he hath vanquished shall forbear to D preach it: and finally, we will note them particularly, when as Arques, Yury, Fontaine, Francoise, Aumale, Noion, and many other Theaters of his glory, that is, when as mountains, vallies, fields, rampars of the towne, and in a manner all the corners of France shall cease to witnesse it. I will say the like of his clemency: for as the fields covered with dead bodies were the proofes of his valor, in like manner, so many towne preferred from sacke and spoile, during the greatest furie of his victorious armes, are and shall bee for euer the monuments of his mildnesse and bounty. But this needs no more confirmation of proofes then his valour: they are both without contestation, as well as without comparision. His vanquished enemies confesse the one, and his subiects preferred witnesse the other. The A acts of the one haue bene in a manner alwaies signed with blood: the acts of other, haue bene most commonly with teares of ioy, and pity: as if he had receiued as great pleasure to pardon, as glory to vanquish: and as if to raise vp with an vnarmed hand, an enemy lying prostrate, after the combats, were as royal as to overthrow him valiantly with sword in fighting. I know well one action in his life may be noted, wherein his clemency hath as it were suspended his ordinary effects, to giue way to the security of his subiects: but the griefe which he seemed to haue in his soule, that he could not without danger, extend vpon the accused, the golden rod of his grace, and making consideration of his offences with his seruices, pardon his error, the loue of his valor, doth witness sufficiently that he was forced therunto, by the authority of the Lawes which he desired to see in force by reason of state, which did oppose against his mercy, and by that wife Maxime which faith, that there is no
F thing more dangerous then to bring a great courage to the place of execution, and then draw him backe: for that he doth alwaies remember the affront, and forgets the pardon.
As for his confidence and trust: Alas! we haue by too many proofes, and I would so God this vertue had not bene so great in him: I testifie which hath vndone vs, for that he hath thereby, vndone himselfe. We reuerence the memory of all his other perfec-tions, but doubtlesse we may iustly hate and remembre and proofes of this. Why may hee not more distrustfull? Why did he not feare like vnto other Princes, who hold that a moderate distrust is one of the parts of wisdom? Hee had reason to feare waies

waies with his sword in his hand in the middest of combats, where it is a crime (at the least à Caesar) to shew any feare? Not to feare is a great perfection in batells, to assure his owne fouldiers, and to strike terror into his enemies: for feare is contrary to all other things: only they which haue it not, may giue much. But yet this vertue, as all other, must be restrained within the center of mediocrity, being equally distant from her extremes. It is as great an error not to feare any thing, as to feare euery thing: and without doubt by too much confidence, men are made too bold.

In the meane time we doe not forbear to commend this vertue in him, although we doe now complain, for that he did ground it, neither vpon his valour, nor vpon his power neither vpon the care of his seruants, nor vpon the ranks of armes, which did enuiron him hourly: but vpon the only protection, safeguard and fauour of him, who can presecute the silly sheepe amongst rauens and deuouring Volues, and can make Lions stand in feare of Hares. As on a time falling vpon that discourse, and we seeming to wish that he would not so lightly expose himselfe, and that in fearing somewhat more, hee should giue vs lesse subiect to feare. He answered vs with the words of the two and twentieth Psalm. The Lord is the light which guides me, and my health, what should I feare, &c. according to the instruction which he had learned from his infancy.

As for his pietie, the life which he had led from his infancy, being in a manner borne and nursed in armes, was the cause he could not make it so apparent to the sight of the world as it is great and visible to our God. But yet I will say, without flattery, that I did neuer see a warrior, that was more religious: being not ceremonious; who seeking not the outward shew, had more of the effects. Such as did obserue his life and actions more strictly than my selfe, know well, and doe witness it, that he seldom dressed himselfe, before he had humbly made his prayer vpon his knees. Sometimes briefly, but yet his zeale did recompence the shortnesse: sometimes with a longer prayer, which did not abate his zeale.

This did he often at night, offering to God by this meanes, the first fruits, and the remainder of the day. For my part, I haue seene him sometimes, Masse being ended, and when as all men were risen, to continue at his prayers vpon his knees, with such signes of true pietie, as I was in a manner ashamed for vs who should haue beene an example to him, and not he to vs. And to say that it was a fained hypocrisie, the humor of this Prince far from dissembling, both by nature and custome, would make this slander incredible. I spare to speake of other publike testimonies of his zeale to Christian Religion, for that they are well knowne to all the world; as well those by the which he hath newly raised from their ashes, and more richly endowed many Churches that were ruined; as those by the which he hath caused the standard of the crose to be freely worshipped in Constantinople, & in this Babylon of all the Turkish Empire, the perpetuall sacrifice foretold by Malachi, to be celebrated. But I will not conceal that when as he gaue Bishopricks to such as he held capable, he recommended vnto them with great care the duties of their charges: the pastoral care of their flocks, the preaching of the word of God, an exemplary life, extirpation of abuses, and other holy Episcopall duties, which he said were the onely meanes to ruine heresie infensibly, rather vndermining it secretly then to seek to beat it downe by open violence. Neither will I conceal how careful hee was to inquire, if any one gone astray were newly returned to the Catholike Church, and how ioyfull hee was to vnderstand that any one of worth had therein followed his example. For although he would not haue any one forced, no more then he could endure to be himselfe, yet hee tooke great delight to vnderstand that reason had done that in any one, which the threats of fire & sword, had attempted in vaine at the massacre of S. Bartolomew: Thinking that the surest means to draw one vnto God, was by the care vnto the heart, and that the sweetnesse of perswasions should be the onely violence.

What shall I say of liberality, the which of all his vertues hath been least recommended in him? Those which haue a hand with the greatest in the gouernment of publike affaires, and especially of the treasure, will be witnesses with me, that as well in pensions as in free gifts, he gaue ready euery yeare 300000 pounds sterling, dispersed here and there vpon an infinite number of persons, like vnto the lewes Manna quere all the people of Israel. Was not this to giue? What King of France did euer exceed him, how soeuer he were reputed to be another Alexander in liberality? Without doubt I doe not thinke that there is any Prince or Monarch liuing that can equal him in this bounty.

A And why then hath he not beene esteemed for this vertue, as well as for the glory of the rest? It is, as I conceiue, for that an infinite number of men hauing assisted him in the conquest of his owne Realme, with their meanes, persons, tongues, pens, authority and industry, and finally with all that their condition did permit, and euery one imagining that this Prince was bound vnto him for part of his Crowne: the greatest part of them held his free gifts for iust payments and recompences due vnto them: whereupon many being lesse thankfull vnto him then they ought; and on the other side, many being not recompensed nor rewarded, who notwithstanding held themselves to be as well deserving as those that were gratified, and by consequence held their good vltage to be a priuate wrong done vnto them: whereby it happened, that most of them that receiued, spake not any thing, and such as receiued not, complained bitterly: whence grew in my opinion that fame so contrary to his effects, and that imputation so maliciously repugnant to the truth. But such as would curiously search into the truth, and not vnto that which was spoken, they shall finde, that in this perfection he hath shewed himselfe as it were superior to himselfe, in regard of his other more eminent vertues: At the least in this point hee hath bene superior to all the Kings now liuing vpon earth.

Also, he neuer had knowledge of any excellent man within his Realme, especially being recommended for the glory of his learning, whom he did not fauour with some honest pension: and the rather if he had a Pen which might make the fame and honour of his acts liue eternally; for as he loued to doe things commendable and praise-worthy, so he desired to be praised. Wherefore such as hee found to haue golden Pens, hee made their condition to be of gold: neyther had the Vniuersitie of Paris euer a more iust subiect to hope for a resurrection, if I may so terme it, of the glory which he hath sometimes had in the world, as the should promise vnto her during his reigne, and by his bounty, by the desire which wee saw him haue to build and enrich great Colledges, whereas Schollers might be freely taught, and the Schoolemasters haue good entertainment: besides the publike Chaires filled with excellent men, whom with rich conditions he desired to call from all parts of the world.

But in the meane time, alas! so many rare vertues which did shine in him like goodly Starres in their mansions, haue not hindered but that the wretched fortune of France hath found an infernall monster among men, who without any respect of royall Maiesty, had no horror to murder him traiterously, to precipitate at an instant this Estate from the top of glory, greatnesse, and power, whereunto the widome and valour of so great a Monarke had raised it, into a gulle of totall ruine, or at the least into a Chaos of an immortal confusion of affaires. For, what could be lesse expected from so sudden and terrible a clap, but the totall ruine of the body whose head was so miserably taken away, what widome soeuer shine in the discreet moity, which he hath left behinde him, to hold his place for a time, and to represent him during the minority of the King his Sonne? Certainly it is the iust effect of humane providence, that we reare it: but in that it happens not, it is the mercy and grace of God: besides the wise gouernment of so vertuous a Queene, and the fidelity of the great Princes of France: But by the wise gouernment of the one, and the royall obedience of the other, both lightened with the beames of a wife and faithfull Councell, this blow which should haue ruined vs all, hath but afflicted vs desperately; and for floods of blood which should haue flowed, the wrath of heauen is contented with streames of teares.

No, no, execrable Fury, who by so detestable a murder, hast brought vs to the brink of our preceipe, vaunt not insolently in hell, that thou hast ruined the Empire of the French, as thou haddest prepoounded vnto thy selfe, that hauing murdered the Father, and the Prince.

F Thou hast indeed shaken it, but in despite of thy impious hope it shall subsist for euer by the assistance of God, great, happy, triumphant, rich, mighty and glorious, alwaies the feare of our enemies, the honour of Europe, the hope of her Allies, the wonder of Strangers, and the protector of the Church, as well as the eldest Sonne. Such as thought (with thee) to see her glory for euer laid in the gaue, shall not see it at this time but a little infirme and sicke for griefe, for the death of her father: But after this mourning pall, which habite she weares by thy treachery, she shall resume her former beauty and force, and shall raige as before, either triumphing in war, or flourishing in peace, like vnto those solid solid Triangles which stand right with one point vpwards howsoeuer you turne them. I A doe preface it both by this marke of heauenly fauour, which doth shine like vnto a fortunate star vpon the forehead of our new Prince, and by the incredible tranquillity of the State, which the wisdom and care of the Queene, his vertuous Mother, and our wife Regent, hath made suddenly to succeed the preparatiues of so great and cruell a storme. Wherefore burne more then euer in the eternall flames which torment thee, with an enraged despiight to see thy hopes frustrate, accursed soule that thou art, who diddest promise vnto thy selfe to ruine to great a Kingdome, in ouerthrowing the Pillar of her greatness, and hast executed but one of the two: Our God suffering the one for our sinnes, but preferring vs from the other for his glory.

And you, oh wife Princeesse! whole happy wisdom doth in a manner keepe the publike from feeling of this losse, and makes vs iustly to say, That our deceased King liues in our Queene Regent, as not able to dye whilst that you are liuing: Continue, great Attemesta, continue as you haue happily begun, to entertaine by good order this great body of the Estate in his disposition and former health; not suffering bad humours to engender for want of precautions, which inehed end may cause some burning feuer of sedition. Entertaine this wonderfull calme, which raigens by your conduct vpon the waues of so great a Sea of publike affaires, and of different passions, as they be which wee may imagine should proceede from the flowing & ebbing of so many people, subiect to your obedience, and especially of so many great men which do assit you, who most commonly are caried away with contrary respects. Imagine, I beseech you, imagine that great Monarke (who to raigne elsewhere in a more happy Empire, hath consigned vnto you his Scepter and his Crowne, to the end you should preferre it for the King his Sonne) saies vnto you, as coming from heauen to comfort you in your cares, and to fortifie you in your glorious trauell; My deare Moyerie, seeing that death hath separated vs, touching the corporall vnion, it is a great content vnto me, to see thee with such happy successe begin to hold my place in the throne of this Kingdome. I see thee gouerne thy selfe so wisely, as I cannot with more for the good of my Sonne, and my subiects, but that in this part of gouernment thou wilt be alwaies equal vnto thy selfe. Cause the King my Sonne to be bred vp in the loue and feare of God, rather then in all humane sciences, holding it for certaine, that in seruing God humbly, he shall command men absolutely. Do what you can to procure him peace, vntill that a more manlike age shall suffer him to doe that which his infancy doth yet seeme to forbid him, peace gathers treasure together, war dispersteth it: and it is no small meane to make a Prince to be feared, and to retaine his neighbours from attempting against him, to bee reputed to haue his Cofers full of gold and silver, as well as his Store-houses full of Armes. Continue this course which I see thee take, not to determine any thing of importance, but in Councell, and to assit thee daily, force the naturall delicacy of thy sex, forgetting in a manner that thou art a woman, to support the trauels of a man bred vp in the toyles of affaires, and to put off the person of a Queene, to assume that of a King. Yet vse a moderation in thy continuall care, and labour in these royall vocations, as thou maist long labour in them: for thy life is alwaies more necessary for France, then thy daily presence is for the Councell. I haue held great men tied to the yoke of my obedience as much by benefites and good vñage, as themselves are retained by consideration of their duties, and my authority. Perseuer as much as you may to follow my steps in this course, vñing these meanes as a coyne of such price, as for it they giue that which is inestimable, that is to say, life: and remember that thou dost command Frenchmen, that is to say, Freemen, to whom a good countenance serues often for recompence; but yet in the end they fall off, if the field of their hopes brings forth nothing but flowers: this good iudgment which God hath giuen thee, will make thee know (as I see the experience) how far royall greatness should admit of easie access, and the familiarity which the French doe commonly desire of their Prince. For doubtlesse, as too much austeritie is the losse of loue, so too much familiarity makes them to neglect respect: vse it then as wisdom shall aduise thee. But about all things seeke by all possible meanes to ease the people, and to haue the lesse subiect to leauy mony, draw thy selfe as little as may be into necessity to spend, to the end, that being first blest of God, and then of men, thou maist reape more happy fruits of the prayers which I make incessantly in heaven, for thy prosperitie, for that of my Sonne, and of the whole Realme.

Thinke

A Thinke I say Madam, that this great Prince doth sometimes in your dreame make such or the like exhortations vnto you. Although it be a raffinesse in vs to presume to put you in minde by fained words and conception, of one part of that which either the oracle of his mouth, or the wise discourses of your excellent spirit doth speake vnto your thoughts.

But pardon (if it please you) our zeale, which makes vs erre by a desire of well doing, and that falling vpon the lamentable subiect to witness the vertues, greatness, and glory of that incomparable Monarch, we had rather flammer then be silent, and rather saile in the lawes of discretion, then in those of affection. I haue receiued from his grace and liberality, and partly by your intercession, the liuinges, and Ecclesiasticall dignities which I enioy: his bounty did esteeme my writings much aboute their merit: and his greatness did not disdaine to looke vpon me sometime with a good eye: how then could my remembrance moderate my words in blessing him, or my teares in lamenting him? Without doubt I haue as great cause to weepe for him as any man of my profession, if complaints should be proportionable to the losse which is made: but I protest it is not my owne private interest that makes me thus bitterly to lament him, so much as the consideration of the general harme, which not only France, but all Europe sustained by this lamentable losse.

And therefore when as to performe the generall offices of our duty, we came into the Chamber where as his body lay pitifully in the Hearse that did inuiron him, me thought that all the wallies of his Palace, yea all the vallies and fields thereabouts, should accompany with their sad accents, the found of our mournfull songs, and that all the holy-water wherewith we did sprinkle the foot of his mortuary sheet, should bee composed of our tears. For we haue not only lost a good King but a good Master, and not only a good Master but a good Father, whose remembrance is vnto our hearts, as myrrh is vnto bodies which it imbalmes, incorruptible, but wonderful bitter. Alas, how can it be bitter vnto vs, seeing it puts vs in minde of his name, which was so sweet: seeing that putting vs in minde of his perfections, and making vs to see how necessary he was for vs, it doth shew vs by consequence how miserable we are to haue lost him, concurring by these meanes his vertues into sorrow, his happinesse into despair, and his owne good deeds into sad subiects of complaints, not suffering vs to remember them, or binding vs to sigh for them? No, no, it is not possible but for such to whom his vertues were indifferent (if there bee any such vpon the earth) to remember them without teares, either of eies or heart: it is in vaine in this case to object constancy, and the lawes of reason: Constancy may in other subiects be a vertue, but in this I hold it for a vice, at the least an insensibility: the reasons which I should admit in other accidents, should seeme to me in these vnreasonable Paradoxes, & the consolations which I should hold in other losses for mortal sentences, should appeare vnto me in this case blasphemies. For what can be said vnto vs herein, to comfort and fortifie vs against sorrow, the which hath not already represented it selfe in our thoughts without fruit? What, that he was mortal like to other men? It is true, but that is one of the subiects of our complaints. For the good of France required that he had beene immortall. What, that we must will what the destinies decree? It is force perforce, but this necessity doth not mollifie our griefe. What, that tears and sighs cannot recall him againe? Alas, I know it well: but it is that which makes vs lament more bitterly. For if teares and sighes could recall him to life, it is long since wee had wept no more: It is long since he had returned into the possession of the light, and had been no longer deprived, but whilst the brute of his death was disperst ouer the Country. Are these the considerations wherewith they thinke suddenly to appeale so sensible a griefe of ours? doe they thinke with such admonitions instantly to drye vp the iust and pittifull teares of poore Orphans, the which they shed for the death of their father miserably murdered before their eyes? Thinke they, that for such reasons poore and desolate seruants lamenting the death of their Master and Protector, should suddenly stop their mouths to all complaints? No, no, these petty reasons doe not cure the griefe, but of minde which are not greatly sicke. Euen so we cannot approach neare vnto his royall Hearse so wish him eternal rest, but in making our prayers at his feet, we doe not feele our hearts as it were diuided in two by the knife of sorrow; and that after we haue cursed the brutish boldnesse of that vile Parricide, which hath so wickedly caused his body to be conuerted into dust, as well as our eyes into teares, we do not say vnto him in casting holy water, the word wherewith I will end this miserable discourse: Farewell great Prince, farewell good Master, farewell our Sword, farewell our Buckler, farewell our glory: the rest which thou hast purchased for vs vpon earth, may be restored vnto thee in heauen, with an eternall rest for thy soule. And neuer may it happen, that our ingratefull memory may cease to remember with blessing and praises, although it bee with teares and sighs, the name of Great Henry the fourth, King of France and Nauarre, the hope of learning, and the glory of Armes.

Duke of Esperron seizeth vpon the Citadell of Metz.

The Duke of Esperron did cunningly seize vpon the Citadell of Metz, by an example of most dangerous consequence, expelling Monsieur d'Arbigny, to whom the deceased King had giuen it in charge. The Governour hauing notice, that some Captaines and other creatures of the Duke of Esperrons, had an enterprize to seize vpon the Citadell, he put them out of it. Whereupon the Duke complained to the Queene, and entreated her to send for the Governour, to giue an account of that which he had done: who hauing receiued her Maiesties letters, hee presently tooke his way towards the Court. As soone as he was gone out of Metz, the Dukes friends and seruants seized on the Citadell for him. Many did wonder at the Queenes patience, that she would suffer her authority to be abused in this manner, yet no man opposed himselfe.

Iesuits seek to be incorporate in the Vniuersity of Paris.

The Iesuites since their reuocation some seuen or eight yeares since, had laboured by all means possible to be incorporate into the Vniuersity of Paris, and to haue liberty to open their schoole, and to this end they had built a house for their Nouices in the Suburbs of S. Germaine; the which is so great as a little towne may stand within the compasse of the walls. The Vniuersity of Paris opposed it selfe against them in this demand, and the deceased King in his lifetime (at the instance of the Vniuersity) would not yeeld vnto it. After whose death, the Iesuites, through the fauour of the Queene Regent, and some Noblemen, began their pursuit more hotly then before. The Vniuersity still opposing, it grew to be a question in law, and was brought before the Court of Parliament: during which contention, the Vniuersity presented this petition vnto the Queene Regent.

To the Queene Regent, the Princes of the blood, and the Lords of the Council.

Petition made by the Vniuersity of Paris.

MADAM, The Vniuersity of Paris most humbly shewes vnto your Maiesty, that the Doctrine of murdering of Kings by Assassins, who through deuotion vnto themselves to death, as to a martyrdome pleasing vnto God, is a pestilent infection neuer seene nor read of in all the Records of Antiquity: neither Pagans nor Christians euer knew it. Among the Mahometans, onely one, called The old man of the Mountain, had put it in practice: but the rest of that Sect did presently suppress it, and neuer since haue they vsed it, although their hatred against Christian Kings is nothing decreased. Onely within these three score years this infection hath crept into Christendome, and hath bene practised in England and France: we say in England, for that in respect of ciuill and temporall obedience, due to Kings, and for the safety of their persons, all Christian Kings, Pagans, Heretikes, Idolaters, Infidells, excommunicates, and Apostates, are holy and sacred vnto vs, as the Apostles, the ancient Christian Church, and the example of the Saints in Paradise, which haue bene Prelates and Bishops in France, doe teach. This hellish position vpon another erroneous doctrine, which is the Popes supremacy, whom we acknowledge head of the Church, as our Ancestors haue done. The doctrine of this Supream power is not found in the writings of the Diuines of Paris, nor in the bosome of the Vniuersity, but in the Sermons and writings of Iesuits, and in the answers of murderers when they are examined by their Iudges. Their owne words doe verifie it. Perry (who vnderooke to kill the Queene of England) said, that he might lawfully doe it, for that she was excommunicate by the Pope, and therefore her life was abandoned. Catesby, the attempter of that Powder- treason, which should haue blowne vp the King, the Queene, their Children, and the States of England, maintained, that this enterprize was holy: For, seeing that Clement the eight had by two Briefes forbidden the Catholikes to receiue him, by a greater reason being receiued, hee would haue him made away.

John Chastell said, that it was meritorious to kill the deceased King, for that notwithstanding

A standing the Bishops of France had receiued him into the Church, yet was hee not in it, the Pope hauing not admitted him. Ranillac the last Murtherer said, that the King made war contrary to the Popes liking, That God was the Pope, and the Pope was God, by these words, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke, &c. Hereupon the Bishop of Clermont, one of their Disciples, failed nor, after the execution of the Particide, to come to the Sorbonne, according to the custome of our Ancestors, to condemn this doctrine of murderers: where going from forme to forme before the Doctors were set, he aduised them to be carefull what they did: Ton haue here (said he) two Nuncios from the Pope. And the Company being set, he gaue his opinion, That the matter then in question had bene diuersly handled, and that it was necessary to speake vnto the Nuncios, who would write vnto the Pope, as if Kings might not liue but at the Popes pleasure. After that many good Preachers of this Vniuersity had detected the murderers of Kings, and the fauourers of this doctrine; in the end P. Cotton presented a letter declaratory vnto your Maiesty, of the Iesuits doctrine vpon this subiect, whereby he seekes to giue satisfaction to such as complain, that their writings doe too much maintaine these three approaching doctrines; the Popes supream power, and thereon depending rebellion against Kings, and abandoning of their liues, when as such men shall hold them to be Tyrants.

Many men of vnderstanding are well acquainted with their equiuocations and fallacies, whereby they hide their wicked doctrine: according to the practice whereof, that Sect doth make profession by Treaties allowed by their Generall, as may be seene in the Apologie of Henry Garnet, in the Chapter of Equiuocations: we should be loath to discouer them, and to hinder the course of their false coyn, if any good might grow thereby. But seeing by the merit of their fallacies, that Sect will gaine that aduantage ouer vs, as to instruct youth in the Vniuersity of Paris, contrary to the constant and determinate will of the deceased King: This Vniuersity, the daughter of the Kings of France, should hold her selfe guilty of infidelity, if she should not lay open vnto you their deceits, and be an humble suitor vnto your Maiesty, not to suffer this daughter, so loyall vnto her Soueraignes (so long as she is kept from forcing or corruption) to be infected with the company of a Sect which hath bene found so dangerous to our Kings. He tels you (Madame) that the Authors of this Order say, We may not kill a Tyrant; but the Authors produced by him, and especially Valencia, their last great Doctor, addes a limitation: If it be necesse (saith he, by publicke iudgement). And to the end you should not doubt of this publike authority, he afterwards sets downe articles of their doctrine ouer the authority of Kings, in this manner: That a Monarchy is the best kinde of government: that the Pope is Monarch in the Church, touching the spiritual government, & the King in his Realme for the temporall: not meaning the King should be King in his Realme, vnlesse the Pope be Monarch, and haue absolute power in the spirituall government of the Church. But (Madame) it is directly opposit to the doctrine of the Church, the which your Vniuersity of Paris hath alwaies maintained, that the Pope hath the power of a Monarch in the Church: for these be things contrary, that the Councell is aboue the Pope (as your Vniuersity hath alwaies held) and that the Pope is absolute Monarch of the Church. This doctrine of your Vniuersity, if it were euer necessary, it is now more then euer, both for the King, and all the Kingdomes of Christendome.

What be the effects of this absolute spirituall Monarchy? He tels you plainly in another booke which he presents vnto your Maiesty, and to the Princes and Noblemen of the Kings Councell. It is at the end of the second Tome of his Institutions, in the 35 Question, where he saith: That the Pope hath not absolute power to take by giue Kings Crowns and Kingdomes. All his fallacy consists in this word (absolute) to he saith, That he hath power to giue and take away the goods of your Subiects, but onely by way of Iustice. So P. Cotton a little after, affirms, That the Pope by vertue of his spirituall government, and for the coniunction of Religion and State, of the Spirituall and Temporall, may by vertue of his censures dispose of the Crownes of Kings: For Religion, the Service of God, the good of the Church, and for the saluation of Soules. This doctrine is not particular to him alone, but common to all his Society. This doctrine of coniunction which hee saies is betwixt Religion and the State, the spirituall and temporall, is contrary to the doctrine of our Lord Iesus Christ, who hath for euer made a great separation betwixt Religion and State, saying; Tell vnto God that which is Gods, that is, Religion; and to Caesar that which is Cæsars, that is, ciuill and temporall obedience, honour, service, and tribute. A Madam, your Vniuersity of Paris hath alwaies taught it thus, holding with the ancient Countells, and rectifying the new, in that they haue oppugned the whole some doctrine, wherein our Kings, the Bishops of France, the Courts of Parliament, the Kings Countell, the French Doctors, and your Vniuersitie haue alwaies maintained, That the liberty of the French Church, and of the Realme of France consisted. It is no question of small importance: it concerns the Kings Estate, whereof these men affirme, the Pope may deprive him: these men (I say) to whom at this day they commit the instruction of youth in all townes: the consciences of people in confessions, and the teaching of all is general: The Kings life and your Maiesties is also in danger: for when hee hath deprived a Prince of his right of government, they hold him for a Tyrant, which vsurpes an Estate against the iudgment of this publike authority, which may by the Iesuites doctrine make of a King a Tyrant: yea, they maintaine, That Subjects may rebel against their Prince, although he be not excommunicate, if they beleuee, that for feare of his greatesse they dare not doe it. This is the decision of the Iesuite Suarez, who thereby brings the Estate and life of all great Princes into danger. Such is also the practice of some murderers of Kings; men which acknowledge the Popes supream power, taught by the Iesuites, and beleuee no other, but so farre forth as it shall please the Pope. And this plainly was the practice of the last Parricide, as it did appeare by his execrable discourse with the Diuines which were sent vnto him, to whom he shewed himself perfectly instructed in all the shifts and fallacies which Sophistrie could vie of that subiect, whereas otherwise hee was very ignorant of all other knowledge and learning.

We doubt not, Madam, but the Pope, being well aduised would performe his duty, in damming (by his Bulles) such Murderers and Assassins to the paines of hell, and causing (as he may with a word) these great mischiefs to cease, which cast a shame and reproach vpon the innocency of Christian Religion. For hitherto the power of such men at Rome, hath giuen some men occasion to say: That hee which doth not hinder nor prevent crimes committed by them, ouer whom hee hath all power, and whom hee may restrain by to easie a conscience, he himselfe is the author, as the rules of iustice do teach.

The pretext which P. Cotton takes from the good of the Church, to giue power vnto the Pope to take away and giue Crownes is a counterfeite colour: for the same separation which our Lord Iesus Christ hath for euer made betwixt Religion & State, throughout the whole world, where he will haue his Gospel preached, we are bound (notwithstanding all Ecclesiasticall Censures, Interdictions, dispensations from the oath of Allegiance, or commandments from the Pope) not to take armes against our Kings, but to yeeld them all ciuill and temporall obedience, and to expose our liues for the defence of theirs. This is the Law of Nature, written in the hearts of men when they came into the world, in which the Sonne of God, taking our flesh vpon him, hath since confirmed, binding Christians more strictly then Pagans, who were led by the only instin& of Nature: and Priests more then Lay men, whom they should instruct in this holy doctrine, both by word & example. And much more Bishops then Priests, and most of all the first Bishop, for that his example to Christians should be of more force then all other Pastors of the Church.

And the King of Great Britaine, to warrant himselfe against these murderers, was forced to require an Oath of Allegiance from his Subjects, for his ciuill and temporall obedience, and for the safety of his life, notwithstanding all Popish censures. An oath which the doctrine & practice of murderers makes necessary at this day through all Christendome, to assure the Estates and liues of the Anointed of God, and to free the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, to all Kings and Princes, of that blame and hatred which this pestilent doctrine hath procured it. And to make it more fauoured with those Princes which hold a different religion. But this holy doctrine is more necessary in France, then in any other country, seeing the effects of the contrary fall chiefly vpon the life of our Kings, and the Crowne of France; and more in the minority of our King, then in his full age: this false doctrine should be refused, and the fauourers thereof reiected, for that the practice of former ages hath euer taught vs, that when they wil employ their censures against the temporall government of Kings, they excommunicate the weakest.

For these causes, Madam, the Vniuersity of Paris, daughter to the Kings of France, doth most humbly beseech your Maiesty, and you my Lords the Princes & Noblemen of the Council

A. Countell, not to suffer the Iesuits, holding a doctrine of the Popes supream power ouer the Estates and liues of Kings, contrary to the doctrine which the Vniuersity hath alwaies maintained, to instruct you in Paris, much lesse to bee incorporate in the Vniuersity, to make the doctrine and manners thereof as repugnant to the Estates of Kings, as their sect is, as may appeare by the writings of Peter Cotton, dedicated to your Maiesty, and deluded daily in their name; and by the experience which is made in many parts of Christendome. And the Vniuersity shall pray for the preferation and prosperity of the Kings, your Maiesty, and of you my Lords the Princes and Noblemen of the Kings Council.

Afterwards the Iesuits presented a petition vnto the Court of Parliament, requiring that they might be receiued into the body of the Sorbonne: whereupon it was answered, Let it be signified: At this signification the Sorbonne consented, so as they would submit: They demanded interpretation of that word, whereunto it was told them, that they must be subiect to the Rector, and to all the Statutes of the Vniuersity. But the decision of this cause was remitted to the opening of the Court againe at Saint Martins.

In Iuly the Court of Parliament amerced the Bishop of Paris in a pecuniary fine, for that rashly, and to the preiudice and dishonour of the sayd Court, he had past before them at the Funerals of the deceased King. This small formality bred bad blood, and many were amazed to see the Queene, and much more the Earle of Soissons to affect any party in this contention, especially against the Court of Parliament, who had bene so officious to there. Hereupon (and it may be vpon some lighter cause) factions beganne to grow among the great men: The Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Elpernon, the Chancellor, Villeroy, and the Iesuits made one party: The Dukes of Bouillon, Sully, and Rohan, Des Diguers, and the Court of Parliament were the other. A strange alteration in Court, a strange mystery of State, being supported and assisted by the House of Guise. The Prince of Conde had written to them of this party, and especially to the Duke of Bouillon, that he would be wholly governed by their Countell, and by the first President. Monseigneur de Barrant had bene sent to Brussels to hasten his departure. This cloud of factions being risen, it threatened a storme of combustions, considering the contrariety of humours of the Princes and Noblemen, and the incompatibility of their quarrels, vnder the government of a woman. There was then no speech but of parties and factions, and such as observed the humour of the French, and the liberty of the present time, thought they could not be long in forme, before they came into action. Whereupon they did renew and augment the Captaines in all the quarters and ports of Paris, who tooke the oath of Allegiance to the King and Queene.

All the houses were visited, and commandement giuen them to bee armed: all idle persons were commanded to depart, and the Guards at the Loure doubled. This grew vpon certaine threats, secret practices, and brutes of bad presage against them of the Religion. In the heat of these alterations, such as hated the Huguenots sought to trie the peoples affections: But they answered: That if they wished ill to them of the Religion, they should doe it themselves, as for their parts they would not bring the publike quiet into danger. During these broiles, the Prince of Conde arrived at Paris, much more glorious in his returne, then at his departure. He entered into Paris, being accompanied with about 1500 horse, where were all the Nobility of the Court, and most of the Princes, which had gone forth to meet him. Among others, the Duke of Bouillon, went vnto the frontiers: all good men hoped for much by his presence, to ballance the affaires betwixt these new parties. He came directly to the Loure, where hee was very well received by the Queene, who in testimony of her fauour, presented him with a goodly house in Saint Germaines suburbs, build by Genoy an Italian, and a rich cupboard of plate.

But his coming did not pacifie these alarmes at Paris: it was daily feared there would haue bene some tragedy among the great men: which caused the Prince of Conde and the Dukes of Guise and Bouillon to keep guards in their houses two nights together vpon some apparant aduice that they would fore the lodgings. But it was the will of God to disperse this cloud: so as amidst these broiles all things continued quiet and peaceable, the people seeming to haue no will to stirre, for in effect all the Communitie and Townes of the Realme in generally were not only refused to obedience, but so banded to peace, that if any one should haue sought to ymagine it, it was thought he should not find any one retreat. These were the workes of God, and some fruits of their former follies. The carriage and power of the Duke of Espenon were the chiefe causes of all these broyles and distrust, having four thousand men of the Kings guard in the suburbs at his deuotion, being their Colonell, wherewith he did fortifie himselfe as he pleased. They of the Religion had their part in this feare, yet they continued their exercise, relying wholly upon the assurance which the Queene had giuen them: who also assured the Noblemen of their protection, contending them with great pensions, and other aduancements. This Duke of Espenon made great preparations at Milan for warre, which put the Duke of Sauoy into a great alarme, but especially they of Geneva, who feared them both: whereupon they sent for Mansur de la Noue, being at Poinz, who went vnto them with leaues they did assure both the one and the other from the Court as much as might bee, and they confirmed to the Duke of Sauoy the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth for his eldest son, with a dowry of 300000 crownes, and some small Seignerie during her life.

The Queene being seised in the Regency by a free consent of the whole State, Monsieur Pasquier, one of the Masters of Requests, a man of great learning and iudgement, did write a discourse of aduice vnto her, touching the preferaution of the State, during the minority of the King her sonne, in these termes:

Pasquier Letter to the Que Regent.

“MADAM: it is the worke of a discreet Pilot to prouide for an approaching storme during a still calme, and to foresee the remedie before the danger, or if he be surprised with the tempest, to oppose himselfe courageously against the fury of the waues and winds, to bring his ship to a safe port. Euen so should you during the calme wherein we are, think of all alterations which may grow both within and without the Realme, and to prouide a fit cure to hinder their course, and to oppose your selfe resolutely against their attempts, that would trouble this State, to preserve it from apparant shipwracke wherunto it may fall, if the helme be not rightly gouerned. Whereupon I haue thought it my duty, to a King, and a part of those that are within this Ship, to contribute this my Discourse, which I most humbly beseech your Maiesty to rectifie with the like deuotion, as it is presented.”

Education
of the king.

“We haue the King your Sonne very young, who is our lawfull Lord, nor giuen vs by chance, but ordained, yea pre-ordained of God, by a continuall succession, descent, and generation of Kings, received, nourished, and bred vp amongst vs. The first care you ought to haue of him; concernes his education, and breeding vp in good manners: for according to the good impressions he shall receiue in his tender age, hee will continue to the end, if bad, they will not endure the touch, but will soone change.”

“You must cause him to be bred vp in the feare of God, not with a partiall hand, which must be liuely printed in his soule, that it may be a bridle vnto him; to keep him in the ordinary course of reason. Let vs adde what wee please of humane wisdom to our opinion, but they be but idle follies, yea precipitations of our greatness, if the honor of God be not our guide. Wherefore this holy obiect must be a lesson vnto him, wherewith he must daily feed in this tender age, else all your designs in the conduct and direction of his life, will be built vpon sand.”

“This feare of God being grauen in his heart, he must withall be prepossessiont with, that one of the first motions of a great King, consists in the obseruation of iustice, wherof he is a debtor to his subjects, the assured ground of his Estate: the which he must be taught to see visibly, by the examples of happy success, which haue accompanied those who reigning iustly, haue maintained their subjects in all obedience. On the other side (that which God forbid) that he which holds another course of life, looses not his Crowne to his posterity. Let him vnderstand that this iustice must be distributed with an equal proportion (I mean according to their merits) to all his subjects, both great and small, and punish such severely as abuse their greatness to the prejudice of the weaker sort. A sentence which will punish him much loue with the people, but also recompense this rigour he must be mild, affable, and gracious to such as haue the honor to be about him. A good countenance, and an embrace of our King, to the Princes, Noblemen, and others of what quality soeuer, darke commonly they a general difference for all the bonds which they thinke he owes them. These propositions will be regarded, will produce another of no less worth, which is, that although he haue supreme power within his Realme, and that the common sort of Courtiers hold his will to be a Law, yet he will iudge by his own Nature,

A Nature, that it is not meant of all that he will or may, but onely of that which hee ought iustly to will. For the law is made to giue perfection to the thing for the which it is made, and not to satisfy a disordered appetite. The King must in this case set a strong barre betwixt him and his opinion, lest he take for his deuce, That which I will, is iust; but rather, I will it, for that it is iust. This maxime will frame in him the law of reason, not written in paper, but grauen in his heart, which will keep him company day & night: it will aduertise him & aduise him in all places & at all times, after what manner he should gouerne his subjects with iudgement. Any Prince that hath suffered himselfe to bee transported with his owne passions, in doing that which he ought not, there often happens that vnto him which he would not: and about all things he must haue a continuall care, not to make a difference and separation betwixt the affaires of State and those of God, who must bee the first and last end of his actions. You must accustome him in his young yeares, to haue an exact and diligent care of affaires, wherein he must be instructed as he grows, to the end that being thus framed, and comming to riper yeares, labor may be but a pastime to him: the masters eye makes the field fertile, and the horse fat; so the knowledge which the Prince takes of his affaires, makes that his Counsellors doe not gouerne them at their pleasures. Breed him vp, not in prodigality, but in a wise liberality, worthy of a great King: represent still vnto him, the knowing well how to vse this vertue: and how, where, and when it is necessary, his bounty will redound vnto himselfe, and the more he shall giue, the more he shall reape.

“If you desire that he shall first please God, and then the people, let him wholly direct his heart to clemency, wherof he hath an admirable present before his eyes, by the memory of the deceased King his father, your honoured Lord and royal husband. It is a great wisdom, and fit for a great spirit, to winke (when occasion serues) at offences which are done vnto him, hauing so great a power, who may reuenge the least without controll. These be the vertues which our King should seeke in his tender age which will grow with him, and will by little and little so encrease, as they will one day make him reputed the true father of the people.”

“And for that in a publike fountaine the common interest is, that no man cast any filth into it: euen so, that no dishonest thing should fall into our Kings, the general Spring of all his people: wherefore there must be a carefull regard had, when he enters into that heat of youth, that he suffer not his will to run head-long to voluptuousnesse, and that hauing power to doe what he please, he doth not that which hee ought not: for that the way of liberty to great vices is so easie and sweet, as it is almost insensible. For this cause, you must teach him in time, what honour and reputation he shall reape by a continent youth; and contrariwise how that God will be highly offended, if he abuse his supreme power in chastity. Although that all vices be naturally odious vnto God in all persons, yet is it more particularly in a Prince, for that he doth not so much offend in himselfe, as in his example. Cursed is he which glories in that which he should punish in another. An iniurie done to a priuate man, breeds in his soule such a liuely resolution of reuenge, as oftentimes it tends to the ruine and utter desolation of an Estate.”

“You shall let him know the miserable effects of Couetousnesse, which produceth nothing of it selfe but a contempt of God, with an absolute will to make all things venial, to the ruine of a King and his people. The obiect of vnlimited auarice in a King, giues great lustre to prodigality, which was held prodigious in another Prince. About all, if his natural inclination carries him to violent things, he may be withdrawne, letting him see, that cruelty is vnworthy of so mild a spirit as that of a King ought to bee, and that the Prince which is infected therewith, hath nothing of a man but the shape. It is a vice much to be feared in a King, for it is in him as couetousnesse in old men, which encrease continually without any hope of decrease.”

“These are in effect the vices wherof a King should be free. These vertues and these vices will shew that there is not any thing so available for the general profit and publike commodity of an Estate and Common-wealth, as a good Prince, nor any thing so hurtfull as a bad and vicious.”

“Hauing provided for that which concerneth our Kings person, wee must passe to that which belongs to his Estate. In this first encounter of affaires, that which you should haue in greatest recommendation, is the vniou of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, great

Noble,

1610 "Noblemen, and then the people. When all shall be well vnitd, there shall not be any King A or Prince, how mighty fouer, that shall dare to attempt against this Estate without his vndoubted ruine.

"Vnion is your strength, Diuision your weakenesse; Vnion maintaines and preferres E. states in their greatnesse, Diuision vndermines and ruines them, without hope euer to rise again. That King of Egypt meaning to teach his children the force of Vnion, and the weakenesse of Discord, represented vnto them a bundle of arrowes, which they could not breake being tyed together, but diuided, there was nothing more easie. This Estate is like vnto mans body, the which liues long by the accord and harmony of the foure humours:
but when as any of these qualities seekes to command ouer the rest, the body fals into diseases, and so dyes. It is euen so of this Estate, if by your iudgement and wise dome you reduce both great and small to one will, the same intention and the same desire to maintaine the Estate vnder the Kings obedience: you shall make it the feare and terrour of her enemies. But if the parts of the body be once dis-embred, if this perfect Vnion and corre-pondency of all the members doe not subsist by a mutuall and reciprocall entertainment, the corruption and desolation of the Estate will follow.

"To entertaine Vnion, let Princes and great men be called to Counsel, in matters which concerne the State, and the greater they are by extraction of birth, the more precedence and prerogative should be given them, both in regard of the memory of their ancestors, and of their owne vertues. From the greater, defend to them that hold the second and C the third ranks; and then vnto the meaner, and so reward every one according to his merit, with the charges and dignities of the Realme. It is one of the chiefe means to maintaine this Estate. But in this distribution of charges, flattery, false reports, malice or enuy, must not be admitted, lest they abuse you with false apparances.

"The most wholesome and best aduice will come from the common voice of the people. I speake of the Clergy, where are the wisest and most learned of France: of the Nobility, whereon depends the force, and of the third Estate intermixt with a great number of vertuous and learned men.

"It is not sufficient to haue provided for the vnion of great men: but it is to be feared that
